the time came that the Consuls should be elected, he did present himselfe among other, accompanied with a great number of those he had brought with him, to inhabite the two new townes, who did make earnest sute for him. But the two Tribunes Fuluius and Manlius, spake against him, and said: it was out of all reason, that so yong a man should in such manner prease to haue the office of the highest dignitie, against the vse and custome of Rome, before he had passed through the inferiour offices of the common-wealth. Neuertheless, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voices of the people: who presently pronounced him Consull openly, with Sextius AElius, although he was not yet thirtie yeares old. Afterwards, AElius and he deuiding the offices of the state by lot, it fell vpon T. Quintius to make warre with Philip king of Macedon. In the which me thinks fortune greatly fauored the Romaines affaires, that made such a man General of these wars: for, to haue pointed a Generall that by force and violence would haue sought all things at the Macedonians hands, that were a people to be won rather by gentlenesse and perswasions, then by force and compulsion: it was all against themselues. Philip, to maintaine the brunt of a battell against the Romaines, had power enough of his owne in his Realme of Macedon: but to make war any long time, to furnish himselfe with mony and victuals, to haue a place and cities to retire vnto: and lastly, to haue all other necessaries for his men and armie, it stood him vpon to get the force of Greece. And had not the force of Greece bene politickly cut from him, the wars against him had not bene ended with one battell. Moreouer, Greece (which neuer before bare the Romaines any great good will) would not haue dealt then so inwardly in friendship with them, had not their Generall bene (as he was) a gentle person, lowly and tractable, that wan them more by his wisedome, then by his force, and could both eloquently vtter his mind to them, and courteously also heare them speake, that had to do with him, and chiefly ministred iustice and equitie to euery man alike. For it is not to be thought that Greece would otherwise so soone haue withdrawne themselues from the rule of those, with whom they were acquainted, and gouerned: and haue put themselues vnder the rule of strangers, but that they saw great iustice and lenitie in them. Howbeit that may more plainely apppeare by declaring of his acts. Titus was informed, that the Generals before him sent to the warre in Macedon (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vsed to come thither about the latter end of the yeare, and made but cold warres, and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in another against Philip, and all to take some straight, or to cut off victuals: which he thought was not his way to folow their example. For they tarying at home, consumed the most of their Consulship at Rome, in matters of gouernement, and so enioyed the honour of their office. Afterwards in the end of their yeare, they would set out to the wars, of intent to get another yeare ouer their heads in their office, that speding one yeare in their Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the wars abroad. But Titus not minding to trifle out the half of his Consulship at Rome, & the other abroad in the wars: did willingly leaue al his honors & dignities, he might haue enioyed by his office at Rome, and besought the Senate that they would appoint his brother Lucius Quintius lieutenant of their army by sea. Furthermore, he tooke with himself about three thousand old souldiers of those that had first ouerthrown Asdrubal in Spaine, and Hanniball afterwards in Afrike, vnder the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to serue, and were very willing to go with him in his iourney, to be the strength of his army. With this company he passed the seas without danger, and landed in Epirvs, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his armie before King Philip, who of long time had lien in camp about the mouth of the riuer of Apsus, to keep the straight & passage which is the entrie into Epirvs. So that Publius Iulius had lien still there, and done nothing, by reason of the natural force & hardnes of the place. Then Titus tooke the army of him, & sent him to Rome. Afterwards, himself went in person to view & cõsider the nature of the country, which was in this sort. It is a long vally walled on either side with great high mountaines, as those which shut in the valley of Tempe in Thessaly: howbeit it had no such goodly woods, nor greene forests, nor faire medows, nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had: but it was a great deep matish or quauemire, through the middest wherof the riuer called Apsvs did run, being in greatnesse and swiftnesse of streame, very like to the riuer of Penevs. The riuer did occupy al the ground at the feete of the mountaines, sauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, and a narrow straight path by the waters side, very vnhandsome for an armie to passe that way, though they found not a man to keepe the passage. There were some in the armie that counselled Titus to fetch a great compasse about by the country of Dassaretide, and by the citie of Lyncvs, where the countrey is very plaine, and the way maruellous easie. Howbeit he stood in great feare he should lack victuals, if he staid farre from the sea, and happily if he fell into any barren or leane countrey, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to flie) he should be constrained in the end to returne againe towards the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherefore he determined to crosse the mountaines to set vpon his enemie, and to proue if he could win the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his armie, and when the Romaines forced to get vp the hilles, they were receiued with darts, slings, and shot, that lighted amongst them here & there: insomuch as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slain and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the warre: for in the meane time there came certaine neatherds of the countrey vnto Titus (who did vse to keep beasts on these mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not: by the which they promised to guide his armie so, that in three dayes at the furthest, they would bring them on the top of the mountaine. And because they might be assured that their words were true, they said they were sent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Caropus was the chiefest man of the Epirots, who loued the Romaines very wel, yet he fauoured them but vnderhand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and so sent one of his captaines with them, with foure thousand footmen, and three hundred horsmen. The heard-men that were their guides, went before stil, fast bound: and the Romaines followed after. All the day time the armie rested in thick woods, and marched all night by moon light, which was then by good hap at the full. Titus hauing sent these men away, rested all the rest of his camp: sauing that some dayes he entertained them with some light skirmishes to occupie the enemie withal. But the same day, when his men that fetched a compasse about, should come vnto the top of the mountaine aboue the campe of his enemies, he brought all his armie out of the campe by breake of day, and deuided them into three troupes, with the one of them he himselfe went on that side of the riuer where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the side of the hill. The Macedonians againe, they shot lustily at them from the height of the hill, and in certaine places amongst the rockes they came to the sword. At the selfesame time, the two other troupes on either hand of him, did their endeuor likewise to get vp the hil, and as it were enuying one another, they climed vp with great courage against the sharp and steep hanging of the mountaine. When the Sun was vp, they might see a farre off as it were, a certaine smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mists we see commonly rise from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could see nothing, because it was behind them, and that the top of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The Romaines, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the midst of the fight, that it was their fellows they looked for. But when they saw it increased still more and more, and in such sort, that it darkned all the aire: then they did assure them selues it was certainly the token their men did giue them that they were come. Then they began to crie out, climing vp the hils with such a lustie courage, that they draue their enemies vp the hill still, euen vnto the very rough and hardest places of the mountaine. Their fellowes also that were behind the enemies, did answer them with like loud cries from the top of the mountaine: wherewith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled presently vpon it. Notwithstanding, there was not slaine aboue two thousand of them, because the hardnes and straightnesse of the place did so guard them, that they could not be chased. But the Romaines spoiled their camp, tooke all that they found in their tents, tooke also their slaues, and wan the passage into the mountaines, by the which they entred the country of Epirvs: and did passe through it so quietly, and with so great abstinence, that though they were far from their ships and the sea, and lacked their ordinarie portion of corne which the were wont to haue monethly, & that victuals were very scant with them at that time, yet they neuer took any thing of the country, though they found great store & plentie of all riches in it. For Titus was aduertised, that Philip passing by Thessaly, & flying for feare, had caused the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountains, and then to set fire on their houses, & to leaue those goods they could not carie away, by reason of the weight & vnhansome cariage thereof, to the spoile of his souldiers: and so (as it seemed) he left the whole country to the conquest of the Romaines. Whereupon Titus looking consideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to passe through the country without doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their enemies had now left to them as their owne. So they taried not long to enioy the benefit of their orderly and wise forbearing of the country. For, so soone as they were entred Thessaly, the

the cities willingly yeelded themſelues vnto them: and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyond the countrey of THERMOPYLES, did maruellouſly deſire to ſee Titus, asking no other thing, but to put themſelues into his hands. The ACHAIANS alſo on the other ſide, did renounce the league and alliance they had made with Philip: and furthermore did determine in their counſell, to make war with him on the ROMAINES ſide. And although the ÆTOLIANS were at that time friends and confederates with the ROMAINES, and that they did ſhew themſelues very louing to take their part in the wars: neuertheleſſe when they deſired the OPVNTIANS that they would put their citie into their hands, and were offered that it ſhould be kept & defended from Philip: they would not hearken thereto, but ſent for Titus, and put themſelues and their goods wholy into his protection. They ſay, that when king Pyrrus firſt ſaw the ROMAINES armie range in order of battel from the top of a hill, he ſaid: this order of the barbarous people ſetting of their men in battell ray, was not done in a barbarous maner. And thoſe alſo that neuer had ſeene Titus before, and came for to ſpeake with him: were compelled in a maner to ſay as much. For where they had heard the MACEDONIANS ſay, that there came a captaine of the barbarous people that deſtroyed all before him by force of armes, and ſubdued whole countries by violence: they ſaid to the contrary, that they found him a man indeede young of yeares, howbeit gentle, and courteous to looke on, and that ſpake the Greeke tongue excellently well, and was a louer only of true glorie. By reaſon whereof they returned home maruellous glad, and filled all the cities and towns of GRECE with good wil towards him, and ſaid: they had ſeene Titus the captaine, that would reſtore them to their ancient libertie againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip ſhewed himſelf willing to haue peace, and that Titus alſo did offer it him, and the friendſhip of the people of ROME, with theſe conditions, that he would leaue the GRECIANS their whole liberties, & remoue his garriſons out of their cities and ſtrong holds: which Philip refuſed to do. And thereupon all GRECE, and euen thoſe which fauoured Philip, ſaid with one voice: that the ROMAINES were not come to make warres with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauour of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GRECE came in, & offered themſelues vnto Titus without compulſiō. And as he paſſed through the countrey of BOEOTIA, without any ſhew at all of warres, the chiefeſt men of the citie of THEBES went to meet him: who though they tooke part with the king of MACEDON, becauſe of a priuate man called Brachylelis, yet they would honour Titus, as thoſe which were contented to keepe league and friendſhip with either ſide. Titus embraced them, and ſpake very courteouſly vnto them, going on his way ſtill faire and ſoftly, entertaining them ſometime with one matter, and ſometime with another, and kept them talk of purpoſe, to the end his ſouldiers being wearied with iournying, might in the meane time take good breath: and ſo marching on by litle and litle, he entred into the citie with them. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleaſed, but yet they durſt not refuſe him, though he had not at that time any number of ſouldiers about him. When he was within THEBES, he prayed audience, and began to perſwade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the citie alreadie) that they would rather take part with the ROMAINES, then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpoſe, king Attalus being by chance at that time in the aſſēbly, did help to exhort the THEBANS very earneſtly, that they would do as Titus perſwaded them. But Attalus was more earneſt then became a man of his yeares, for the deſire he had (as was imagined) to ſhew Titus his eloquence: who did ſo ſtraine and moue himſelfe withall, that he ſounded ſodainly in the middeſt of his oration, whereby the rewme fell downe ſo faſt vpon him, that it tooke away his ſenſes, ſo as he fell in a traunce before them all, and few daies after was conueied againe by ſea into ASIA, where he liued not long after. In the meane time, the BOEOTIANS came in to the ROMAINES, and took their part. And Philip hauing ſent Ambaſſadors to ROME, Titus alſo ſent thither of his men to ſolicite for him, in two reſpects. The one, if the warres continued againſt Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did graunt him peace: that they would do him the honour, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare leaſt they would ſend a ſucceſſor to continue thoſe wars, who ſhould take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his frieds made ſuch earneſt ſute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he praied: neither was there ſent any other General in Titus place, but he ſtil cōtinued his charge in theſe wars. Wherefore, ſo ſoone as he had receiued his commiſſion and authoritie from the Senate, he went ſtraight towards THESSALY, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his armie aboue fixe and twentie thouſand fighting men, whereof the ÆTOLIANS made ſixe thouſand footmen, and three thousand horsemen. King Philips army on the other side was no lesse in number, and they began to march one towards the other, vntilll at the length they both drew neare the citie of SCOTVSA, where they determined to trie the battell. So, neither they nor their men were afraid to see themselues one so neare another: but rather to the contrary, the ROMAINES on the one side tooke greater heart and courage vnto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselues what great honour they should win to ouercome the MACEDONIANS, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantnesse, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other side also, taking the ROMAINES for other maner of souldiers then the PERSIANS, beganne to haue good hope if they might winne the field, to make King Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his father. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stand to it like men, and to shew themselues valiant souldiers in this battell, as those which were to shew the proofe of their valiantnesse in the heart of GREECE, the goodliest Theater of the world, and against their enemies of most noble fame. Philip then by chaunce, or forced to it by the speed he made, because they were both ready to ioyne, did get vp vnwares vpon a charnell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being a litle hill raised vp aboue the rest, and neare the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his souldiers, as all Generals do before they giue battell. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they took it for an il signe that he was gotten vp on the top of a graue to speak vnto thē, he of a conceit at the matter, did of himselfe deferre to giue battel that day. The next morning, because the night was very wet by reason the South windes had blowne, the clouds were turned to a mist, and filled all the valley with a darke grosse thicke ayre, comming from the mountaines thereabouts, which couered the field betweene both campes with a mist all the morning: by reason whereof the skouts on both sides that were sent to discouer what the enemies did, in very short time met together, and one gaue charge vpon another, in a place they call the dogges heads, which are points of rockes placed vpon litle hilles one before another, and very neare one vnto another, which haue bene called so, because they haue had some likenesse of it. In this skirmish there were many chaunges, as commonly falleth out when they fight in such ill fauoured stony places: for sometime the ROMAINES fled, and the MACEDONIANS chased them: another time the MACEDONIANS that followed the chase, were glad to flie themselues, and the ROMAINES who fled before now had them in chase. This chaunge and alteration came by sending new supplies still from both campes, to relieue them that were distressed and driuen to flie. Now began the mist to breake vp, and the ayre to cleare, so that both Generals might see about them what was done in either camp: by reason whereof both of them drew on their army to the field and battell. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his army, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill, from which they came so amaine to set vpon the ROMAINES, and with such a fury, that the strongest & valiantest that could be, had neuer bin able to abide the front of their battell, so closely were they ioyned together, and their wall of pikes was so strong. But on his left wing it was not so, because the ranks of his battell could not ioyne so neare nor close target to target, the place being betwixt the hils and the rocks where the battell was comming, so as they were compelled by reason of the straightnesse & vneuennesse of the ground, to leaue it open, and vnfurnished in many places. Titus finding that disaduantage, went from the left wing of his battell which he saw ouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, and going sodainely toward the left wing of King Philips battell, he set vpon the MACEDONIANS on that side, where he saw they could not close their ranks in the front, nor ioyne them together in the middest of the battell (which is the whole strength and order of the MACEDONIAN fight) because the field was vp hill and downe hill: and to fight hand to hand they were so pestered behind, that one thronged and ouerlaid another. For the battell of the MACEDONIANS hath this propertie, that so long as the order is kept close and ioyned together, it seemeth as it were but the body of a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are sundred and not ioyned together, it doth not only loose the force and power of the whole body, but also of euery priuate souldier that fighteth: partly by reason of the diuersitie of the weapons wherwith they fight, and partly for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the disposing and ioyning together of their ranks and orders, which doth stay vp one another, more then doth euery priuate souldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, and that they ran their way: one part of the ROMAINES followed the chase, and the other ran to giue a charge vpon the flankes of the right wing which fought yet, and

and they made great slaughter of them. Wherupon they now which before had the vantage, began to stagger and breake, and in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing downe their weapons: insomuch as there were slaine of them eight thousand in the field, and fiue thousand taken prisoners in the chase. And had not the fault bene in the Ætolians, Philip had not saued himselfe by flying as he did. For whilst the Romaines had their enemies in chase, the Ætolians taried, and rifled all king Philips campe, so as they had left the Romaines nothing to spoile at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot words betweene them, and one with another. But afterwards they angred Titus worse, chalenging the honour of this victorie to themselues, becausse they gaue it out through Greece, that they alone had ouerthrowne king Philip in the battell. So that in the songs and ballades the Poets made in praise of this victorie, which euery country and townes-man had in his mouth, they alwaies put the Ætolians before the Romaines: as in this that followeth, which was currantly sung in euery place:

Quintius ouercame Philips army.

Mutinie betwixt the Aetolians and the Romaines.

Oh friend, which passest by: here lye we wretched pheares,
Withouten honour of the graue, without lamenting teares.
We thirty thousand were, which ended haue our daies:
In cruell coasts of Thessaly, which caused our decaies.
We haue bene ouerthrowne by th'Aetolians men of warre:
And by the Latine crewes likewise, whom Titus led from farre, Euen out of Italy, to Macedonie land,
Vs to destroy, he (Captaine-like) did come with mighty band:
And Philip stout, therewhiles for all his proud fierce face,
Is fled, more swift then Harts do run, which are pursude in chase.

Alcæus verses in disgrace of king Philip.

The Poet was Alcæus that made these verses for to sing, who did them in disgrace of king Philip, falsely increasing the number of his men which died in the battell, onely to shame and spite him the more: howbeit he spited Titus thereby, more then Philip, becausse it was sung in euery place. For Philip laughed at it, and to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a song to counterfeit his, as followeth:

But Titus tooke it grieuously, who chiefly desired to be honoured amongst the Grecians, by reason whereof from that time forwards he dealt in the rest of his matters alone, without making account of the Ætolians: wherewith they were maruellous angry, and specially when he receiued an ambassador from Philip, and gaue eare vnto a treatie of peace which he offered. For then they were so netled against him, that they gaue it out through all Greece, that Titus had sold peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haue ended the war, and vtterly haue destroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought Greece into bondage. These slanderous reports and false tales which the Ætolians spread thus abroad, did much trouble the Romaines friends and confederates: but Philip selfe pulled this suspition out of their heades, when he came in person to require peace, and did submit himself wholly to the discretion of Titus and the Romaines. Titus then granted him peace, and deliuered to him his realme of Macedon, and commaunded him he should giue ouer all that he held in Greece, and besides, that he should pay one thousand talents for tribute, taking from him all his army by sea, sauing onely ten ships: and for assurance of this peace, he tooke one of his sons for hostage, whome he sent to Rome. Wherin Titus certainly did very well, and wisely did foresee the time to come. For then Hanniball of Carthage (the great enemy of the Romaines) was banished out of his country, and came to king Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earnestly moued, to follow his good fortune, and the increase of his empire. Whome Hanniball so followed with these perswasions, that king Antiochus at length was come to it. And trusting to his former good successe, and notable acts, whereby in the wars before he had attained the surname of Great, he began now to aspire to the monarchy of the whole world, and sought how to find occasion to make wars with the Romaines. So that if Titus (foreseeing that a far off) had not wisely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the wars of king Philip, and that these two the mightiest Princes of the world had ioyned together against the city of Rome: then it had bene in as great trouble and danger, as euer it was before in the time of their wars against Hanniball. Howbeit, Titus hauing happily thrust in this peace between both wars, he cut off the warre that was preſent, before the other that was comming: by which meanes he tooke from one of the kings his laſt, and from the other his firſt hope. In the meane time the tenne Commiſſioners that were ſent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aide and aſſiſt him in the order of the affaires of Grece, did counſell him to ſet all the reſt of Grece at liberty, and onely to keepe in their hands with good garriſon, the cities of Chalcide, of Corinth, and of Demetriade, to make ſure that by practiſe they ſhould not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then the Ætolians (that were the common ſlanderers of Titus proceedings) began openly to make theſe cities to rebell, and did ſummon Titus to looſe the chaines of Grece: for ſo did king Philip call theſe three cities. Then they asked the Grecians in mockerie, whether they were willing now to haue heauier fetters on their legges then before, being ſomewhat brighter and fairer then thoſe they had bene ſhackled with: and alſo whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking off the fetters from the Grecians legs, and tying them about their necks. Titus being maruellouſly troubled and vexed with this, moued the ten Counſellers ſo earneſtly, that he made them graunt his requeſt in the end, that thoſe three cities alſo ſhould be deliuered from garriſon: becauſe the Grecians thencefoorth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberalitie was not throughly perfourmed, and accompliſhed in euery reſpect on them all. Wherefore when the feaſt called Iſthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinit multitude of people, come to ſee the ſport of the games played there: for Grece hauing bene long time troubled with wars, they ſeeing themſelues now in ſure peace, and in very good hope of full libertie, looked after no other thing, but delighted onely to ſee games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by ſound of trumpet in the aſſembly, that euery man ſhould keepe ſilence. That done, the herald went forward, and thruſt into the midſt of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloud: that the Senate of Rome, and T. Quintius Flaminius, Conſull of the people of Rome (now that they had ouerthrowne king Philip and the Macedonians in battell) did thenceforth diſcharge from all garriſons, and ſet at liberty from all taxes, ſubſidies, and impoſitions for euer, to liue after their old ancient lawes, and in full liberty: the Corinthians, the Locrians, thoſe of Phocide, thoſe of the Iles of Eveoea, the Achaians, the Phthiotes, the Magnesians, the Theſſalians, and the Perrhoebians. At the firſt time of the Proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herald, and the moſt part of thoſe that heard him, could not tell directly what he ſaid: for there ran vp and downe the ſhew-place where the games were plaid, a confuſed brute and tumult of the people, that wondred, and asked what the matter meant, ſo as the he herald was driuen againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after ſiléce made, the herald putting out his voice far louder then before, did proclaime it in ſuch audible wiſe, that the whole aſſembly heard him: and then roſe there ſuch a loud ſhout and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the ſound of it was heard to the ſea. Then all the people that had taken their places, and were ſet to ſee the Sword-players play, roſe vp all on their feet, letting the games alone, and went together with great ioy to ſalute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of Grece. Then was ſeene (which is much ſpoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crowes fell downe at that preſent time among the people, which by chance flew ouer the ſhew-place at that time that they made the ſame outſhout. This came to paſſe, by reaſon the aire was broken and cut aſunder with the vehemencie and ſtrength of the voyces, ſo as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birdes: which were driuen of neceſſitie to fall to the ground, as flying through a void place where they lacked aire. Vnleſſe we will rather ſay, that it was the violence of the crie, which ſtrooke the birds paſſing through the aire, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and ſo made them fall down dead to the earth. It may be alſo, that there was ſome hurling wind in the aire, as we do ſee ſomtime in the ſea, when it riſeth high, and many times turneth about the waues, by violence of the ſtorme. So it is, that if Titus had not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to ſee him, & that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly ſcaped from being ſtifled amongſt thē, the people came ſo thicke about him from euery place. But after that they were weary of crying and ſinging about his pauilion vntill night, in the end they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kin, friends or citizens, they did kiſſe and embrace one another for ioy, and ſo ſupped and made merrie together. In their more reioycing yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the wars of Grece, diſcourſing among thē what ſundry great wars they had made, what they had endured heretofore, heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they could neuer ſo ioyfully, nor more aſſuredly obtaine it, then they did euen at that preſent, receiuing the honorableſt reward, and that which deſerued greateſt fame through the world: that by the valiantneſſe of ſtrangers who fought for the ſame (without any ſpilt bloud of their owne in compariſon, or that they loſt the life of any one man, whoſe death they had cauſe to lament) they were ſo reſtored to their auncient freedome and liberty. It is a very rare thing amongſt men, to find a man very valiant, and wiſe withall: but yet of all ſorts of valiant men, it is harder to find a iuſt man. For Ageſilaus, Lyſander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous captaines of former times, had very good skill to leade an armie, and to win the battell, as well by ſea as by land: but to turne their victories to any honourable benefite, or true honour among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you do except the battell againſt the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, the iourney of PLATÆES, the battell of THERMOPYLES, the battell Cimon fought about CYPRVS, and vpon the riuer of Eurymedon: all the other wars and battels of GRECE that were made, fell out againſt themſelues, and did euer bring them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumph which euer were ſet vp for the ſame, was to their ſhame and loſſe. So that in the end, GRECE was vtterly deſtroyed and ouerthrowne, and that chiefly through the wickednes and ſelfe-will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying anothers doing. Where a ſtraunge nation, the which (as it ſhould ſeeme) had very ſmall occaſion to moue them to do it, (for that they haue had no great familiaritie with auncient GRECE, and through the counſell and good wiſedome of the which, it ſhould ſeeme very ſtraunge that GRECE could receiue any benefite) haue notwithſtanding with daungerous battels and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppreſſion and ſeruitude of violent Lords and tyrants. This and ſuch like talke, did at that time occupie the GRECIANS heads: and moreouer, the deedes following did anſwer and performe the words of the proclamation. For at one ſelfe time, Titus ſent Lentulus into ASIA, to ſet the BARGILIANS at liberty, and Titillius into THRACIA, to remoue the garriſons out of the Iles and cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was ſent alſo into ASIA, vnto king Antiochus, to ſpeake vnto him to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty which he kept in ſubiection. And as for Titus, he went himſelfe vnto the citie of CHALCIDE, where he tooke ſea, and went into the prouince of MAGNESIA, out of the which he tooke all the garriſons of the cities, and redeliuered the gouernement of the commonwealth vnto the citizens of the ſame. Afterwards when time came that the feaſt of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of ARGOS in the honour of Hercules, Titus was choſen iudge and rector of the games that were plaid there: where, after he had ſet all things in very good order, pertaining vnto the ſolemnitie of the feaſt, he cauſed againe ſolemne proclamation to be made openly, for the generall liberty of all GRECE. Furthermore viſiting the cities, he did ſtabliſh very good lawes, reformed iuſtice, and did ſet the inhabitants and citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amity and concord one with another: and did call home alſo all thoſe that were outlawes and baniſhed men, & pacified all old quarrels and diſſentions among them. The which did no leſſe pleaſe and content him, that by perſwaſions he could bring the GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other: then if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACEDONIANS. In ſomuch, as the recouery of the liberty which Titus had reſtored vnto the GRECIANS, ſeemed vnto them the leaſt part of the goodneſſe they had receiued at his hands. They ſay, that Lycurgus the orator ſeeing the collectors of taxes, carie Zenocrates the Philoſopher one day to priſon, for lacke of payment of a certaine impoſition, which the ſtraungers inhabiting within the citie of ATHENS were to pay: he reſcued him from them by force, and moreouer proſecuted law ſo hard againſt them, that he made them pay a fine for the iniurie they had done vnto ſo worthie a perſon. And they tell, how the ſame Philoſopher afterwards meeting Lycurgus children in the citie, ſaid vnto them: I do well requite your fathers good turne he did me: for I am the cauſe that he is praiſed and commended of euery man, for the kindneſſe he ſhewed on my behalfe. So the good deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GRECIANS, did not onely reape this benefite vnto them, in recompence that they were praiſed and honoured of all the world: but they were cauſe alſo of increaſing their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the world afterwards had great affiance and truſt in them, and that moſt iuſtly. So that the people and cities did not onely receiue the Captaines and Gouernours the ROMAINES ſent them: but they alſo went to ROME vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put themſelues into their hands. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings and princes alſo which were oppreſſed by other more mighty then themſelues) had no other refuge, but to put themſelues vnder their protection: by reaſon whereof in a very ſhort time (with the fauour and helpe of the gods, as I am perſwaded) all the world came to ſubmit themſelues to their obedience, and vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus alſo did glorie more, that he had reſtored GRECE againe vnto liberty, then in any other ſeruice or exploit he had euer done. For when he offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, the targets of ſiluer with his owne ſhield, he made theſe verſes to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth:

O noble twins Tyndarides, Dan Ioue his children deare,
Throw out loude ſhouts of ioy and mirth, reioyce and make good cheare.
O noble kings of Spartan ſoyle, which take delight to ride
Your trampling ſteedes, with fomy bit, and trappings by their ſide:
Reioyce you now, for Titus he, the valiant Romaine Knight, Theſe gifts ſo great to you hath got, euen by his force and might:
That hauing taken cleane away from off the Greekiſh neckes,
The heauie yoke of ſeruitude, which held them thrall to checkes,
Vnto their former libertie he hath reſtorde them free,
Which altogether periſht was, as men might plainely ſee.

He gaue a crowne of maſſie gold vnto Apollo, vpon the which he made this inſcription to be written:

A valiant Romaine Knight, euen Titus by his name,
A captaine worthy by deſert of high renowne and fame:
To thee (Apollo god) this crowne of pure fine gold
Hath giuen, thy godhead to adorne with iewels manifold:
Therefore let it thee pleaſe (Apollo god of grace)
With fauour to requite this loue to him and to his race:
That his renowned fame and vertue may be ſpred,
And blazed through the world ſo wide, to ſhew what life he led.

So hath the citie of CORINTH enioyed this good hap, that the GRECIANS haue bene twice proclaimed to be ſet at liberty: the firſt time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the ſecond time by Nero in our time, and at the ſelfe ſame inſtant when they ſolemnely kept the feaſt called Iſthmia. Howbeit the firſt proclamation of their libertie (as we haue told you before) was done by the voice of an herald: & the ſecond time it was done by Nero himſelf, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open aſſembly, in the market place of the city of CORINTH. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus began then a goodly and iuſt warre againſt Nabis the curſed and wicked tyrant of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit in the end he deceiued the expectation of GRECE: for when he might haue taken him, he would not do it, but made peace with him, forſaking poore SPARTA, vnworthily oppreſſed vnder the yoke of bondage: either becauſe he was affraid that if the warre held on, there ſhould come a ſucceſſour vnto him from ROME, that ſhould carie the glorie away to end the ſame, or elſe he ſtood iealous and enuious of the honour they did vnto Philopœmen: who hauing ſhewed himſelfe in euery place as excellent a captaine as euer came in GRECE, and hauing done notable acts and famous ſeruice, both of great wiſedome, and alſo of valiantneſſe, and ſpecially in the ACHAIANS warre: he was as much honoured and reuerenced of the ACHAIANS in the Theaters and common aſſemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruellouſly offended, for he thought it vnreaſonable, that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene generall of an armie, but in ſmall little warres againſt his neighbors, ſhould be as much eſteemed and honoured, as a Conſull of ROME, that was come to make wars for the recouerie of the liberty of GRECE. But Titus alleadged reaſonable excuſe for his doings, ſaying, that he ſaw very well he could not deſtroy this tyrant Nabis, without the great loſſe and miſerie of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore, of all the honours the ACHAIANS euer did him (which were very great) me thinkes there was none that came neare any recompence of his honorable and well deſeruing, but one onely preſent they offered him, and which he aboue all the reſt moſt eſteemed: and this it was. During the ſecond warres of AFRICKE, which the ROMAINES had againſt Hanniball, many ROMAINES were taken priſoners in the ſundry battels they loſt, and being ſold here and there, remained ſlaues in many countries: and amongſt other, there were were disperſed in GRECE to the number of twelue hundred, which from time to time did moue men with pitie and compaſſion towards them that ſaw them in ſo miſerable chaunge and ſtate of fortune. But then much more was their miſerie to be pitied, when theſe captiues found in the ROMAINES army, ſome of them their ſonnes, other their brethren, and the reſt their fellowes and friends, free and conquerours, and themſelues ſlaues and bondmen. It grieued Titus much to ſee theſe poore men in ſuch miſerable captiuitie, notwithſtanding he would not take them by force from thoſe that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for fiue hundred pence a man, and hauing gathered them together into a troupe, they preſented all the ROMAIN captiues vnto Titus, euen as he was ready to take ſhip to returne into ITALY: which preſent made him returne home with greater ioy and contentation, hauing receiued for his noble deedes ſo honourable a recompence, and worthy of himſelfe, that was ſo louing a man to his citizens and countrey. And ſurely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did moſt beautifie his triumph. For theſe poore redeemed captiues did that, which the ſlaues are wont to do on that day when they be ſet at liberty: to wit, they ſhaue their heads, and do weare litle hats vpon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and ſo followed Titus charret, on the day of his triumph and entry made into ROME in the triumphing maner. It was a goodly ſight alſo, to ſee the ſpoiles of the enemies, which were caried in the ſhew of this triumph: as ſtore of helmets after the GRECIANS faſhion, heapes of targets, ſhields, and pikes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull ſumme of gold and ſiluer. For Itanus the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that there was brought a maruellous great maſſe of treaſure in niggots of gold, of three thouſand ſeuen hundred and thirteene pound weight, and of ſiluer, of forty three thouſand, two hundred, three ſcore and ten pound weight, and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips fourteene thouſand, fiue hundred, and fourteene, beſides the thouſand talents king Philip ſhould pay for a raunſome: the which ſumme, the ROMAINES afterwards forgaue him, chiefly at Titus ſute and interceſſion, who procured that grace for him, and cauſed him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of ROME, and his ſonne Demetrius to be ſent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hoſtage at ROME. Shortly after, king Antiochus went out of ASIA into GRECE with a great fleet of ſhips, & a very puiſſant army, to ſtirre vp the cities to forſake their league and alliance with the ROMAINS, and make a diſſention among them. To further this his deſire and enterpriſe, the ÆTOLIANS did aide and backe him, which of long time had borne great and ſecret malice againſt the ROMAINES, and deſired much to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to ſay, that the war which he tooke in hand, was to ſet the GRECIANS at liberty, whereof they had no neede, becauſe they did already enioy their libertie: but for that they had no iuſt cauſe to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honeſteſt way he could. Wherefore the ROMAINES fearing greatly the riſing of the people, and the rumour of the power of this great king, they ſent thither Manius Acilius their generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS ſakes. Which arriuall did more aſſure them that already bare goodwill to the ROMAINES, after they had once ſeene Manius and Titus: and the reſt that began to flie out, and to ſhrinke from them, thoſe Titus kept in obedience from ſtarting, remembring them of the friendſhip and goodwill they had borne him, euen like a good skilfull Phiſitian that could giue his patient Phiſicke to preſerue him from a contagious diſeaſe. Indeede there were ſome (but few of them) that left him, which were won and corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS: and though he had iuſt cauſe of offence towards them, yet he ſaued them after the battell. For king Antiochus being ouercome in the country of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, and in great haſt tooke the ſea to returne into ASIA. And the Conſull Manius following his victory, entred into the country of the ÆTOLIANS, where he tooke certaine townes by force, and left the other for a pray vnto king Philip. So Philip king of MACEDON on the one ſide, ſpoiled and ſacked the DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMIANS, and the APERANTINES: and the Conſull Manius on the other ſide, deſtroyed the city of HERACLEA, and laid ſiege to the city of NAVPACTVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus taking compaſſion of them, to ſee the poore people of GRECE thus ſpoiled and turned out of all: went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius campe, and there reproued him for ſuffering king Philip to vſurpe the benefit and reward of his honourable victory, ſtill conquering many people, kings, and countries, whilſt he continued ſiege before a city, and onely to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwards, when they that were beſieged ſaw Titus from their wals, they called him by his name, and held vp their hands vnto him, praying him he would take pitie vpon them: but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto them, he fell a weeping. Afterwards he ſpake with Manius, and appeaſing his anger, got him to graunt the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine daies, in which time they might ſend Ambaſſadors to ROME, to ſee if they could obtaine grace and pardō of the Senate. But the moſt trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreat for the CHALCIDIANS, with whom the Conſull Manius was more grieuouſly offended, then with all the reſt: becauſe that king Antiochus after the wars was begun, had maried his wife in their citie, when he was paſt yeares of mariage, and out of all due time. For he was now very old, and being in his extreame age, and in the middeſt of his wars, he fell in dotage with a young gentlewoman, the daughter of Cleoptolemus, the faireſt woman that was at that time in all GREECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their city into his hands, to ſerue him in this warre, for a ſtrong and ſafe retiring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had loſt the battell, he came thither with all poſſible ſpeed, and taking from thence with him his paſſing faire young Queene which he had maried, and his gold, his ſiluer and friends, he tooke the ſeas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cauſe the Conſull Manius hauing wonne the battell, did march ſtraight with his armie towards the citie of CHALCIDE in a great rage and furie. But Titus that followed him, did alwaies lye vpon him to pacifie his anger, and did ſomuch intreate him, together with the other ROMAINES of ſtate and authoritie in counſell: that in the end, he got him to pardon them of CHALCIDE alſo. Who, becauſe they were preſerued from perill by his meanes, they to recompence this fact of his, did conſecrate vnto him, all their moſt ſtately and ſumptuous buildings and common works in their citie, as appeareth yet by the ſuperſcriptions remaining to be ſeene at this day. As in the ſhew-place of exerciſes: the people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this ſhew-place of exerciſes, vnto Titus and Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: the people of CHALCIDE did conſecrate this temple vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this preſent time, there is a Prieſt choſen by the voice of the people, purpoſely to do ſacrifice vnto Titus: in which ſacrifice, after that the thing ſacrificed is offered vp, and wine powred vpon it, the people ſtanding by, do ſing a ſong of triumph made in praiſe of him. But becauſe it were too long to write it all out, we haue onely drawne in briefe the latter end of the ſame: and this it is:

Quintius intreateth for the AEtolians. King Antiochus maried Cleoptolemus daughter in the city of Chalcide.

Honours done vnto T. Quintius for ſauing the Chalcidias and the Grecians.

The cleare vnſpotted faith of Romaines we adore,
And vow to be their faithfull friends both now and euermore.
Sing out you Muſes nine to Ioues eternall fame:
Sing out the honour due to Rome, and Titus worthy name.
Sing out (I ſay) the praiſe of Titus and his faith:
By whom you haue preſerued bene from ruine, dole, and death.

Quintius curteſie and good nature. Emulation betwixt Titus Quintius and Philopœmen.

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone honour and reuerence Titus, but he was generally honoured alſo by the GRECIANS as he deſerued, and was maruellouſly beloued for his courteſie and good nature: which argueth plainely that they did not fainedly honour him, or through compulſion, but euen from the heart. For though there was ſome iarre betwixt him & Philopœmen at the firſt about ſeruice, for emulation of honour, and after betwixt him and Diophanes alſo, both generals of the ACHAIANS: yet he neuer bare them any malice in his hart, neither did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heat of his words in counſell and aſſemblies, where he vttered his mind frankely to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eager of reuenge: but many haue thought him raſh, and haſtie of nature. Otherwiſe, he was as good a companion in company as poſſibly could be, and would vſe as pleaſant wiſe mirth as any man. As when he ſaid to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needes vniuſtly vſurpe the Ile of the ZAZYNTHIANS, to diſſwade them from it: my Lords of ACHAIA, if ye once go out of PELOPONNESVS, you put your ſelues in daunger, as the torteyſes do, when they thruſt their heads out of their ſhelles. And the firſt time he parled with Philip to treate of peace: when Philip ſaid vnto him, you haue brought many men with you, and I am come alone. Indeede it is true you are alone, ſaid he, becauſe you made all your friends and kin to be ſlaine. Another time, Dinocrates MESSINIAN being in ROME, after he had taken in his cups in a feaſt where he was, he diſguiſed himſelfe in womans apparell, and daunced in that maner: and the next day following he went vnto Titus, to pray him to helpe him through with his ſute, which was, to make the city of MESSINA to rebell, and leaue the tribe of the ACHAIANS.

Titus Quintius ſayings.

Titus

Titus made him anſwer, that he would think vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (ſaid he) how you can daunce in womans apparell, and ſing at a feaſt, hauing ſuch matters of weight in your head. In the counſel of the ACHAIANS, king Antiochus Ambaſſadors being come thither, to moue them to breake their league with the ROMAINES, and make their alliance with the king their maſter, they made a maruellous large diſcourſe of the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their maiſters armie, and did number them by many diuers names. Whereunto Titus anſwered, and told how a friend of his hauing bidden him one night to ſupper, & hauing ſerued ſo many diſhes of meat to his boord, as he was angrie with him for beſtowing ſo great coſt vpon him, as wondring how he could ſo ſodainly get ſo much ſtore of meate, and of ſo diuers kinds. My friend ſaid to me againe, that all was but porke dreſſed ſo many waies, and with ſo ſundry ſawces. And euen ſo (quoth Titus) my lords of ACHAIA, eſteeme not king Antiochus armie the more, to heare of ſo many men of armes, numbred with their launces, and of ſuch a number of footmen with their pikes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diuerſly armed, onely with ill fauored litle weapons. Furthermore, after Titus had done theſe things, and that the war with Antiochus was ended, he was choſen Cenſor at ROME, with the ſon of that ſame Marcellus, who had bene fiue times Conſul. This office is of great dignitie, & as a man may ſay, the crowne of all the honors that a citizen of ROME can haue in their common wealth. They put off the Senate, foure men onely, but they were not famous. They did receiue all into the number of citizēs of ROME, that would preſent themſelues to be enrolled in their common regiſter: with a prouiſo, that they were borne free by father and mother. They were compelled to do it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to deſpite the Nobilitie, perſwaded the people of ROME to commaund it ſo. Now at that time two of the nobleſt and moſt famous men of ROME were great enemies one againſt another: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, & Marcus Porcius Cato. Of theſe two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the Senate, as the chiefeſt and worthieſt perſon in the city: and got the diſpleaſure of the other, which was Cato, by this miſhap. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, nothing like vnto him in conditiō at al: for he was ſo diſſolutely & licentiouſly giuen ouer to his pleaſure, that he forgot al comelineſſe & honeſtie. This Lucius loued wel a yōg boy, & caried him alwaies with him whē he went to the wars, or to the charge & gouernmēt of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day ſaid vnto Lucius Quintius, that he loued him ſo wel, that he did leaue the ſight of the ſword-players at the ſharpe, which were making readie to the fight, although he had neuer ſeene man killed before, to waite vpon him. Lucius being very glad of the boyes words, anſwered him ſtraight, thou ſhalt looſe nothing for that my boy, for I will by and by pleaſe thee as wel. So he commanded a condemned man to be fetched out of priſon, and withall called for the hangman, whom he willed to ſtrike off his head in the midſt of his ſupper, that the boy might ſee him killed. Valerius Antias the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Liuius declareth, that in an oration which Cato himſelfe made, it was written that it was one of the GAVLES: who being a traitor to his country men, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his hall, killed him with his owne hand, to pleaſe a boy he loued, that was deſirous to ſee a man killed. Howbeit, it is verylikely that Cato wrote in this ſort, to aggrauate the offence, & to make it more cruel. For, many haue written it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offendour condemned to die: and among other, Cicero the orator doth recite it in a book he made of Age, where he made it to be told vnto Catoes owne perſon. Howſoeuer it was, Marcus Cato being choſen Cenſor, and cleanſing the Senate of all vnworthy perſons, he put off the ſame Lucius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bin Conſull: which diſgrace did ſeeme to redound to his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius alſo. Wherupon both the brethrē came weeping with all humilitie before the people, and made a petition that ſeemed very reaſonable & ciuill: which was that they would command Cato to come before them, to declare the cauſe openly why he had with ſuch opē ſhame defaced ſo noble a houſe as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or ſhrinking back, came with his cōpaniō into the market place, where he asked Titus out aloud, if he knew nothing of the ſupper where ſuch a fact was cōmitted. Titus anſwered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened the whole matter as it was, and in the end of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius ſweare openly, if he would denie that he had ſaid was true. Lucius anſwered not a word. Whereupon the people iudged the ſhame was iuſtly laid vpon him: and ſo to honour Cato, they did accompanie him from the pulpit for orations, home vnto his owne houſe. But Titus being much offended at the diſgrace of his brother, became enemie to Cato, and fel in with thoſe that of long time had hated him. And ſo by practiſe he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leaſes, and all deedes of ſales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voide: and cauſed many ſutes alſo to be commenced againſt him. Wherein, I cannot ſay he did wiſely or ciuilly, to become mortall enemie to an honeſt man, a good citizen, and dutifull in his office for his yeare, but vnworthie kinſman, who had iuſtly deſerued the ſhame layed vpon him. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after when the people were aſſembled in the Theater to ſee games played, and the Senators were ſet according to their cuſtome, in the moſt honourable places: Lucius Flaminius came in alſo, who in lowly and humble maner went to ſit downe in the furtheſt ſeates of the Theater, without regard of his former honour: which when the people ſaw, they tooke pitie of him, and could not abide to ſee him thus diſhonoured. So they cried out to haue him come and ſit among the other Senators the Conſuls, who made him place, and receiued him accordingly. But to returne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition and couetous greedie mind he had of honour, was very well taken and eſteemed, ſo long as he had any occaſion offered him exerciſe it in the warres, which we haue ſpoken of before. For, after he had bene Conſull, of his owne ſeeking he became a Colonell of a thouſand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So when he began to ſtoupe for age, and that he had giuen ouer as a man at the laſt caſt, to beare office any longer in the ſtate: they ſaw plainely he was ambitious beyond meaſure, to ſuffer himſelfe in old age to be ouercome with ſuch youthfull violence, being farre vnmeete for any of his yeares. For me thinkes his ambition was the onely cauſe that moued him to procure Hannibals death, which bred him much diſliking and il opinion with many. For, after Hannibal had fled out of his owne countrey, he went firſt vnto king Antiochus: who, after he loſt the batttell in Phrygia, was glad the Romaines granted him peace with ſuch conditions as themſelues would. Wherfore Hannibal fled againe from him, and after he had long wandered vp and downe, at the length he came to the Realme of Bithynia, and remained there about king Pruſias, the Romaines knowing it well enough: and becauſe Hannibal was then an old broken man, of no force nor power, and one whom fortune had ſpurned at her feete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus being ſent Ambaſſadour by the Senate, vnto Pruſias king of Bithynia, and finding Hannibal there, it grieued him to ſee him aliue. So that notwithſtanding Pruſias maruellouſly intreated him, to take pity vpon Hannibal a poore old man, and his friend who came to him for ſuccour: yet he could not perſwade Titus to be content he ſhould liue. Hannibal long before had receiued anſwere of his death from an oracle, to this effect:

Lucius Quintius reſtored to his place by the people.

T. Quintius ambition.

T. Quintius cauſe of Hannibals death.

Titus ſent Ambaſſador vnto Pruſias king of Bithynia.

Hannibal deceiued by an oracle concerning his death.

The land of Lybia, ſhall couer vnder mould,
The valiant corpes of Hanniball, when he is dead and cold.

So Hannibal vnderſtood that of Lybia, as if he ſhould haue died in Afrike, and bene buried in Carthage. There is a certaine ſandie country in Bithynia, neare to the ſeas ſide, where there is a litle village called Libyssa, and where Hannibal remained continually. He miſtruſting king Pruſias faint heart, and fearing the Romaines malice alſo, had made ſeuen priuie caues and vaults vnder ground long before, that he might ſecretly go out at either of them which way he would, and euery one of them came to the maine vault where himſelfe did lie, and could not be diſcerned outwardly. When it was told him that Titus had willed Pruſias to deliuer him into his hands, he ſought then to ſaue himſelfe by thoſe mines: but he found that all the vents out, had watch and ward vpon them by the kings commandement. So then he determined to kil himſelf. Now ſome ſay, that he wound a linnen towell hard about his necke, and commanded one of his men he ſhould ſet his knee vpon his buttocke, and weighing hard vpon him, holding the towell faſt, he ſhould pull his necke backward with all the power and ſtrength he could, and neuer lin preſſing on him, till he had ſtrangled him. Other ſay that he drank buls bloud, as Midas & Themiſtocles had done before him. But Titus Liuius writeth, that he had poiſon which he kept for ſuch a purpoſe, and tempered in it a cup he held in his hands, and before he drank, he ſpake theſe words: come on, let vs deliuer the Romaines of this great care, ſith my life is ſo grieuous vnto them, that they thinke it too long to tarie the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate ſo much: and yet Titus by this ſhall win no honourable victorie, nor worthie the memorie of the auncient Romaines, who aduertiſed king Pyrrus their enemie, euen when he made warres with them, and had won battels of them, that he ſhould beware of poiſoning which was intended towards him. And this was Hannibals end, as we find it written. The newes whereof being come to Rome vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violent and cruell, to haue made Hannibal

kill himselfe in that sort, when extremitie of age had ouercome him alreadie, and was as a bird left naked, her feathers falling from her for age: and so much the more, because there was no instant occasion offered him to vrge him to do it, but a couetous mind of honor, for that he would be chronicled to be the cause and author of Hannibals death. And then in contrariwise they did much honour and commend the clemencie and noble mind of Scipio AFRICAN: who hauing ouercome Hanniball in battell, in AFRICKE selfe, being then indeed to be feared, and had bene neuer ouercome before: yet he did not cause him to be driuen out of his country, neither did ask him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, and before the battell, when he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hanniball curteously by the hand, and after the battell, in the conditions of peace he gaue them, he neuer spake word of hurt to Hannibals person, neither did he shew any crueltie to him in his miserie. And they tell how afterwards they met againe together in the citie of EPHESVS, and as they were walking, that Hanniball tooke the vpper hand of Scipio: and that Scipio bare it patiently, and left not off walking for that, neither shewed any countenance of misliking. And in entring into discourse of many matters, they descended in the end to talke of auncient Captaines: and Hanniball gaue iudgement, that Alexander the great was the famousest captaine, Pyrrus the second, and himselfe the third. Then Scipio smiling, gently asked him: what wouldest thou say then, if I had not ouercome thee? Truly, quoth Hanniball, I would not then put my selfe the third man, but the first, and aboue all the captaines that euer were. So diuerse greatly commending the goodly sayings and deeds of Scipio, did maruellously mislike Titus, for that he had (as a man may say) laid his hands vpon the death of an other man. Other to the contrarie againe said, it was well done of him, saying, that Hanniball so long as he liued, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lustie age, it was not his hand nor bodie that troubled the ROMAINES so much, but his great wisedome, and skill he had in the wars, and the mortall hate he bare in his heart towards the ROMAINES, which neither yeares, nor age would diminish or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remaine still, but fortune doth not alwayes keepe in a state, but changeth still, and then quickneth vp our desires to set willingly vpon those that warre against vs, because they hate vs in their harts. The things which fell out afterwards, did greatly proue the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For one Aristonicus, son of the daughter of a plaier vpon the citherne, vnder the fame and glory of Eumenes, whose bastard he was, filled al ASIA with warre and rebellion, by reason the people rose in his fauour. Againe Mithridates, after so many losses he had receiued against Sylla and Fimbria, and after so many armies ouerthrowne by battell and warres, and after so many famous captaines lost and killed: did yet recouer againe, and came to be of power both by sea and land against Lucullus. Truly Hanniball was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene: for he had a King to his friend, that gaue him entertainement for him and family, and made him Admirall of his ships, and Generall of his horsemen and footmen in the field. Marius also went vp and downe AFRIKE a begging for his liuing, insomuch as his enemies at ROME laughed him to scorne: and soone after notwithstanding they fell downe at his feete before him, when they saw they were whipped, murthered, and slaine within ROME by his commandement. Thus we see no man can say certainly he is meane or great, by reason of the vncertaintie of things to come: considering there is but one death, and change of better life. Some say also, that Titus did not this act alone, and of his owne authoritie: but that he was sent Ambassadour with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hanniball to death, by what meanes soeuer they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we do not find any notable thing written of Titus worthie of memorie, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he died quietly of a naturall death at home in his countrey.

THE COMPARISON OF
Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopœmen.

T. Quintius benifits vnto Greece.

IT is time now we come to compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefits that came to the GRECIANS, neither Philopœmen, nor all the other former captaines are to be compared with Titus. For all the auncient Captaines almost being GRECIANS, made warres with other GRECIANS: but Titus being a ROMAINE, and no GRECIAN, made warres for the libertie of GRECE. When Philopœmen was not able to help his poore citizens distressed sore, and vexed with wars, he sailed away into CRETA. Titus hauing ouercome Philip King of MACEDON in battell, did restore againe to libertie all the people and cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any will narrowly examine the battels of either partie: they shall find that Philopœmen being Generall of the ACHAIANS, made more GRECIANS to be slaine, then Titus did of the MACEDONIANS, fighting with them for the libertie of the GRECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke and sodainly angred, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left King Philip his Realme and Crowne after he had ouercome him, and vsed great clemency towards the ÆTOLIANS: where Philopœmen for spite and malice, took townes and villages from his owne natiue countrey, and citie wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a sound friend to them, to whom he had once professed friendship, and done pleasure vnto: and Philopœmen, in a geare and anger, was readie to take away that he had giuen, and to ouerthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopœmen when he had done the LACEDÆMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards raze the walles of their citie, and spoiled and destroyed all their countrey: and lastly, ouerthrew their whole gouernement. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate choller, he was himselfe cause of his owne death, for that he made more haste then good speed, to go out of time to set vpon those of MESSINA: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wisedome, and euer considered what was best to be done. But if we looke into the number of battels, and victories: the warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two battels: whereas Philopœmen in infinite battels in which he had the better, neuer left it doubtfull, but that his skill did euer help him more to the victorie, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wan honour by meanes of the power of ROME, when it flourished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopœmen made himselfe famous by his deedes, when GRECE began to stoupe and fall altogether. So that the deedes of the one, were common to all the ROMAINES: and the deeds of the other, were priuate to himselfe alone. For Titus was Generall ouer good and valiant souldiers, that were alreadie trained to his hand: and Philopœmen being chosen Generall, did traine his men himselfe, and made them afterwards very expert and valiant, that were but meane and greene souldiers before. And whereas Philopœmen had continuall warres with the GRECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that it made Philopœmens malice.

Titus Quintius wiser then Philopœmen.

Quintius commaunded good souldiers. Philopœmen made good souldiers.

made a certaine proofe of his valiantneſſe. For where all other things are anſwerable to his, there we muſt iudge that ſuch as ouercome, haue the moſt courage. Now Philopœmen making warres with the moſt warlike nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS) did ouercome the ſubtilleſt of them, by fineneſſe and pollicie: and the moſt valiant by proweſſe and hardineſſe. But Titus ouercame, by putting that onely in practiſe, which was alreadie found and ſtabliſhed: as the diſcipline of warres, and order of battell, in the which his ſouldiers had long before bene trained. Whereas Philopœmen brought into his country, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accuſtomed vnto. So that the chiefeſt point how to win a battell, was found out anew, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vſe it, and had found it out alreadie before. Againe, touching the valiant acts done in the perſon of themſelues, many notable acts may be told of Philopœmen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archedamus an ÆTOLIAN, who flouting Titus one day, ſaid in his reproch: that at a day of battell, when Philopœmen ran with his ſword in his hand, to that ſide where he ſaw the MACEDONIANS fighting, and making head againſt the enemy, Titus held vp his hands vnto heauen, and was buſie at his prayers to the gods, not ſtirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the ſword, and to fight of all hands. All the goodly deeds Titus euer did, were done alwayes as a Conſull, or Lieutenant, or a Magiſtrate: whereas Philopœmen ſhewed himſelfe vnto the ACHAIANS, a man no leſſe valiant, and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a Generall. For when he was a Generall, he did driue Nabis the tyrant of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of MESSINA, and deliuered the MESSINIANS out of bondage: and being a priuate man, he ſhut the gates of the citie of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIANS) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from comming in, and thereby ſaued the citie from ſacking. Thus being borne to commaund, he knew not onely how to commaund according to the law, but could commaund the law it ſelfe vpon neceſſitie, and when the common wealth required it. For at ſuch a time he would not tarie while the Magiſtrates which ſhould gouerne him, did giue him authoritie to commaund, but he tooke it of himſelfe, and vſed them when the time ſerued: eſteeming that he which knew better then they what was to be done, was more truly their Generall, then he whom they had choſen. And therefore they do well, that do commend Titus acts, for his clemencie and curteſie vſed to the GRECIANS: but much more the noble and valiant acts of Philopœmen vnto the ROMAINES. For it is much eaſier to pleaſure and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and reſiſt the ſtrong. Therefore, ſithence we haue throughly examined and compared the one with the other, it is very hard to iudge altogether the difference that is betweene them. Peraduenture therefore the iudgement would not ſeeme very ill, if we do giue the GRECIAN for diſcipline of warre, the preheminence and praiſe of a good Captaine: and to the ROMAINE, for iuſtice and clemencie, the name and dignitie of a moſt iuſt and courteous gentleman.

A Generall muſt not be at his praiers when he ſhould occupie his ſword.

Quintius clemencie to the Grecians. Philopœmens loue to the Romaines.

The end of Titus Quintius Flaminius life.

THE LIFE OF Pyrrus.

Pyrrus kindred and beginning of the kingdome of Epirus.

IT is written, that ſince Noes floud, the firſt King of the THESPROTIANS, and of the MOLOSSIANS, was Phaeton, one of thoſe who came with Pelaſgus into the Realme of EPIRVS. But ſome ſay otherwiſe, that Deucalion, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the countrey of the MOLOSSIANS. But howſoeuer it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the ſonne of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the countrey, and after him left a ſucceſſion of Kings, which were called after his name, the PYRRIDES: becauſe that from his infancie he was ſurnamed Pyrrus, as much to ſay, as red: and one of his legitimate ſonnes whom he had by Lanaſſa, the daughter of Cleodes the ſonne of Hillus, was alſo named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cauſe why Achilles is honored as a god in EPIRVS, being called in their language, Aſpetos, that is to ſay, mightie, or very great. But from the firſt kings of that race vntil the time of Tharrytas, there is no memorie nor mention made of them, nor of their power that raigned in the meane time, becauſe they all became very barbarous, and vtterly voide of ciuilitie. Tharrytas was indeed the firſt that beautified the cities of his countrey with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in ciuill lawes and cuſtomes, and made his name famous to the poſteritie that followed. This Tharrytas left a ſonne called Alcetas, of Alcetas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came AEacides, who maried Phthia the daughter of Menon THESSALIAN, a famous man in the time of the warres, ſurnamed LAMIAN, and one that had farre greater authoritie then any other of the confederates, after Leoſthenes. This Æacides had two daughters by his wife Phthia, to ſay, Deidamia and Troiade, and one ſonne called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, draue him out of his kingdome, and put the crowne into the hands of the ſonnes of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the friends of Æacides that could be taken, were generally murthered and ſlaine outright. Androclides and Angelus in the meane time ſtole away Pyrrus, being but a ſuckling babe (whom his enemies neuertheleſſe eagerly ſought for to haue deſtroyed) and fled away with him as faſt as poſſibly they might, with few ſeruants, his nurſes and neceſſary women only to looke to the child and giue it ſucke: by reaſon whereof their flight was much hindred, ſo as they could go no great iorneys, but that they might eaſily be ouertaken by them that followed. For which cauſe they put the child into the hands of Androclion, Hippias, & Neander, three luſty yong mē, whom they truſted with him, and commanded them to runne for life to a certaine citie of MACEDON, called Pyrrus, red.

How Pyrrus being an infant was ſaued.

called MEGARES, and they themſelues in the meane time, partly by intreaty, and partly by force, made ſtay of thoſe that followed them till night. So as with much ado hauing driuen them backe, they ran after them that caried the childe Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at ſunne ſet. And now, weening they had bene ſafe, and out of all daunger, they found it cleane contrarie. For when they came to the riuer vnder the towne walles of MEGARES, they ſaw it ſo rough and ſwift, that it made them afraide to behold it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpoſſible to wade through, it was ſo high riſen and troubled with the fall of the raine, beſides that the darkneſſe of the night made euery thing ſeeme fearefull vnto them. So as they now that caried the child, thought it not good to venter the paſſage ouer of themſelues alone, with the women that tended the child: but hearing certaine countrimen on the other ſide, they prayed and beſought them in the name of the gods, that they would helpe them to paſſe ouer the child, ſhewing Pyrrus vnto them a farre off. But the countrimen by reaſon of the roaring of the riuer vnderſtood them not. Thus they continued a long ſpace, the one crying, the other liſtning, yet could they not vnderſtand one another, till at the laſt one of the companie bethought himſelfe to pill off a peece of the barke of an oke, and vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and neceſſity of the child. Which he tied to a ſtone to giue it weight, and ſo threw it ouer to the other ſide of the riuer: other ſay, that he did pricke the barke through with the point of a dart which he caſt ouer. The countrimen on the other ſide of the riuer, hauing read what was written, and vnderſtanding thereby the preſent danger the child was in: felled downe trees in all the haſt they could poſſibly, bound them together, and ſo paſſed ouer the riuer. And it fortuned that the firſt man of them that paſſed ouer, and tooke the child, was called Achilles: the reſidue of the countrimen paſſed ouer alſo, and tooke the other that came with the child, and conueyed them ouer as they came firſt to hand. And thus hauing eſcaped their hands, by eaſie iourneys they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his houſe ſitting by his wife: and layd downe the child in the middeſt of the floore before him. The king hereupon ſtaied a long time without vttering any one word, weighing with himſelfe what was beſt to be done: becauſe of the feare he had of Caſſander, a mortall enemie of Æacides. In the meane time, the child Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke hold of the kings gowne, and ſcrawled vp by that, and ſo got vp on his feete againſt the kings knees. At the firſt, the king laughed to ſee the child: but after it pitied him againe, becauſe the child ſeemed like an humble ſuter that came to ſeek ſanctuarie in his armes. Other ſay, that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto the altar of the familiar gods, alongſt the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods prouidence, preſently deliuered the child to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed her to ſee him brought vp with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies ſent to demaund the child of him: and moreouer, Caſſander cauſed two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer the child Pyrrus into his hands. Howbeit Glaucias would neuer graunt thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was come to twelue yeares old, brought him into his countrey of EPIRVS with an armie, and ſtabliſhed him king of the realme againe. Pyrrus had a great maieſtie in his countenance, but yet indeed more fearefull then friendly. He had alſo no teeth in his vpper iaw that ſtood diſtinctly one from another, but one whole bone throughout his gumme, marked a litle at the top onely, with certaine rifts in the place where the teeth ſhould be deuided. Men held opinion alſo, that he did heale them that were ſicke of the ſpleene, by ſacrificing a white cocke, and touching the place of the ſpleene on the left ſide of them that were ſicke, ſoftly with his right foote, they lying on their backes: and there was not ſo poore nor ſimple a man that craued this remedy of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he ſacrificed, for reward of the remedie, which pleaſed him very well. They ſay alſo, that the great toe of his right foote had ſome ſecret vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they burnt his bodie, all the reſt being conſumed to aſhes, his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all: but of that, we will write more hereafter. Now, when he was ſeuenteene yeares of age, thinking himſelfe ſure inough of his kingdome, it chanced him to make a iourney into ILLYRIA, where he maried one of Glaucias daughters, with whom he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no ſooner turned, but the MOLOSSIANS rebelled againe againſt him, and draue out his friends and ſeruants, and deſtroyed all his goods, and yeelded themſelues vnto his aduerſarie Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus hauing thus loſt his kingdome, and ſeeing himſelfe forſaken on all ſides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus ſonne) that had maried his ſiſter Deidamia, who in her yong age was aſſured to Alexander the ſonne of Alexander the great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked end, Demetrius then maried her, being come to full and able age. And in that great battell which was ſtricken neare to the city of HIPSVS, where all the kings fought together, Pyrrus being then but a yong man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthily reputed for the valianteſt prince amongſt them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had loſt the battell, Pyrrus neuer forſooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of GREECE, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was ſent an hoſtage for Demetrius into the realme of ÆGYPT: where he made Ptolomie know (both in hunting and in other exerciſes of his perſon) that he was very ſtrong, hard, and able to endure any labour. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice amongſt all king Ptolomies wiues, was beſt beloued and eſteemed of her husband, both for her vertue and wiſedome, he began to entertaine and honour her aboue all the reſt. For he was a man that could tell how to humble himſelfe towards the great (by whom he might win benefit) and knew alſo how to creepe into their credit: and in like maner was he a great ſcorner and deſpiſer of ſuch as were his inferiours. Moreouer, for that he was found maruellous honorable and of faire condition, he was preferred before all other yong princes, to be the husband of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom ſhe had by Philip, before ſhe was maried vnto Ptolomie. From thenceforth growing through the alliance of that mariage, more and more in eſtimation and fauour by meanes of his wife Antigona, who ſhewed her ſelfe very vertuous and louing towards him: he found meanes in the end, to get both men and money to returne againe into the realme of EPIRVS, and to conquer it: ſo was he then very well receiued of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, becauſe he dealt both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithſtanding, Pyrrus fearing leaſt Neoptolemus would repaire vnto ſome of the other kings, to ſeeke aide againſt him, thought good to make peace with him. Whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that they ſhould both together be kings of EPIRVS. But in proceſſe of time, ſome of their men ſecretly made ſtrife againe betweene them, and ſet them at defiance one with another: and the chiefeſt cauſe as it is ſayd, that angred Pyrrus moſt, grew vpon this: The kings of EPIRVS had an ancient cuſtome of great antiquitie, after they had made ſolemne ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Martiall, in a certaine place in the prouince of MOLOSSIDE, called PASSARON) to take their oath, and to be ſworne to the EPIROTS, that they would raigne well and iuſtly, according to the lawes and ordinances of the countrey: and to receiue the ſubiects oaths interchangeably alſo, that they ſhould defend and maintaine them in their kingdome, according to the lawes in like manner. This ceremony was done in the preſence of both the kings, and they with their friends did both giue and receiue preſents each of other. At this meeting and ſolemnity, among other, one Gelon a moſt faithfull ſeruant and aſſured friend vnto Neoptolemus, who beſides great ſhewes of friendſhip and honour he did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two paire of draught oxen, which one Myrtilus a cup-bearer of Pyrrus being preſent, and ſeeing, did craue of his maiſter. But Pyrrus denyed to giue them vnto him, whereat Myrtilus was verie angrie. Gelon perceiuing that Myrtilus was angrie, prayed him to ſup with him that night. Now ſome ſay, he ſought to abuſe Myrtilus, becauſe he was faire and young: and beganne to perſwade him after ſupper to take part with Neoptolemus, and to poyſon Pyrrus. Myrtilus made as though he was willing to giue eare to this perſwaſion, and to be well pleaſed withall. But in the meane time, he went and told his maiſter of it, by whoſe commaundement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe cup-bearer, to talke with Gelon about this practiſe, as though he had alſo giuen his conſent to it, and was willing to be partaker of the enterpriſe. This did Pyrrus to haue two witneſſes, to proue the pretended poyſoning of him. Thus Gelon being finely deceiued, and Neoptolemus alſo with him, both imagining they had cunningly ſpunne the threed of their treaſon: Neoptolemus was ſo glad of it, that he could not keepe it to himſelfe, but told it to certaine of his friends. And on a time going to be merrie with his ſiſter, he could not keepe it in, but muſt be pratling of it to her, ſuppoſing no bodie had heard him but her ſelfe, becauſe there was no liuing creature neare them, ſauing Phænareta Samons wife, the kings chiefe heardman of all his beaſts, and yet ſhe was layd vpon a litle bed by, and turned towards the wall: ſo that ſhe ſeemed as though ſhe had ſlept. But hauing heard all their talke, and no bodie miſtruſting her: the next morning ſhe went to Antigona king Pyrrus wife, and told her euery word what ſhe

Pyrrus reſtored to his kingdome againe.

Pyrrus deuideth the realme of Epirus with Neoptolemus.

ſhe had heard Neoptolemus ſay to his ſiſter. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time: but hauing made ſacrifice vnto the gods, he bad Neoptolemus to ſupper to his houſe, where he ſlue him, being well informed before of the goodwill the chiefeſt men of the realme did beare him, who wiſhed him to diſpatch Neoptolemus, and not to content himſelfe with a peece of EPIRVS only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cauſe, this ſuſpition alſo falling out in the meane while, he preuented Neoptolemus, and ſlue him firſt. And furthermore, remembring the pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomy and Berenice, he named his firſt ſonne by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and hauing built a city in the PRESQVE, an Ile of EPIRVS, did name it BERENICIDA. When he had done that, imagining great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he firſt determined with himſelfe how to winne that which lay neareſt vnto him: and ſo tooke occaſion by this meanes, firſt to ſet foote into the Empire of MACEDON. The eldeſt ſonne of Caſſander, called Antipater, put his owne mother Theſſalonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out of his owne countrey, who ſent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus alſo to his aide. Demetrius being troubled with other matters, could not ſo quickly go thither. And Pyrrus being arriued there, demaunded for his charge ſuſtained, the city of NYMPHÆA, with all the ſea coaſts of MACEDON: and beſides all that, certaine lands alſo that were not belonging to the auncient crowne and reuenues of the kings of MACEDON, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All theſe, the yong king Alexander leauing vnto him, he tooke poſſeſſion thereof, and put good garriſons into the ſame in his owne name: & conquering the reſt of MACEDON in the name of Alexander, put his brother Antipater to great diſtreſſe. In the meane time king Lyſimachus lacking no goodwill to helpe Antipater with his force, but being buſied in other matters, had not the meane to do it. Howbeit knowing very wel that Pyrrus in acknowledging the great pleaſures he had receiued of Ptolomie, would denie him nothing: he determined to write counterfeit letters to him in Ptolomies name, & thereby inſtantly to pray and require him to leaue off the warres begun againſt Antipater, and to take of him towards the defraying of his charges, the ſum of three hundred talents. Pyrrus opening the letters, knew ſtraight that this was but a fetch and deuice of Lyſimachus. For king Ptolomies common maner of greeting of him, which he vſed at the beginning of his letters, was not in them obſerued: To my ſon Pyrrus, health. But in thoſe counterfeit was, king Ptolomie, vnto king Pyrrus, health. Whereupon he preſently pronounced Lyſimachus for a naughty man: neuertheleſſe, afterwards he made peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be ſworne vpon the ſacrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three beaſts brought to be ſacrificed, a goate, a bull, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of himſelfe before he was touched, whereat all the ſtanders by fell a laughing. But there was a Soothſayer, one Theodotus, that perſwaded Pyrrus not to ſweare: ſaying, that this ſigne and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kings with ſudden death. For which cauſe Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres being ended, Demetrius notwithſtanding came to him, knowing well inough at his comming that Alexander had no more need of his aide, and that he did it onely but to feare him. They had not bene many daies together, but the one began to miſtruſt the other, and to ſpie all the wayes they could to intrap each other: but Demetrius embracing the firſt occaſion offered, preuented Alexander, and ſlue him, being a yong man, and proclaimed himſelfe king of MACEDON in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrels before againſt Pyrrus, becauſe he had ouerrun the countrey of THESSALIE: and furthermore, greedy couetouſneſſe to haue the more (which is a common vice with princes and noble men) made, that being ſo neare neighbours, the one ſtood in feare and miſtruſt of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betweene them, and were to make diuiſion of one ſelfe kingdome: now I ſay began the matter and occaſion of quarrell to grow the greater betweene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his army to ſet vpon the ÆTOLIANS, and hauing conquered the countrey, left Pantauchus his Lieutenant there with a great army: and himſelfe in perſon in the meane time, marched againſt Pyrrus, and Pyrrus on the other ſide againſt him. They both miſſed of meeting, & Demetrius going on further on the one ſide, entred into the realme of EPIRVS, & brought a great ſpoile away with him: Pyrrus on the other ſide marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gaue battel, & it was valiantly fought out betweene the ſoldiers of either partie, but ſpecially betweene the two Generals. For doubtleſſe, Pantauchus was the valianteſt captaine, the ſtouteſt man, and of the greateſt experience in armes, of all the captaines and ſouldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon, Pantauchus truſting in his ſtrength and courage, aduanced himſelfe forwards, and luſtily chalenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other ſide being inferiour to no king in valiantneſſe, nor in deſire to win honour, as he that would aſcribe vnto himſelfe the glorie of Achilles, more for the imitation of his valiancie, then for that he was deſcended of his bloud: paſſed through the middeſt of the battell vnto the firſt ranke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they began to charge one another, firſt with their darts, and then comming nearer, fought with their ſwords, not only artificially, but alſo with great force and furie: vntill ſuch time as Pyrrus was hurt in one place, and he hurt Pantauchus in two. The one neare vnto his throte, and the other in his leg: ſo as in the end Pyrrus made him turne his backe, and threw him to the ground, but neuertheleſſe killed him not. For, ſo ſoone as he was downe, his men tooke him, and caried him away. But the EPIROTS encouraged by the victorie of their king, and the admiration of his valiantneſſe, ſtucke to it ſo luſtily, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footmen: and hauing put them to flight, followed them ſo liuely, that they ſlue a great number of them, and tooke fiue thouſand priſoners. This ouerthrow did not ſo much fill the hearts of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the loſſe they had receiued, nor with the hate conceiued againſt Pyrrus: as it wan Pyrrus great fame and honour, making his courage and valiantneſſe to be wondred at of all ſuch as were preſent at the battell that ſaw him fight, and how he layd about him. For they thought that they ſaw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the great, and the right ſhadow as it were, ſhewing the force and furie of Alexander himſelfe in that fight. And where other kings did but only counterfeit Alexander the great in his purple garments, and in numbers of ſouldiers and gards about their perſons, and in a certaine faſhion and bowing of their neckes a litle, and in vttering their ſpeech with an high voice: Pyrrus only was like vnto him, and followed him in his marſhall deeds and valiant acts. Furthermore, for his experience and skill in warlike diſcipline, the bookes he wrote himſelfe thereof, do amply proue and make manifeſt. Furthermore, they report, that king Antigonus being asked, whom he thought to be the greateſt Captaine: made anſwer, Pyrrus, ſo farre forth as he might liue to be old, ſpeaking onely of the captaines of his time. But Hanniball generally ſaid, Pyrrus was the greateſt captaine of experience and skill in warres of all other, Scipio the ſecond, and himſelfe the third: as we haue written in the life of Scipio. So it ſeemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and ſtudie to the diſcipline of warres, as that which indeed was princely and meete for a king, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feaſt one day, a queſtion was asked him, whom he thought to be the beſt player of the flute, Python or Cepheſias: whereunto he anſwered, that Polyperchon in his opinion was the beſt captaine, as if he would haue ſayd, that was the only thing a prince ſhould ſeeke for, and which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle and familiar with his friends, eaſie to forgiue when any had offended him, and maruellous deſirous to requite and acknowledge any curteſie or pleaſure by him receiued. And that was the cauſe why he did verie vnpatiently take the death of Æropus, not ſo much for his death (which he knew was a common thing to euerie liuing creature) as for that he was angrie with himſelfe he had deferred the time ſo long, that time it ſelfe had cut him off from all occaſion and meanes to requite the curteſies he had receiued of him. True it is that money lent may be repaied againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it gricueth an honeſt nature, when he cannot recompence the goodwill of the lender, of whom he hath receiued the good turne. Another time Pyrrus being in the city of AMBRACIA, there were certaine of his friends that gaue him counſell to put a naughty man out of the city, that did nothing but ſpeake ill of him. But he anſwered: It is better (quoth he) to keepe him here ſtill, ſpeaking ill of vs but to a few, then driuing him away, to make him ſpeake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youths were brought before him on a time, who making merrie together, drinking freely, were bold with the king to ſpeake their pleaſure of him in very vndutifull ſort. So, Pyrrus asking them whether it was true they ſaid ſo, or no: it is true, and it pleaſe your grace, ſayd one of them, we ſayd it indeed, and had not our wine failed vs, we had ſpoken a great deale more. The king laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, he maried many wiues to increaſe his power withall, and to get moe friends. For he maried the daughter of Autoleon king of PÆONIA, and Bircenna the daughter of Bardillis, king of ILLYRIA, and Lanaſſa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of SYRACVSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHVE, which her father had taken.

By Antigona his firſt wife, he had a ſonne called Ptolomie: by Lanaſſa, another called Alexander: and by Bircenna, another (the yongeſt of all) called Helenus: all which though they were martiall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in warres, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradle. They write, that one of his ſonnes being but a boy, aſked him one day to which of them he would leaue his kingdome: Pyrrus anſwered the boy, to him that hath the ſharpeſt ſword. That was much like the tragicall curſe wherewith Oedipus curſed his children:

Let them (for me) deuide, both goods, yea rents and land:
With trenchant ſword, and bloudy blowes, by force of mighty hand.

So cruell, hatefull, and beaſtly is the nature of ambition and deſire of rule. But after this battell, Pyrrus returned home againe to his countrey, full of honour and glorie, his hart highly exalted, and his mind throughly contented. And as at his returne the EPIROTS his ſubiects called him an Eagle, he anſwered them: if I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am ſo, for your weapons are the wings that haue raiſed me vp. Shortly after, being aduertiſed that Demetrius was fallen ſicke, and in great danger of death, he ſuddenly went into MACEDON, onely to inuade it, and to make prey thereof: howbeit he had indeed almoſt taken the whole realme, and made himſelfe Lord of all without ſtroke ſtriken. For he came as farre as the city of EDESSA, and found no reſiſtance: but rather to the contrarie, many of the country willingly came to his campe, and ſubmitted themſelues. The danger Demetrius was in to looſe his realme, did moue him more, then the diſeaſe and ſickneſſe of his body. And on the other ſide, his friends, ſeruants, and captaines, hauing gathered a great number of men of warre together in a maruellous ſhort time, marched with great ſpeed towards Pyrrus, being earneſtly bent to do ſome exploite againſt him: who being come into MACEDON but to make a roade onely vpon them, would not tarie them, but fled, and flying, loſt part of his men, becauſe the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, and ſet vpon him by the way. But now, though they had driuen Pyrrus thus eaſily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for all that did not make light account of him: but pretending greater things (as to recouer the lands and dominions of his father, with an armie of an hundred thouſand fighting men, and of fiue hundred ſaile which he put to the ſea) would not ſtand to make warres againſt Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS (whileſt he was abſent) ſo dangerous a neighbor, and ſo ill to deale withall. But lacking leiſure to make warres with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the end he might with the more libertie ſet vpon the other kings. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius and Pyrrus, the other kings and princes began to find out Demetrius intent, and why he had made ſo great preparation: and being affraid thereof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambaſſadours, that they wondred how he could let go ſuch oportunity and occaſion, and to tary till Demetrius might with better leiſure make warres vpon him. And why he choſe rather to tary and fight with him for the altars, temples, and ſepulchers of the MOLOSSIANS, when he ſhould be of greater power, and haue no warres elſewhere to trouble him: then now that he might eaſily driue him out of MACEDON, hauing ſo many things in hand, & being troubled as he was in other places. And conſidering alſo that very lately he had taken one of his wiues from him, with the city of CORPHVE. For Lanaſſa miſliking, that Pyrrus loued his other wiues better then her (they being of a barbarous nation) got her vnto CORPHVE: and deſiring to marie ſome other king, ſent for Demetrius, knowing that he of al other kings would ſooneſt be wonne thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither, and maried her, and left a garriſon in his city of CORPHVE. Now theſe other kings that did aduertiſe Pyrrus in this ſort, themſelues did trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, and yet went on with his preparation notwithſtanding. For on the one ſide Ptolomy entred GREECE with a great armie by ſea, where he cauſed the cities to reuolt againſt him: and Lyſimachus on the other ſide alſo, entring into high MACEDON by the countrey of THRACIA, burnt and ſpoiled all as he went. Pyrrus alſo arming himſelfe with them, went vnto the city of BERROEA, imagining (as afterwards it fell out) that Demetrius going againſt Lyſimachus, would leaue all the low countrey of MACEDON naked, without garriſon or defence. And the ſelfe ſame night that Pyrrus departed, he imagined that king Alexander the great did call him, and alſo that he went vnto him, and found him ſicke in his bed, of whom he had very good words and entertainement: in ſo much as he promiſed to helpe him throughly. And Pyrrus imagined alſo that he was ſo bold to demaund of him againe: How (my Lord) can you helpe me, that lie ſicke in your bed? & that Alexander made anſwer: with my name only. And that moreouer he ſuddenly therewithall got vp on his horſe Niſea, and rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This viſion he had in his dreame, which made him bold, and furthermore encouraged him to go on with his enterpriſe. By which occaſion, marching forward with all ſpeed, in few dayes he ended his intended iourney to the citie of BERROEA, which ſuddenly he tooke at his firſt comming to it: the moſt part of his armie he layed in garriſon there, the reſidue he ſent away vnder the conduct of his captaines, here and there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius hauing intelligence hereof, and hearing alſo an ill rumour that ran in his campe amongſt the MACEDONIANS, durſt not leade them any further, for feare leaſt (when he ſhould come neere to Lyſimachus being a MACEDONIAN king by nation, and a prince eſteemed for a famous captaine) they would ſhrinke from him, and take Lyſimachus part: for this cauſe therfore he turned againe vpon the ſudden againſt Pyrrus, as againſt a ſtrange prince, and ill beloued of the MACEDONIANS. But when he came to encampe neare him, many coming from BERROEA into his campe, blew abroad the praiſes of Pyrrus, ſaying, that he was a noble prince, inuincible in wars, and one that curteouſly intreated all thoſe he tooke to his party: and amongſt thoſe, there were other that were no naturall MACEDONIANS borne, but ſet on by Pyrrus, and fained themſelues to be MACEDONIANS, who gaue out, that now occaſion was offered to ſet them at liberty, from Demetrius proud and ſtately rule, and to take king Pyrrus part, that was a curteous prince, and one that loued ſouldiers and men of warre. Theſe words made the moſt part of Demetrius army very doubtfull, in ſo much as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to ſee if they could find out Pyrrus to yeeld themſelues vnto him. He had at that preſent left off his head-peece: by meane whereof, perceiuing he was not knowne, he put it on againe, and then they knew him a far off, by the ſight of his goodly faire plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the top of his creaſt. Whereupon there came a great number of MACEDONIANS to his part, as vnto their ſoueraigne lord and king, & required the watchword of him. Other put garlands of oken boughs about their heads, becauſe they ſaw his men crowned after that ſort. And ſome were ſo bold alſo, as to go to Demetrius himſelfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he ſhould do very well and wiſely to giue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, ſeeing his campe in ſuch vprore, was ſo amazed, that he knew not what way to take, but ſtole away ſecretly, diſguiſed in a thred-bare cloake, and a hood on his head to keepe him from knowledge. Pyrrus forthwith ſeazed vpon his campe, tooke all that he found, and was preſently proclaimed in the field, king of MACEDON. Lyſimachus on the other ſide, came ſtraight thither after him, and ſayd that he had holpen to chaſe Demetrius out of his realme, and therefore claimed halfe the kingdome with him. Wherefore, Pyrrus not truſting the MACEDONIANS too farre as yet, but rather ſtanding in doubt of their faith: graunted Lyſimachus his deſire, and thereupon deuided all the cities and prouinces of the realme of MACEDON betweene them. This partition was profitable for them both at that preſent, and ſtood then to good purpoſe to pacifie the warre, that otherwiſe might ſuddenly haue riſen betweene them. But ſhortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and diſſention betweene them. For they whoſe auarice and inſatiable greedy appetite, neither the ſea, the mountaines, nor the vnhabitable deſerts could containe, nor yet the confines that ſeparate ASIA from EVROPE determine: how ſhould they be content with their owne, without vſurping others, when their frontiers ioyne ſo neere together, that nothing deuides them? Sure it is not poſſible. For to ſay truly, they are willingly together by the eares, hauing theſe two curſed things rooted in them: that they continually ſeeke occaſion how to ſurpriſe each other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in apparance they vſe theſe two termes of peace and warres, as they do money: vſing it as they thinke good, not according to right and iuſtice, but for their priuate profit. And truly they are men of far greater honeſty, that make open war, and auow it: then thoſe that diſguiſe and colour the delay of their wicked purpoſe, by the holy name of iuſtice or friendſhip. Which Pyrrus did truly then verifie. For deſiring to keepe Demetrius downe from riſing another time, and that he ſhould not reuiue againe, as eſcaped from a long dangerous diſeaſe: he went to aide the GRECIANS againſt him, and was at ATHENS, where they ſuffered him to come into the caſtle, and do ſacrifice there vnto the goddeſſe Minerua. But comming out of the caſtle againe the ſame day, he told the ATHENIANS he was greatly beholding vnto them for their curteſie, and the great truſt they had repoſed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counſell, neuer to ſuffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their city, if they

they were wise, nor once open their gates vnto them. So, after that he had made peace with Demetrius, who within short time being gone to make warres in ASIA, Pyrrus yet once againe (perswaded thereunto by Lysimachus) caused all THESSALY to rise against him, & went himselfe to set vpon those garrisons which Demetrius had left in the cities of GREECE, liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in war, then to leaue them in peace: besides that, himselfe also was of such a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Demetrius thus in the end being vtterly ouerthrowne in SYRIA, Lysimachus seeing himselfe free from feare on that side, and being at good leisure, as hauing nothing to trouble him otherwaies: went straight to make warre vpon Pyrrus, who then remained neare vnto the city of EDESSA, and meeting by the way with the conuoy of victuals comming towards him, set vpon the conducters, and rifled them wholly. By this meanes, first he distressed Pyrrus for want of victuals: then he corrupted the princes of MACEDON with letters and messengers, declaring vnto them, what shame they sustained to haue made a stranger their king (whose ancestors had euer bin their vassals & subiects) and to haue turned all those out of MACEDON, that had bene familiar friends of king Alexander the great. Many of the MACEDONIANS were won by these perswasions: which fact so feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPIROTS, and other his confederates: and so lost MACEDON by the selfe same meanes he wan it. Kings and princes therefore must not blame priuate men, though they change and alter sometime for their profit: for therein they do but follow the example of princes, who teach them all disloyaltie, treason, and infidelity, iudging him most worthie of gaine, that least obserueth iustice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdome of EPIRVS, forsaking MACEDON altogether, fortune made him happy inough, and indeed he had good meanes to liue peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could haue contented himselfe only with the soueragnty ouer his owne naturall subiects. But thinking, that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to spend his time, and by peace he should pine away for sorow, as Homer sayd of Achilles:

He languished and pin'd by taking ease and rest:
And in the warres where trauell was, he liked euer best.

Lysimachus maketh warre with Pyrrus.

And thus seeking matter of new trouble, fortune presented him this occasion. About this time, the ROMAINES by chance made warre with the TARENTINES, who could neither beare their force, nor yet deuise how to pacifie the same, by reason of the rashnesse, folly, and wickednesse of their gouernors, who perswaded them to make Pyrrus their Generall, and to send for him for to conduct these warres: because he was lesse troubled at that time, then any of the other kings about them, and was esteemed of euery man also to be a noble souldier, and famous captaine. The elders and wise men of the city, vtterly misliked that counsell: but some of them were put to silence, through the noise and furie of the people, who cried for warres. Some other seeing them checked, and taken vp by the multitude in this maner, would no more repaire to their common assemblies. Among the rest, there was one Meton, an honest worshipfull citizen, who when the day was come that the people should conclude in counsell, the decree for the calling in of Pyrrus: all the people of TARENTVM being assembled, and set in the Theater, this Meton put an old withered garland of flowers vpon his head, and carying a torch in his hand as though he had bin drunke, and hauing a woman minstrell before him playing on a pipe, went dancing in this goodly aray through the middest of the whole assembly. And there (as it happeneth commonly in euerie hurly burly of people that will be maisters themselues, and where no good order is kept) some of them clapped their hands, other burst out in a laughter, and euery man suffered him to do what he lust: but they all cried out to the woman minstrell, to play on and spare not, and to Meton himselfe, that he should sing, and come forward. So Meton made shew as though he prepared himself vnto it: and when they had giuen silence to heare him sing, he spake vnto them with a loud voice in this maner: My Lords of TARENTVM, ye do well sure, not to forbid them to play and to be merry that are so disposed, whilest they may lawfully do it: and if ye be wise, euerie of you also (as many as you be) will take your liberty whilest you may enioy it. For when king Pyrrus shall be in this city, you shall liue I warrant you after another sort, and not as ye now do. These words of Meton moued many of the TARENTINES, and suddenly there ran a rumor through all the assembly, that he had sayd truly. But they that had offended the ROMAINES, fearing if peace were made, that they should be deliuered into their hands, they checked the people, asking them if they were such fooles, as would abide to be mocked and played withall to their teeth: and with those words all ranne vpon Meton and draue him out of the Theater. The decree thus confirmed by voices of the people, they sent Ambassadours into EPIRVS, to cary presents vnto king Pyrrus, not only from the TARENTINES, but from other GRECIANS also that dwelt in ITALY, saying that they stood in need of a wise and skilfull captaine, that was reputed famous in martiall discipline. And as to the rest, for numbers of good souldiers, they had men inough in ITALY, and were able to bring an army into the field, of the LVCANIANS, the MESSAPIANS, the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, of twenty thousand horse, and three hundred thousand footemen being all assembled together. These words of the Ambassadours did not only lift vp Pyrrus hart, but made the EPIROTS also maruellous desirous to go this iourney. There was in king Pyrrus court one Cineas THESSALIAN, a man of great vnderstanding, and that had bene Demosthenes the orators scholler, who seemed to be the only man of all other in his time in common reputation, to be most elequent, following the liuely image and shadow of Demosthenes passing eloquence. This Cineas, Pyrrus euer entertained about him, and sent him Ambassador to the people and cities thereabouts: where he verified Euripides words:

As much as trenchant blades, in mighty hand may do,
So much can skill of eloquence, atchieue and conquer to.

And therfore Pyrrus would often say, that Cineas had won him moe townes with his eloquence, then he himselfe had done by the sword: for which he did greatly honor & imploy him in all his chiefe affaires. Cineas perceiuing that Pyrrus was maruellously bent to these wars of ITALY, finding him one day at leisure, discoursed with him in this sort: It is reported, and it please your maiestie, that the ROMAINES are very good men of war, and that they command many valiant and warlike nations: if it please the gods we do ouercome them, what benefit shall we haue of that victory? Pyrrus answered him againe, thou doest aske me a question that is manifest of it selfe: for when we haue once ouercome the ROMAINES, there can neither GRECIAN nor barbarous city in all the countrey withstand vs, but we shall straight conquer all the rest of ITALY with ease: whose greatnesse, wealth, and power, no man knoweth better then my selfe. Cineas pawsing a while, replied: and when we haue taken ITALY, what shall we do then? Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, sayd vnto him: SICILIA as thou knowest is hard adioyning to it, & doth as it were offer it selfe vnto vs, and is a maruellous populous and rich land, and easie to be taken: for all the cities within the Iland are one against another, hauing no head that gouernes them since Agathocles died, more then orators only that are their counsellors, who will soone be won. Indeed it is likely which your grace speaketh, quoth Cineas: but when we haue won SICILIA, shall then our wars take end? If the gods were pleased, sayd Pyrrus, that victorie were atchieued, the way were then broad open for vs to attaine great conquests. For who would not afterwards go into AFRICKE, and so to CARTHAGE, which also will be an easie conquest, since Agathocles secretly flying from SYRACVSA, and hauing passed the seas with a few ships, had almost taken it? And that once conquered, it is most certaine there durst not one of all our enemies that now do daily vexe and trouble vs, lift vp their heads or hands against vs. No surely, sayd Cineas: for it is a cleare case, that with so great a power we may easily recouer the realme of MACEDON againe, and command all GRECE besides, without let of any. But when we haue all in our hands, what shall we do in the end? Then Pyrrus laughing, told him againe: we will then (good Cineas) be quiet, and take our ease, and make feasts euery day, and be as merry one with another as we can possible. Cineas hauing brought him to that point, sayd againe to him: My Lord, what letteth vs now to be quiet, and merry together, sith we enioy that presently without further trauell & trouble, which we wil now go seeke for abroad, with such shedding of bloud, & so manifest danger? and yet we know not whether euer we shall attaine vnto it, after we haue both suffered, and caused other to suffer infinite sorowes and troubles. These last words of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his mind: for he was not ignorant of the happy state he should thereby forgo, yet could he not leaue off the hope of that he did so much desire. So he sent Cineas before vnto the TARENTINES, with three thousand footemen: and afterwards the TARENTINES hauing sent him great store of flatbottomes, gallies, and of all sorts of passengers, he shipped into them twentie Elephants, three thousand horsemen, and two and twenty thousand footemen, with fiue hundred bowmen and slings. All which thus readie, he wayed ankers, and hoised sailes, and was no sooner in the maine sea, but the North wind blew very roughly, out of season, and draue him to leeward. Notwithstanding, the ship which he was in himselfe, by great toil:

toile of the pilots and mariners turning to windward, and with much ado, and maruellous danger recouered the coaſt of ITALIE. Howbeit the reſt of his fleete were violently diſperſed here and there, whereof ſome of them failing in their courſe to ITALY, were caſt into the ſeas of LYBIA, and SICILIA. The other not able to recouer the point of APVLIA, were benighted, and the ſea being high wrought, by violence caſt them vpon the ſhore, and againſt the rockes, and made ſhipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely reſerued, which through her ſtrength, and the greatneſſe of her burthen, reſiſted the force of the ſea that moſt violently beat againſt her. But afwards, the wind turning and comming from the land, the ſea cruelly raking ouer the height of her forecaſtell, in fine brought her in manifeſt perill of opening, and ſplitting, and in danger to be driuen from the coaſt, putting her out againe to the mercie of the winds, which chaunged euerie hower. Wherefore Pyrrus caſting the perill euerie way, thought beſt to leape into the ſea. After him foorthwith leapt his gard, his ſeruants, and other his familiar friends, venturing their liues to ſaue him. But the darkneſſe of the night, and rage of the waues (which the ſhore breaking, forced ſo to rebound backe vpon them) with the great noiſe alſo, did ſo hinder their ſwimming, that it was euen day before they could recouer any land, and yet was it by meanes that the wind fell. As for Pyrrus, he was ſo ſea beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more: though of himſelfe he had ſo great a heart, and ſtout a courage, as was able to ouercome any perill. Moreouer, the MESSAPIANS (vpon whoſe coaſt the ſtorme had caſt him) ran out to helpe him, and diligently laboured in all they could poſſible to ſaue him, and receiued alſo certaine of his ſhips that had ſcaped, in which were a few horſemen, about two thouſand footemen, and two Elephants. With this ſmall force, Pyrrus marched on his iourney to go by land vnto TARENTVM: and Cineas being aduertiſed of his coming, went with his men to meete him. Now when he was come to TARENTVM, at the firſt he would do nothing by force, nor againſt the goodwill of the inhabitants: vntill ſuch time as his ſhips that had eſcaped the dangers of the ſea, were all arriued, and the greateſt part of his army come together againe. But when he had all his army he looked for, ſeeing that the people of TARENTVM could neither ſaue themſelues, nor be ſaued by any other, without ſtraight order and compulſion, becauſe they made their reckoning that Pyrrus ſhould fight for them, and in the meane time they would not ſtirre out of their houſes from bathing themſelues, from banqueting, and making good cheere: firſt of all he cauſed all the parkes and places of ſhew to be ſhut vp, where they were wont to walke and diſport themſelues, in any kind of exerciſe, & as they walked to talke of wars as it were in paſtime, and to fight with words, but not to come to the blows. And further he forbad all feaſtings, mummeries, and ſuch other like pleaſures, as at that time were out of ſeaſon. He trained them out alſo to exerciſe their weapons, and ſhewed himſelfe very ſeuere in muſters, not pardoning any whoſe names were billed to ſerue in the warres: inſomuch as there were many (which vnacquainted with ſuch rough handling and gouernment) forſooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue libertie to liue at their pleaſure. Furthermore, Pyrrus hauing intelligence that Leuinus the ROMAINE Conſull came againſt him with a great puiſſant army, and that he was already entred into the land of LVCANIA, where he deſtroyed and ſpoiled all the countrey before him: albeit the TARENTINES aide of their confederates, was not as yet come, he thought it a great ſhame to ſuffer his enemies approch ſo neare him, & therfore taking that ſmall number he had, brought them into the field againſt Leuinus. Howbeit he ſent an Herauld before to the ROMAINES, to vnderſtand of them, if (before they entred into this war) they could be content the controuerſies they had with all the GRECIANS dwelling in ITALY, might be decided by iuſtice, and therein to refer themſelues to his arbiterment, who of himſelfe wold vndertake the pacification of them. Whereunto the Conſull Leuinus made anſwer, that the ROMAINES would neuer allow him for a Iudge, neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherfore Pyrrus going on ſtill, came to lodge in the plaine which is betweene the cities of PANDOSIA, and of HERACLEA: & hauing newes brought him that the ROMAINES were encamped very neare vnto him on the other ſide of the riuer of SIRIS, he tooke his horſe, and rode to the riuers ſide to view their campe. So hauing throughly conſidered the forme, the ſituation, and the order of the ſame, the manner of charging their watch, and all their faſhions of doing: he wondered much thereat. And ſpeaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he ſayd: this order Megacles (quoth he) though it be of barbarous people, yet is it not barbarouſly done, but we ſhall ſhortly proue their force. After he had thus taken his view, he began to be more carefull then he was before, and purpoſed to tarie till the whole aide of their confederates were come together, leauing men at the riuers side of SIRIS, to keepe the passage, if the enemies ventured to passe ouer, as they did indeed. For they made hast to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, and passed their footmen ouer vpon a bridge, and their horsemen at diuerse fords of the riuer: insomuch as the GRECIANS fearing least they should be compassed in behind, drew backe. Pyrrus aduertised thereof, and being a litle troubled therewithall, commaunded the captaines of his footemen presently to put their bands in battell ray, and not to stirre till they knew his pleasure: and he himselfe in the meane time marched on with three thousand horse, in hope to find the ROMAINES by the riuer side, as yet out of order, and vtterly vnprouided. But when he saw a farre off a great number of footemen with their targets ranged in battell, on this side the riuer, and their horsemen marching towards him in verie good order: he causèd his men to ioyne close together, and himselfe first began the charge, being easie to be knowne from other, if it had bene no more but his passing rich glistering armour and furniture, and withall, for that his valiant deedes gaue manifest proofe of his well deserning fame and renowne. For, though he valiantly bestirred his hands and bodie both, repulsing them he encountred withall in fight, yet he forgate not himselfe, nor neglected the iudgement and foresight, which should neuer be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and discreetly gaue order for euery thing, riding to & fro, to defend and encourage his men in those places, where he saw them in most distresse. But euen in the hottest of the battell, Leonatus MACEDONIAN spied an ITALIAN a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vp and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hand with him, to set vpon him. Wherfore he sayd to Pyrrus: My Lord, do you not see that barbarous man there vpon a bay horse with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he meant to do some notable feate and mischiefe with his owne hands: for his eye is neuer off you, but waiteth only vpon you, being sharpe set to deale with your selfe and none other, and therefore take heed of him. Pyrrus answered him, It is impossible Leonatus, for a man to auoide his destiny: but neither he, nor any other ITALIAN whatsoeuer, shall haue any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talking thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his speare in the middest, and setting spurs to his horse, charged vpon Pyrrus, and ran his horse through and through with the same. Leonatus at the selfe same instant serued the ITAIIAN'S horse in the like maner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, saued him presently, and slue the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it out right valiantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, borne in the city of FERENTVM, and was captaine of a band of men of armes. This mischance made king Pyrrus looke the better to himselfe afterwards, and seeing his horsemen giue backe, sent presently to hasten his footemen forward, whom he straight set in order of battell: and deliuering his armour and cloake to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Megacles armor, returned againe to the battell against the ROMAINES, who valiantly resisted him, so that the victory depended long in doubt: for it is sayd, that both the one side and the other did chase, and was chased, aboue seuen times in that conflict. The changing of the kings armour serued verie well for the safety of his owne person, howbeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him loose the field. For many of his enemies set vpon Megacles, that ware the kings armor: and the partie that slue him dead, and threw him starke to the ground, was one Dexius by name, who quickly snatched off his head-peece, tooke away his cloake, & ran to Leuinus the Consull, crying out aloud, that he had slaine Pyrrus, and withall shewed forth the spoiles he supposed to haue taken from him. Which being caried about through all the bands, and openly shewed from hand to hand, made the ROMAINES marueilous ioyfull, and the GRECIANS on the contrary, both afeard and right sorowfull: vntill such time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed alongst all his bands bare headed, and bare faced, holding vp his hand to his souldiers, and giuing them to vnderstand with his owne voice, that it was himselfe. The Elephants in the end were they indeed that wanne the battell, and did most distresse the ROMAINES: for, their horses seeing them a farre off, were sore afraid, and durst not abide them, but caried their maisters backe in despite of them. Pyrrus at the sight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horsmen to giue charge vpon them whilest they were in this disorder, and that so lustily, as they made the ROMAINES flie, and sustaine great slaughter. For Dionysius writeth, that there died few lesse, then fifteene thousand ROMAINES at that battell. But Hieronymus speaketh onely of seuen thousand. And of Pyrrus side, Dionysius writeth, there were slaine thirteene thousand. But Hieronymus saith lesse then foure foure thousand: howbeit they were all of the best men of his army, and those whom he most trusted. King Pyrrus presently hereupon also tooke the ROMAINES campe, which they forsooke, & wan many of their cities from their alliance, spoiled, and ouercame much of their country. In so much as he came within sixe and thirtie mile of ROME, whither came to his aide, as confederates of the TARENTINES, the LVCANIANS, and the SAMNITES, whom he rebuked because they came too late to the battell. Howbeit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not a litle glad and proud to haue ouerthrowne so great an armie of the ROMAINES with his owne men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On the other side, the ROMAINES hearts were so great, that they would not depose Leuinus from his Consulship, notwithstanding the losse he had receiued: and Caius Fabricius sayd openly, that they were not the EPIROTS that had ouercome the ROMAINES, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuinus: meaning thereby, that this ouerthrow chaunced vnto them, more through the subtiltie and wise conduction of the Generall, then through the valiant feats and worthinesse of his armie. And hereupon they speedily supplied their legions againe that were diminished, with other new souldiers in the dead mens place, and leauied a fresh force besides, speaking brauely and fiercely of this warre, like men whose hearts were nothing appauled. Whereat Pyrrus maruelling much, thought good first to send to the ROMAINES, to proue if they would giue any eare to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the city of ROME was no easie matter to compasse or attaine, with that strength he presently had: and also that it would be greatly to his glorie, if he could bring them to peace after this his valiant victorie. And hereupon he sent Cineas to ROME, who spake with the chiefest of the citie, and offered presents to them and their wiues, in the behalfe of the king his maister. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receiue any at his hands, but answered all with one voice: that if the peace might be generall to all, they all priuatly would be at the kings commandement, and would be glad of his friendship. Moreouer, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor shewed any affection to giue eare vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their prisoners home againe without ransome, that had bene taken at the battell, and promised also to aide them in the conquest of ITALIE, requiring no other recompence at their hands, sauing their goodwils onely to his maister, and assurance for the TARENTINES, that they should not be annoyed for anie thing past, without demaund of other matter. Neuertheless in the end, when they had heard these offers, many of the Senators yeelded, and were willing to make peace: alledging that they had already lost a great battell, and how they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE should ioyne together with king Pyrrus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor dealt in matters of state at all by reason of his age, and partly because he was blind, when he vnderstood of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common bruite that ranne through the citie, how the Senate were in mind to agree to the capitulations of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but caused his seruants to carie him in his chaire vpon their armes vnto the Senate doore, his sonnes, and sonnes in law taking him in their armes, caried him into the Senate house. The Senate made silence to honour the comming in of so notable and worthie a personage: and he so soone as they had set him in his seate, began to speake in this sort: Hitherunto with great impatience (my Lords of ROME) haue I borne the losse of my sight, but now, I would I were also as deafe as I am blind, that I might not (as I do) heare the report of your dishonourable consultations determined vpon in Senate, which tend to supuert the glorious fame and reputation of ROME. What is now become of all your great and mightie bragges you blazed abroad through the whole world? That if Alexander the great himselfe had come into ITALIE, in the time that our fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not haue sayd euerie where that he was altogether inuincible, as now at this present they do: but either he should haue left his bodie slaine here in battell, or at the leastwise haue bene driuen to flie, and by his death or flying should greatly haue enlarged the renowme and glorie of ROME. You plainely shew it now, that all these words spoken then, were but vaine and arrogant vaunts of foolish pride: considering that you tremble for feare of the MOLOSSIANS and CHAONIANS, who were euer a pray to the MACEDONIANS: and that ye are afraid of Pyrrus also, who all his life time serued and followed one of the gard vnto Alexander the great, and now is come to make warres in these parts, not to aide the

to the Senate, euery one through the whole aſſembly, deſired rather warre then peace. They diſ-patched Cineas away thereupon with this anſwer, that if Pyrrus ſought the ROMAINES friendſhip, he muſt firſt depart out of ITALY, and then ſend vnto them to treate of peace: but ſo long as he remained there with his army, the ROMAINES would make warre vpon him, withall the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowne and ſlaine ten thouſand ſuch captaines as Leuinus was. They ſay that Cineas, during the time of his abode at ROME, intrea-ting for this peace, did curiouſly labour to conſider and vnderſtand the maners, order, and life of the ROMAINES, and their common weale, diſcourſing thereof with the chiefeſt men of the city:
and how afterwards he made ample report of the ſame vnto Pyrrus: and told him amongſt other the number of people) that he feared greatly they ſhould fight againſt ſuch a ſerpent, as that which was in old time in the mariſhes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut off one head, ſeuen other came vp in the place: becauſe the Conſul Leuinus had now leauied another army, twiſe as great as the firſt was, and had left at ROME alſo, many times as many good able men to carie armour. After this, there were ſent Ambaſſadors from ROME vnto Pyrrus, and amongſt other, Caius Fabricius, Ambaſſador to Pyrrus. Caius Fabricius touching the ſtate of priſoners. Cineas told the king his maiſter, that this Fabricius

feare him, becauſe he had neuer ſeene Elephant before, Pyrrus commanded his men, that when they ſaw Fabricius and him talking together, they ſhould bring one of his greateſt Elephants, and ſet him hard by them, behind a hanging: which being done at a certaine ſigne by Pyrrus gi-uen, ſuddenly the hanging was pulled backe, and the Elephant with his truncke was ouer Fabri-cius head, and gaue a terrible and fearefull crie. Fabricius ſoftly giuing backe, nothing afraid, laughed and ſayd to Pyrrus ſmiling: neither did your gold (oh king) yeſterday moue me, nor your Elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whileſt they were at ſupper, falling in talke of diuerſe matters, ſpecially touching the ſtate of GREECE, and the Philoſophers there: Cineas by gods and gouernment of the common wealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleaſure, how they fled from all office and publicke charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: how they maintained that the gods were immortall, neither moued with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of all pleaſures and delights, without taking any regard of mens doings. But as he ſtill continued this diſcourſe, Fabricius cried out aloud, and ſayd: the gods graunt that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of ſuch opinions, as long as they had warres a-gainſt vs. Pyrrus maruelling much at the conſtancie and magnanimity of this man, was more deſirous a great deale to haue peace with the ROMAINES, then before. And priuatly prayed Fabricius very earneſtly, that he would treate for peace, whereby he might afterwards come and re-maine with him, ſaying: that he would giue him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongſt all his friends. Whereunto Fabricius anſwered him ſoftly: that were not good (oh king) for your ſelfe, quoth he: for your men that preſently do honour and eſteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather chuſe me for their king, then your ſelfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whoſe words Pyrrus tooke not in ill part, neither was offended with them at all, as a tyrant wold haue bene: but did himſelfe report to his friends and familiars the noble mind he found in him,

and

and deliuered him vpon his faith onely, all the ROMAINE priſoners: to the end that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet ſee their friends, and keepe the feaſt of Saturne with them, and then to ſend them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate eſtabliſhed by decree, vpon paine of death to all ſuch as ſhould not performe the ſame accordingly. Afterwards Fabricius was choſen Conſull, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought him a letter from king Pyrrus Phiſition, written with his owne hands: in which the Phiſition offered to poyſon his maiſter, ſo he would promiſe him a good reward, for ending the warres without further danger. Fabricius deteſting the wickedneſſe of the Phiſition, and hauing made Q. Æmylius his colleague and fellow Conſull alſo to abhorre the ſame: wrote a letter vnto Pyrrus, and bad him take heed, for there were that meant to poyſon him. The contents of his letter were theſe: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Æmylius Conſuls of ROME, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (ô king) made vnfortunate choiſe, both of your friends and of your enemies, as ſhall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter which one of yours hath written vnto vs: for you make warres with iuſt and honeſt men, and do your ſelfe truſt altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therefore we haue thought good to aduertiſe you, not in reſpect to pleaſure you, but for feare leaſt the misfortune of your death might make vs vniuſtly to be accuſed: imagining that by trecherie or treaſon, we haue ſought to end this war, as though by valiantneſſe we could not otherwiſe atchieue it. Pyrrus hauing read this letter, and proued the contents thereof true, executed the Phiſition as he had deſerued: and to requite the aduertiſement of the Conſuls, he ſent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their priſoners, without paying of ranſome, and ſent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit the ROMAINES, becauſe they would neither receiue pleaſure of their enemies, & leaſt of all reward, for that they conſented not vnto ſo wicked a deed: did not onely refuſe to take their priſoners of free gift, but they ſent him againe ſo many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace and his friendſhip, they would giue no eare to it, before the wars were ended, and that he had ſent away his armie againe by ſea, into his kingdom of EPIRVS. Wherfore Pyrrus ſeeing no remedy, but that he muſt needs fight another battell, after he had ſomewhat refreſhed his armie, drew towards the city of ASCVLVM, where he fought the ſecond time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into a maruellous ill ground for horſemen, by a very ſwift running riuer, from whence came many brookes and deepe mariſhes, inſomuch as his Elephants could haue no ſpace nor ground to ioine with the battell of the footmen, by reaſon wherof there was a great nũber of men hurt and ſlaine on both ſides. And in the end, the battell being fought out all day long, the darke night did ſeuer thẽ: but the next morning, Pyrrus to win the aduantage to fight in the plain field, where he might preuaile with the force of his Elephants, ſent firſt certaine of his bands to ſeize vpon the naughtie ground they had fought on the day before. And by this pollicy hauing brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thruſt in amongſt his Elephants, ſtore of ſhot, & ſlingmen, and then made his armie march (being very well ſet in order) with great furie againſt his enemies. They miſſing the other dayes turnings and places of retire, were now compelled to fight all on a front in the plaine field: and ſtriuing to breake into the battell of Pyrrus footmen before the Elephants came, they deſperatly preaſed in vpon their enemies pikes with their ſwords, not caring for their owne perſons what became of them, but only looked to kill and deſtroy their enemies. In the end notwithſtanding, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES loſt it, and they firſt began to breake and flie on that ſide where Pyrrus was, by reaſon of the great force and fury of his charge, and much more through the violence of the Elephants: againſt which, the ROMAINES valiantneſſe nor courage could ought preuaile, but that they were driuen to giue thẽ place (much like the rage of ſurging waues, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tary to be troden vnder feete, and ouerthrowne by them, whom they were not able to hurt againe, but be by them moſt grieuouſly martyred, & their troubles thereby yet nothing eaſed. The chaſe was not long, becauſe they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that there died ſix thouſand men of the ROMAINES, and of Pyrrus part about three thouſand fiue hundred and fiue, as the kings owne Chronicles do witneſſe. Neuertheleſſe, Dionyſius makes no mention of two battels giuen neare vnto the city of ASCVLVM, nor that the ROMAINES were certainely ouerthrowne: howbeit he affirmeth that there was one battell only that continued vntill Sunne ſet, and that they ſcarcely ſeuered alſo when night was come on, Pyrrus being hurt on the arme with a ſpeare, and his cariage robbed and ſpoiled by the SAMNITES beſides.

Pyrrus victorie of the Romaines.

The writers agree not about Pyrrus battell.

And further, that there died in this battell, aboue fifteene thousand men, as well of Pyrrus side, as of the ROMAINES part: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retire. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus answered one, who reioyced with him for the victorie they had wonne: If we win another of the price, quoth he, we are vtterly vndone. For indeed then had he lost the most part of his armie he brought with him out of his realme, and all his friends and captaines in manner euerie one, or at the least there lacked litle of it: and besides that, he had no meanes to supply them with other from thence, and perceiued also that the confederates he had in ITALY, began to waxe cold. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did easily renew their army with fresh souldiers, which they caused to come from ROME as need required (much like vnto a liuely spring, the head whereof they had at home in their country) and they fainted not at all for any losses they receiued, but rather were they so much the more hotly bent, stoutly determining to abide out the warres, what euer betide. And thus whilest Pyrrus was troubled in this sort, new hopes and new enterprises were offered vnto him, that made him doubtfull what to do. For euen at a clap came Ambassadors to him out of SICILIA, offering to put into his hands, the cities of SYRACVSA, of AGRIGENTVM, and of the LEONTINES, and beseeching him to aide them to driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrants. And on the other side also, newes was brought him from GRECE, how Ptolomy surnamed the lightning, was slaine, and all his armie ouerthrowne in battell against the GAVLES, and that now he should come in good houre for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he cursed his hard fortune, that presented him all at once, such sundrie occasions to do great things: and as if both enterprises had bene already in his hand, he made his account that of necessitie he must loose one of them. So, long debating the matter with himselfe, which of the two wayes he should conclude vpon: in the end he resolued, that by the warres of SICILIA, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, considering that AFRICKE was not far from them. Wherefore, disposing himselfe that way, he sent Cineas thither immediatly to make his way, and to speake to the townes and cities of the countrey as he was wont to do: and in the meane time left a strong garrison in the city of TARENTVM, to keepe it at his deuotion, wherewith the TARENTINES were very angrie. For they made request vnto him, either to remaine in their country to maintaine wars with them against the ROMAINES (which was their meaning why they sent for him) or else if he would needs go, at the leastwise to leaue their city in as good state as he found it. But he answered them againe very roughly, that they should speake no more to him in it, and that they should not chuse but tarie his occasion. And with this answer he tooke ship, and sailed towards SICILIA: where so soone as he was arriued, he found all that he hoped for, for the cities did willingly put themselues into his hands. And where necessitie of battell was offered him to employ his armie, nothing at the beginning could stand before him. For, with thirtie thousand footmen, two thousand fiue hundred horsemen, and two hundred saile which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the country vnder their obedience. Now at that time, the city of ERIX was the strongest place they had: and there were a great number of good souldiers within to defend it. Pyrrus determined to proue the assault of it, and when his army was ready to giue the charge, he armed himselfe at al peeces from top to toe, and approching the wals, vowed vnto Hercules to giue him a solemne sacrifice, with a feast of common playes, so that he would graunt him grace to shew himselfe vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting in SICILIA, worthy of the noble ancestours from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his hands. This vow ended, he straight made the trumpets sound to the assault, and caused the barbarous people that were on the wals, to retire with force of his shot. Then when the scaling ladders were set vp, himselfe was the first that mounted on the wall, where he found diuerse of the barbarous people that resisted him. But some he threw ouer the wals on either side of him, & with his sword slue many dead about him, himselfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the heart to looke him in the face, his countenance was so terrible. And this doth proue that Homer spake wisely, and like a man of experience, when he sayd: that valiantnesse onely amongst all other morall vertues is that, which hath sometimes certaine furious motions and diuine prouocations, which makes a man besides himselfe. So the city being taken, he honourably performed his vowed sacrifice to Hercules, and kept a feast of all kinds and sorts of games and weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GRECIANS thereabouts, abouts, making many of them pay taxe and tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good ſouldiers, and had their name alſo of Mars, becauſe they were marſhiall men, and giuen to armes. Pyrrus led his armie againſt them, and ouerthrew them in battell: and put their collectors to death, that did leauy and exact the taxe, and razed many of their fortreſſes. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendſhip, offering him ſhips and money, pretending greater matters: he made them a ſhort aunſwer, that there was but one way to make peace and loue betweene them, to forſake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GRECE and them. For his good fortune, and the force he had in his hands, did ſet him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aſpiring firſt of all vnto the conqueſt of LYBIA. Now, to paſſe him ouer thither he had ſhips inough, but he lacked owers and mariners: wherefore when he would preſſe them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and ſeuerely puniſhed them, that would not obey his commandement. This he did not at his firſt comming, but contrarily had won all their good wils, ſpeaking more curteouſly to them then any other did, and ſhewing that he truſted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But ſodainely being altred from a popular prince, vnto a violent tyrant, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worſt of all is, vnfaithfull and vngratefull: neuertheleſſe, though they receiued great hurt by him, yet they ſuffered it, and granted him any needfull thing he did demaund. But when they ſaw he began to miſtruſt Thænon and Soſtratus, the two chiefe captaines of SYRACVSA, and they who firſt cauſed him to come into SICILIA, who alſo at his firſt arriuall deliuered the city of SYRACVSA into his hands, and had bene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compaſſe that he had done in SICILIA: when I ſay they ſaw he would no more carie them with him, nor leaue them behind him for the miſtruſt he had of them, and that Soſtratus fled from him, and abſented himſelfe, fearing leaſt Pyrrus would do him ſome miſchiefe: and that Pyrrus moreouer, had put Thænon to death, miſtruſting that he would alſo haue done him ſome harme, then all things fell out againſt Pyrrus: not one after another, nor by little and litle, but altogether at one inſtant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe ſome of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to ſet vpon him. But when all SICILIA was thus bent againſt him, he receiued letters from the SAMNITES and TARENTINES, by which they aduertiſed him, how they had much ado to defend themſelues within their cities and ſtrong holds, and that they were wholly driuen out of the field: wherefore they earneſtly beſought him ſpeedily to come to their aide. This newes came happily to him, to cloake his flying, that he might ſay it was not for diſpaire of good ſucceſſe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was indeed, that when he ſaw he could no longer keepe it, then a ſhip could ſtand ſtill among the waues, he ſought ſome honeſt ſhadow to colour his departing. And that ſurely was the cauſe why he returned againe in ITALIE. Neuertheleſſe, at his departure out of SICILE, they ſay that looking backe vpon the Ile, he ſayd to thoſe that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell (my friends) do we leaue to the ROMAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight the one with the other? And verily ſo it fell out ſhortly after, as he had ſpoken. But the barbarous people conſpiring together againſt Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one ſide watching his paſſage, gaue him battell on the ſea, in the verie ſtraight it ſelfe of MESSINA, where he loſt many of his ſhips, and fled with the reſt, and tooke the coaſt of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other ſide, being gone thither before, to the number of eighteene thouſand fighting men, durſt not preſent him battell in open field, but taried for him in certaine ſtraights of the mountaines, and in verie hard places, and ſo ſet vpon his rereward, and diſordered all his armie. They ſlue two of his Elephants, and cut off a great number of his rereward, ſo as he was compelled himſelfe in perſon to come from his vantgard, to helpe them againſt the barbarous people, which were luſtie valiant men, and old trained ſouldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a ſword, and was in great daunger: inſomuch as he was forced to retire out of the preaſe and fight: which did ſo much the more encourage his enemies: amongſt which there was one more aduenturous then the reſt, a goodly man of perſonage, faire armed in white armour, who aduancing himſelfe farre before his campany, cried out to the king with a bold and fierce voice, and chalenged him to fight with him if he were aliue. Pyrrus being mad as it were with this brauerie, turned againe with his guard, in ſpite of his men, hurt as he was. And beſides that, he was all on a fire with choler, and his face all bloudie and terrible to behold, he went through his men, and came at the length to this barbarous villaine that had challenged him: and gaue him ſuch a blow on his head with all his force & power, that what by the ſtrength of his arme, and through the goodneſſe of the temper and mettal of the ſword, the blow claue his head right in the middeſt, downe to the ſhoulders: ſo that his head being thus deuided, the one part fell on the one ſhoulder, and the other part on the other. This matter ſuddenly ſtaied the barbarous people, and kept them from going any further, they were ſo afraid and amazed, to ſee ſo great a blow with ones hand, and it made them thinke indeede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iourney, arriued at the length in the city of TARENTVM, with twentie thouſand footemen, and three thouſand horſe. And with theſe (ioyning thereto the choiceſt men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to ſeeke out the ROMAINES, who had their campe within the territories of the SAMNITES, which were then in very hard ſtate: for their harts were killed, becauſe that in many battels and encounters with the ROMAINES, they were euer ouerthrowne. They were very angry beſides with Pyrrus, for that he had forſaken them, to go his voyage into SICILIA, by reaſon whereof there came no great number of ſouldiers into his campe. But notwithſtanding, he deuided all his ſtrength into two parts, whereof he ſent the one part into LVCANIA, to occupie one of the ROMAINE Conſuls that was there, to the end he ſhould not come to aide his companion: and with the other part he went himſelfe againſt Manius Curius, who lay in a very ſtraunge place of aduantage, neare to the citie of BENEVENTO, attending the aide that ſhould come to him out of LVCANIA, beſides alſo that the Soothſayers (by the ſignes and tokens of the birds and ſacrifices) did counſell him not to ſtirre from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, deſiring to fight with Manius before his aide came vnto him, which he looked for out of LVCANIA, tooke with him the beſt ſouldiers he had in all his armie, and the warlikeſt Elephants, and marched away in the night, ſuppoſing to ſteale vpon Manius on the ſudden, and giue an aſſault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus hauing a long way to go, and through a woddy countrey, his lights and torches failed him, by reaſon whereof many of his ſouldiers loſt their way, and they loſt a great deale of time alſo, before they could againe be gathered together: ſo as in this ſpace the night was ſpent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceiued plainely how he came downe the hils. This at the firſt ſight made them muſe awhile, and put them in a litle feare: neuertheleſſe Manius hauing had the ſignes of the ſacrifices fauourable, and ſeeing that occaſion did preſſe him to it, went out into the field, and ſet vpon the voward of his enemies, and made them turne their backes. The which feared all the reſt in ſuch wiſe, that there were ſlaine a great number of them in the field, and certaine Elephants alſo taken. This victorie made Manius Curius leaue his ſtrength and come into the plaine field, where he ſet his men in battell ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on the one ſide: but on the other he was repulſed by violence of the Elephants, and compelled to draw backe into his owne campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to guard it. So when he ſaw them vpon the rampers of his campe all armed, readie to fight, he called them out, and they comming freſh out of places of aduantage, to charge vpon the Elephants, compelled them in a verie ſhort time to turne their backes, and flie through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble and diſorder: ſo as in the end, the whole victorie fell vpon the ROMAINES ſide, and conſequently by meanes of that victorie, followed the greatneſſe and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINES being growne more couragious by this battell, and hauing increaſed their force, and wonne the reputation of men vnconquerable, immediatly after conquered all ITALIE beſides, and ſoone after that, all SICILIA. To this end (as you ſee) came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE and SICILIA, after he had ſpent ſixe yeares continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, and his armie conſumed. Notwithſtanding, his noble courage remained alwaies inuincible, what loſſes ſoeuer he had ſuſtained: and moreouer whileſt he liued, he was euer eſteemed the chiefeſt of all the kings and princes in his time, as well for his experience and ſufficiency in warres, as alſo for the valiantneſſe and hardineſſe of his perſon. But what he wanne by famous deeds, he loſt by vaine hopes: deſiring ſo earneſtly that which he had not, as he forgot to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice-player, that caſteth well but cannot vſe his lucke. Now hauing brought backe againe with him into EPIRVS, eight thouſand footmen, and fiue hundred horſemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuiſed with himſelfe to ſeeke out ſome new warre to entertaine thoſe ſouldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore vpon a new aide of certaine GAVLES being come vnto him, he entred into the realme of MACEDON (which Antigonus, Demetrius ſonne held at that time) with intent onely to make a forrey, and to get ſome ſpoile in the country. But when he ſaw that he had taken diuerſe holds, and moreouer, that two thouſand men of warre of the country came and yeelded themſelues vnto him, he began to hope of better ſucceſſe, then at the firſt he looked for. For vpon that hope he marched againſt king Antigonus ſelfe, whom he met in a very ſtraight valley, and at his firſt comming, gaue ſuch a luſtie charge vpon his rereward, that he put all Antigonus armie in great diſorder. For Antigonus had placed the GAVLES in the rereward of his armie to cloſe it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valiantly defend the firſt charge: and the skirmiſh was ſo hot, that the moſt of them were ſlaine. After them the leaders of the Elephants perceiuing they were enuironed on euerie ſide, yeelded themſelues and their beaſts. Pyrrus ſeeing his power to be now increaſed, with ſuch a ſupplie, truſting more to his good fortune, then any good reaſon might moue him: thruſt further into the battell of the MACEDONIANS, who were all afraid, and troubled for the ouerthrow of their rereward, ſo as they could not once baſe their pikes, nor fight againſt him. He for his part holding vp his hand, and calling the captaines of the bands by their names, ſtraightwaies made all the footemen of Antigonus turne wholly to his ſide: who flying ſaued himſelfe with a few horſemen, and kept certaine of the cities in his realme vpon the ſea coaſt. But Pyrrus in all his proſperitie iudging nothing more to redound to his honor and glorie, then the ouerthrow of the GAVLES, layed aſide their goodlieſt and richeſt ſpoiles, and offered vp the ſame in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inſcription:

Pyrrus victory of Antigonus king of Macedon.

Antigonus flieth from king Pyrrus.

When Pyrrus had ſubdu'd, the puiſſant Gaules in fields,
He cauſed of their ſpoiles to make, theſe targets, armes and ſhields:
The which he hanged vp, in temple all on high,
Before Minerua (goddeſſe here) in ſigne of victorie:
When he had ouercome, the whole and hugie hoaſt,
The which Antigonus did bring, into his countries coaſt:
Ne maruell ſhould it ſeeme, though victorie he wonne,
Since valiantneſſe brings victorie, and euermore hath done:
And valiantneſſe alwaies, hath conſtantly kept place,
From age to age, and time to time, in Æacus his race.

Immediatly after this battell, all the cities of the realme of MACEDON yeelded vnto him: but when he had the city of ÆGES in his power, he vſed the inhabitants thereof very hardly, & ſpecially becauſe he left a great garriſon of the GAVLES there which he had in pay. This nation is extreme couetous, as then they ſhewed themſelues: for they ſpared not to breake vp the tombes wherein the kings of MACEDON lay buried, and tooke away all the gold and ſiluer they could find: and afterwards with great inſolency caſt out their bones into the open wind. Pyrrus was told it, but he lightly paſſed it ouer, and made no reckoning of it: either becauſe he deferred it till another time, by reaſon of the warres he had then in hand: or elſe for that he durſt not meddle with puniſhing of theſe barbarous people at that time. But whatſoeuer the matter was, the MACEDONIANS were verie angrie with Pyrrus, and blamed him greatly for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all things ſure in MACEDON, not being fully poſſeſt of the ſame: new toyes and hopes came in his head, and (mocking Antigonus) ſayd he was a mad man to go apparelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloake might become him like a priuate man. Now, Cleonymus king of SPARTA being come to procure him to bring his armie into the countrie of LACEDÆMON, Pyrrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the bloud royall of SPARTA, but becauſe he was a cruell man, and would do all things by authority, they loued him not at SPARTA, nor truſted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, and made Areus king, a very quiet man. And this was the oldeſt quarrell Cleonymus had againſt the commonwealth of SPARTA: but beſides that, he had another priuate quarrell, which grew vpon this cauſe. In his old yeares, Cleonymus had maried a faire young lady called Chelidonida, which was alſo of the bloud royall, and the daughter of Leotychides. This Ladie being fallen extremely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus ſonne, a goodly young gentleman, and in his luſtie youth, ſhe greatly vexed and diſhonoured her husband Cleonymus, who was ouer head and eares in loue and iealouſie with her: for there was not one in all SPARTA, but plainely knew that his wife made none account of him.

The couetouſneſſe of the Gaules.

Areus made king of Sparta, and Cleonymus put downe.

And thus his home ſorowes, being ioyned with his outward common griefes, euen for ſpite, deſiring a reuenge, in choler he went to procure Pyrrus to come vnto SPARTA, to reſtore him againe to his kingdome. Hereupon he brought him into LACEDÆMONIA forthwith, with fiue and twenty thouſand footmen, two thouſand horſe, and foure and twentie Elephants: by which preparation, though by nothing elſe, the world might plainely ſee, that Pyrrus came with a mind not to reſtore Cleonymus againe vnto SPARTA, but of intent to conquer for himſelfe (if he could) all the country of PELOPONNESVS. For in words he denied it to the LACEDÆMONIANS themſelues, who ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, when he was in the city of MEGALIPOLIS, where he told them that he was come into PELOPONNESVS, to ſet the townes and cities at liberty which Antigona kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to ſend his yong ſonnes into SPARTA (ſo they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the LACONIAN manner, and from their youth haue this aduantage aboue all other kings, to haue bene well brought vp. But faining theſe things, and abuſing thoſe that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heed of him, till he came within the coaſt of LACONIA, into the which he was no ſooner entred, but he began to ſpoile and waſt the whole country. And when the Ambaſſadors of SPARTA reproued and found fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in ſuch ſort, before he had openly proclaimed it: he made them anſwer, No more haue you your ſelues vſed to proclaime that, which you purpoſed to do to others. Then one of the Ambaſſadors called Mandricidas, replied againe vnto him in the LACONIAN tongue: If thou be a god, thou wilt do vs no hurt, becauſe we haue not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou ſhalt meete with another that ſhall be better then thy ſelfe. Then he marched directly to SPARTA, where Cleonymus gaue him counſell euen at the firſt, to aſſault it. But he would not ſo do, fearing (as they ſayd) that if he did it by night, his ſouldiers would ſacke the city: and ſayd it ſhould be time inough to aſſault it the next day at broad day light, becauſe there were but few men within the towne, and beſide they were verie ill prouided. And furthermore, king Areus himſelfe was not there, but gone into CRETA to aide the GORTYNIANS, who had warres in his owne country. And doubtleſſe, that only was the ſauing of SPARTA from taking, that they made no reckoning to aſſault it hotly: becauſe they thought it was not able to make reſiſtance. For Pyrrus camped before the town, throughly perſwaded with himſelf, that he ſhould find none to fight with him: & Cleonymus friends & ſeruants alſo did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrrus ſhould haue come to ſupper to him, & lodged with him. When night was come the LACEDÆMONIANS coũſelled together, and ſecretly determined to ſend away their wiues, and litle children into CRETA. But the women themſelues were againſt it, and there was one among them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate houſe with a ſword in her hand, to ſpeake vnto them in the name of all the reſt, and ſayd: That they did their wiues great wrong, if they thought them ſo faint-hearted, as to liue after SPARTA were deſtroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in counſell, that they ſhould caſt a trench before the enemies campe, and that at both ends of the ſame they ſhould burie carts in the ground vnto the middeſt of the wheeles, to the end that being faſt ſet in the ground, they ſhould ſtay the Elephants, and keepe them from paſſing further. And when they began to go in hand withall, there came wiues and maides vnto them, ſome of them their clothes girt vp round about them, and others all in their ſmockes, to worke at this trench with the old men, aduiſing the young men that ſhould fight the next morning, to reſt themſelues in the meane while. So the women tooke the third part of the trench to taske, which was ſixe cubites broad, foure cubits deepe, and eight hundred foote long, as Philarchus ſaith, or litle leſſe as Hyeronimus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, and the enemies remoued to come to the aſſault: the women themſelues fetched the weapons which they put into the yong mens hands, and deliuered them the taske of the trench ready made, which they before had vndertaken, praying them valiantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, how great a pleaſure it is to ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and ſight of their natiue country, and what great felicity and honour it is to die in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valiantly like an honeſt man, and worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being gone aſide, had tied a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to ſtrangle and hang her ſelfe, rather then to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chance the city ſhould come to be taken. Now Pyrrus marched in perſon with his battell of footmen, againſt the front of the SPARTANS, who being a great number alſo, did tarie his comming on the other ſide of the trench: the which, beſides that that it was very ill to passe ouer, did let the souldiers also to fight steadily in order of battell, because the earth being newly cast vp, did yeeld vnder their feete. Wherefore, Ptolomy king Pyrrus son, passing all alongst the trench side with two thousand GAVLES, and all the choise men of the CHAONIANS, assaied if he could get ouer to the other side at one of the ends of the trench where the carts were: which being set very deepe into the ground, and one ioyned vnto another, they did not only hinder the assailants, but the defendants also. Howbeit in the end, the GAVLES began to plucke off the wheeles of these carts, & to draw them into the riuer. But Acrotatus, king Areus sonne, a yong man, seeing the danger, ran through the city with a troupe of three hundreth lusty youths besides, and went to inclose Ptolomie behind, before he espied him, for that he passed a secret hollow way till he came euen to giue the charge vpon them: whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towards him, one running in anothers necke, and so in great disorder were thrust into the trenches, and vnder the carts: insomuch as at the last, with much ado, and great bloudshed, Acrotatus and his companie draue them backe, and repulsed them. Now the women and old men, that were on the other side of the trench, saw plainly before their face, how valiantly Acrotatus had repulsed the GAVLES. Wherefore after Acrotatus had done this exploite, he returned againe through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare-bloud: couragious and liuely, for the victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus farre more noble and fairer to behold, then euer he was: so that they all thought Chelidonida happy to haue such a friend and louer. And there were certaine old men, that followed him crying after him, go thy way Acrotatus and enioy thy loue Chelidonida: beget noble chidren of her vnto SPARTA. The fight was cruell on that side where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valiantly. Howbeit, amongst other, there was one named Phillius, who after he had fought long, and slaine many of his enemies with his owne hands, that forced to passe ouer the trench, perceiuing that his hart fainted for the great number of wounds he had vpon him, called one of them that were in the ranke next behind him, and giuing him his place, fell downe dead in the armes of his friends, becausse his enemies should not haue his bodie. In the end, the battell hauing continued all the day long, the night did separate them: and Pyrrus, being laid in his bed, had this vision in his sleepe: He thought he stroke the city of LACEDÆMON with lightning, that he vtterly cõsumed it: whereat he was so passing glad, that euen with the very ioy he awaked: and thereupon forthwith commaunded his captaines to make their men ready to the assault, and told his dreame vnto his familiars, supposing that out of doubt it did betoken he should in that approach take the city. All that heard it, beleeued it was so, sauing one Lysimachus: who to the contrary sayd, that this vision liked him not, becausse the places smitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawfull to enter into them: by reason whereof he was also afraid, that the gods did signifie vnto him, that he should not enter into the city of SPARTA. Pyrrus answered him: That sayd he, is a matter disputable to and fro in an open assemply of people, for there is no maner of certaintie in it. But furthermore, euery man must take his weapon in his hand, and set this sentence before his eyes:

Acrotatus valiantnesse.

Pyrrus dreame.

A right good thing it is, that he would hazard life,
In iust defence of maisters cause, with speare and bloudy knife.

Alluding vnto Homers verses, which he wrote for the defence of his country. And saying thus, he rose, and at the breake of day led his armie vnto the assault. On the other side also, the LACEDÆMONIANS with a maruellous courage and magnanimity, farre greater then their force, bestirred themselues wonderfully to make resistance, hauing their wiues by them, that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to giue meate and drinke to them that needed, & did also withdraw those that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewise for their part, indeuored themselues withal their might to fill vp the trench with wood and other things, which they cast vpon the dead bodies & armours lying in the bottome of the ditch: and the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, labored all they could possible to let thẽ. But in this great broile, one perceiued Pyrrus on horsebacke to haue leapt the trench, past ouer the strength of the cartes, and made force to enter into the citie. Wherefore those that were appointed to defend that part of the trench, cryed out straight, and the women fell a shrecking, and running as if all had bene lost. And as Pyrrus passed further, striking downe with his owne hands all that stood before him, a CRETAN shot at him, and stroke his horse through both sides: who leaping out of the preasse for paine of his wound, dying, caried Pyrrus away, and threw him vpon the hanging of a steepe hill, where he was in great danger to fall from the top. This put all his seruants and friends about him in a maruellous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing them in this feare and trouble, ranne immediatly vnto that place, and with force of shot draue them all out of the trench. After this retire, Pyrrus caused all assault to cease, hoping the LACEMONIANS in the end would yeeld, considering there were many of them slaine in the two dayes past, and all the rest in a maner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the citie (whether it were to proue the valiantnesse of the inhabitants themselues, or at the least to shew what power they were of, euen in their greatest need and distresse, when the LACEDÆMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Aminias Phocian from CORINTH, one of king Antigonus captaines with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and straight after him, as soone as he was entred, king Areus arriued also on the other side from CRETA, and two thousand souldiers with him. So the women went home to their houses, making their reckoning that they should not need any more to trouble themselues with warres. They gaue the old men libertie also to go and rest themselues, who being past all age to fight, for necessities sake yet were driuen to arme themselues, & take weapon in hand: and in order of battell placed the new-come soldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderstanding that new supplies were come, grew to greater stomacke then before, and inforced all that he could to win the towne by assault. But in the end, when to his cost he found that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the siege, and went to spoile all the countrey about, determining to lie there in garrison all the winter. He could not for all this auoide his destinie: for there rose a sedition in the citie of ARGOS betweene two of the chiefest citizens, Aristeas and Aristippus: and because Aristeas thought that king Antigonus did fauor his enemie Aristippus, he made hast to send first vnto Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was such, that he did continually heape hope vpon hope, euer taking the present prosperitie, for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loser, then he sought to recouer himselfe, and to restore his losse by some other new attempts. So that neither for being conquerour, nor ouercome, he would euer be quiet, but alwayes troubled some, and himselfe also: be reason whereof, he suddenly departed towards ARGOS. But king Areus hauing layd ambushes for him in diuerse places, and occupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to passe, gaue a charge vpon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the taile of his armie. Now, the selfe same day Pyrrus was warned by a soothsayer, who sacrificing had found the liuer of the sacrificed beast infected: that it betokened the losse of some most neere vnto him. But when he heard the noise of the charge giuen, he thought not on the warning of the soothsayer, but commanded his sonne to take his houshold seruants with him, and to go thither: and he himselfe in the meane time with as great hast as he could, made the rest of his armie to march, to get them quickly out of this dangerous way. The fray was very hot about Ptolomie Pyrrus son, for they were all the chiefe men of the LACEDÆMONIANS with whom he had to do, led by a valiant captaine, called Eualcus. But as he fought valiantly against those that stood before him, there was a souldier of CRETA called Oræsus, borne in the city of APTERA, a man very readie of his hand, and light of foote, who running alongst by him, stroke him such a blow on his side, that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ptolomie being slaine, his company began straight to flie: and the LACEDÆMONIANS followed the chase so hotly, that they tooke no heed of themselues, vntill they saw they were in the plaine field far from their footmen. Wherefore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his sonne was newly reported, being on fire with sorow and passion, turned suddenly vpon them with the men of armes of the MOLOSSIANS, and being the first that came vnto them, made a maruellous slaughter among them. For, notwithstanding that euerie where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, hauing his sword in his hand: yet then he did shew more proofe of his valiantnesse, strength, and courage, then he had euer done before. And when he had set spurs to his horse against Eualcus to close with him: Eualcus turned on the one side, and gaue Pyrrus such a blow with his sword, that he missed litle the cutting off his bridle hand: for he cut indeed all the raines of the bridle asunder. But Pyrrus straight ranne him through the bodie with his speare, and lighting off from his horse, he put all the troupe of the LACEDÆMONIANS to the sword that were about the bodie of Eualcus, being all chosen men. Thus the ambition of the captaines was cause of that losse vnto their countrey for nothing, considering that the warres against them were ended. But Pyrrus hauing now as it were made sacrifice of these poore bodies of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for the soule of his dead dead ſonne, and fought thus wonderfully alſo, to honor his funerals, conuerting a great part of his ſorow for his death, into anger and wrath againſt the enemies: he afterwards held on his way directly towards ARGOS. And notwithſtanding that king Antigonus had already ſeazed the hils that were ouer the valley, he lodged neare vnto the city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following ſent an herauld vnto Antigonus, and gaue him defiance, calling him wicked man, and challenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to try which of them two ſhould be king. Antigonus made him anſwer, that he made warres as much with time as with weapon: and furthermore, that if Pyrrus were wearie of his life, he had wayes inough open to put himſelfe to death. The citizens of ARGOS alſo ſent Ambaſſadours vnto them both, to pray them to depart, ſith they knew that there was nothing for them to ſee in the city of ARGOS, and that they would let it be a neuter, and friend vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, & gaue them his ſon for hoſtage. Pyrrus alſo made them faire promiſe to do ſo too, but becauſe he gaue no caution nor ſufficient pledge to performe it, they miſtruſted him the more. Then there fell out many great and wonderfull tokens, as well vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the ARGIVES. For Pyrrus hauing ſacrificed oxen, their heads being ſtriken off from their bodies, they thruſt out their tongues, and licked vp their owne bloud. And within the city of ARGOS, a ſiſter of the temple of Apollo Lycias, called Apollonide, ran through the ſtreetes, crying out that ſhe ſaw the city full of murther, and bloud running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fray, howbeit ſhe vaniſhed away ſuddenly and no body knew what became of her. Pyrrus then comming hard to the wals of ARGOS in the night, and finding one of the gates called Diamperes, opened by Ariſteas, he put in his GAVLES: who poſſeſſed the market place before the citizens knew any thing of it. But becauſe the gate was too low to paſſe the Elephants through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them off, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke, and in tumult: by reaſon wherof they loſt much time, ſo that the citizens in the end perceiued it, and ran incontinently vnto the caſtell of Aſpides, & into other ſtrong places of the city. And therwithall, they ſent with preſent ſpeed vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and ſo he did: and after he was come hard to the wals, he remained without with the ſcours, and in the meane time ſent his ſon with his chiefeſt Captaines into the towne, who brought a great number of good ſouldiers, and men of warre with him. At the ſame time alſo arriued Areus king of SPARTA, with a thouſand of the CRETANS, and moſt luſtie SPARTANS: all which ioyning together, came to giue a charge vpon the GAVLES that were in the market place, who put them in a maruellous feare & hazard. Pyrrus entring on that ſide alſo of the city called Cylabaris with terrible noiſe and cries, when he vnderſtood that the GAVLES anſwered him not luſtily & couragiouſly, he doubted ſtraight that it was the voice of men diſtreſſed, and that had their hands full. Wherefore, he came on with ſpeed to relieue them, thruſting the horſemen forwards that marched before him with great danger and paine, by reaſon of the holes and ſinkes, and water conduicts, whereof the city was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confuſion amongſt them, as may be thought fighting by night, where no man ſaw what he had to do, nor could heare what was commanded, by reaſon of the great noiſe they made, ſtraying here and there vp and downe the ſtreetes, the one ſcattered from the other: neither could the captaines ſet their men in order, as well for the darkneſſe of the night, as alſo for the confuſed tumult that was all the city ouer, and for that the ſtreetes alſo were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both ſides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceiued the caſtell of Aſpides, full of his armed enemies. And furthermore, ſuddenly as he was come into the market place, amongſt many other goodly common workes ſet out to beautifie the ſame, he ſpied the images of a Bull and a Wolfe in copper, the which fought one with another. This ſight made him affraid, becauſe at that preſent he remembred a prophecy that had bene told him, that his end and death ſhould be when he ſaw a Wolfe and a Bull fight together. The ARGIVES report, that theſe images were ſet vp in the market place, for the remembrance of a certaine chance that had happened in their country. For when Danaus came thither firſt, by the way called Pyramia (as one would ſay, land ſowne with corne) in the country of THYREATIDE, he ſaw as he went, a Wolfe fight with a Bull: whereupon he ſtaied to ſee what the end of their fight would come to, ſuppoſing the caſe in himſelfe, that the Wolfe was of his ſide, becauſe that being a ſtranger as he was, he came to ſet vpon the naturall inhabitants of the country. The Wolfe in the end obtained the victorie: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycias, followed on his enterprise,and had so good successe, that he draue Gelanor out of ARGOS, who at that time was king of the ARGIVES. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the wolfe and bull were set vp in the market place of ARGOS. Pyrrus being halfe discouraged with the sight of them,& also because nothing fell out well according to his expectation, thought best to retire: but fearing the straightnesse of the gates of the city, he sent vnto his son Helenus, whom he had left without the city with the greatest part of his force and armie, commaunding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall,that his men might the more readily get out,and that he might receiue them, if their enemies by chance did hinder their comming out. But the messenger whom he sent, was so hastie and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well vnderstand what Pyrrus sayd vnto him,but reported his message quite contrarie. Whereupon the young prince Helenus taking the best souldiers he had with him, and the rest of his Elephants,entred into the city to helpe his father,who was now giuing backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retiring still,he valiantly repulsed those that set vpon him,turning his face oft vnto them. But when he was driuen vnto the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the city, he was kept in with his owne men that entred at the same gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noise was so great: and though the first had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behind, and did still thrust forward into the prease, did not permit them. Besides this moreouer,the biggest of all the Elephants by misfortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grinding his teeth did hinder those also,that would haue come out and giuen backe. Furthermore, another of the Elephants that were entred before into the city, called Nicon (as much to say,as conquering) seeking his gouernor that was stricken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes: ranne vpon them that came backe vpon him,ouerthrowing friends and foes one in anothers necke,till at the length hauing found the body of his maister slaine,he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke,and carying him vpon his two tushes, returned backe with great furie,treading all vnder feete he found in his way. Thus euery man being thronged and crowded vp together in this sort, there was not one that could helpe himselfe: for it seemed to be a masse and heape of a multitude, and one whole body shut together, which sometime thrust forward, and sometime gaue backe, as the sway went. They fought not so much against their enemies,who set vpon them behind: but they did themselues more hurt then their enemies did. For if any drew out his sword,or based his pike,he could neither scabard the one againe, nor lift vp the other, but thrust it full vpon his owne fellowes that came in to helpe them, and so killed themselues one thrusting vpon another. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing his people thus troubled and harried to and fro,tooke his crowne from his head which he ware vpon his helmet, that made him knowne of his men a farre off,and gaue it vnto one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and trusting then to the goodnesse of his horse, flew vpon his enemies that folowed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pike,but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherefore Pyrrus set vpon him that had hurt him,who was an ARGIAN borne,a man of meane condition,and a poore old womans son, whose mother at that present time was gotten vp to the top of the tiles of a house,as all other women of the city were,to see the fight. And she perceiuing that it was her sonne whom Pyrrus came vpon, was so afrighted to see him in that danger, that she tooke a tile,and with both her hands cast it vpon Pyrrus. The tile falling off from his head by reason of his head-peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke,and brake his necke-bone asunder: wherewith he was stricken so benummed, that he lost his sight with the blow, the raines of his bridle fell out of his hand, & himselfe fell from his horse to the ground,by Licymmias tombe,before any man knew what he was,at the least the common people. Vntill at the last there came one Zopyrus that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other souldiers also that ran straight to the place,and knowing him,dragged his body into a gate,euen as he was comming againe to himselfe out of this traunce. This Zopyrus drew out a SLAVON sword he wore by his side, to strike off his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grim countenance on him betweene his eyes,that made him so afraid,and his hand so to shake therewith,that being thus amazed,he did not strike him right in the place where he should haue cut off his head, but killed him vnder his mouth about his chinne,so that he was a great while ere he could strike off his head. The matter was straight blowne abroad amongst diuerse: whereupon Alcyoneus running thither,asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he ranne presently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friends, and cast

Afterwards Alcyoneus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus ſonne) in very poore ſtate, muffled vp with a poore ſhort cloake: vſed him very curteouſly with gentle words, and brought him to his father. Antigonus ſeeing his ſonne bringing of him, ſayd vnto him: this part now (my ſonne) is better then the firſt, and pleaſeth me a great deale more. But yet thou haſt not done all thou ſhouldeſt: for thou ſhouldeſt haue taken from him his beggerly cloake he weareth, which doth more ſhame vs that are the gainers, then him that is the looſer. After he had ſpoken theſe words, Antigonus embraced Helenus, and hauing apparelled him in good ſort, ſent him home with honourable conuoy into his Realme of Epirvs. Furthermore, ceazing all Pyrrus campe and armie, he curteouſly vſed all his friends and ſeruants.

The end of Pyrrus life.

THE LIFE OF Caius Marius.

IT is not knowne what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintus Sertorius, who had all Spaine in his hands at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that deſtroyed the city of Corinth. For this name of Achaicus that was giuen vnto Mummius, of Africanus vnto Scipio, and of Numidicus vnto Metellus: were all ſurnames giuen them, by reaſon of the conqueſts they wan. By this reaſon Poſidonius thinketh to ouercome them that ſay, that the third name the Romaines haue, is their proper name: as Camillus, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out ſo, ſayd he, then it muſt needs follow that they which haue two names, ſhould haue no proper name. But on the other ſide alſo, he doth not conſider that by the like reaſon he ſhould ſay, that women haue no names: for there is not a woman in Rome that is called by her firſt name, which Poſidonius iudgeth to be the proper name of the Romaines. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the houſe or familie, as of the Pompeians, of the Manlians, and of the Cornelians, like as the Heraclides and the Pelopides are amongſt the Grecians: and the other is a ſurname taken of the deeds, or of the nature, forme, or ſhape of the body, or of ſome other like accident, as are theſe ſurnames, Macrinus, Torquatus, and Sylla. Euen as amongſt the GRECIANS likewiſe, Mnemon, which ſignifieth hauing good memorie: Grypos, hauing a crooked noſe: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diuerſitie of cuſtome would deliuer obiection ſufficient to the contrarie, to him that liſted. And furthermore, as touching the fauour of Marius face, we haue ſeene an image of his in marble at RAVENNA, a city of the GAVLES, which doth liuely repreſent that rough ſeueritie of nature and maner, which they ſay was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature, and giuen to the warres, and hauing followed the ſame altogether from his youth, more then the ciuill life: when he came to authority, he could not bridle his anger and cholericke nature. And they ſay furthermore, that he neuer learned the Greeke tongue, nor vſed it in any matters of weight: as though it had bene a mockerie to ſtudy to learne the tongue, the maſters wherof liued in bondage vnder others. After his ſecond triumph, in the dedication of a certaine temple, he made Greeke playes to ſhew the ROMAINES paſtime: and came into the Theater, howbeit he did but ſit downe only, and went his way ſtraight. Whrefore me thinkes, that as Plato was wont to ſay oft vnto Xenocrates the Philoſopher, who was of a curriſh nature, had his head euer occupied, and too ſeuere: Xenocrates, my friend, I pray thee do ſacrifice to the Graces. So if any man could haue perſwaded Marius to haue ſacrificed to the Muſes, and to the GRECIAN Graces: (that is to ſay, that he had knowne the Greeke tongue) to ſo many famous and glorious deeds as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not ioyned ſo vnfortunate and miſerable an end as he made, through his choler and extreme ambition, at ſuch yeares, and through an vnſatiable couetouſneſſe, which like boiſterous winds made him to make ſhipwracke of all, in a moſt cruell, bloudie, and vnnaturall age. The which is eaſily knowne in reading the diſcourſe of his doings. Firſt of all he was of a meane houſe, borne of poore parents by father & mother, that got their liuings by ſweat of their browes. His father as himſelfe, was called Caius: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cauſe why he began ſo late to haunt the citie, and to learne the ciuility and maners of ROME, hauing bene brought vp alwaies before in a litle poore village called CIRROEATON, within the territorie of the city of ARPOS: where he led a hard country life, in reſpect of thoſe that liued pleaſantly and finely in the cities, but otherwiſe well reformed, and neareſt vnto the maners of the ancient ROMAINES. The firſt iourny he made vnto the wars, was againſt the CELTIBERIANS in SPAINE, vnder Scipio AFRICAN, whē he went to beſiege the city of NVMANTIA: where his captaines in ſhort time found that he was a better ſoldier then any other of his companions. For he did maruellous eaſily receiue the reformation of manners, and the diſcipline of warres, which Scipio aduanced amongſt his ſouldiers, that were ill trained before, and giuen ouer to all pleaſure. And they ſay, that in the ſight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his enemies, and ſlue him: vpon which occaſion, Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many courteſies and pleaſures. But ſpecially one day aboue the reſt, hauing made him ſup with him at his table, ſome one after ſupper falling in talke of Captaines that were in ROME at that time: one that ſtood by Scipio, asked him (either becauſe indeed he ſtood in doubt, or elſe for that he would curry fauour with Scipio) what other Captaine the ROMAINES ſhould haue after his death, like vnto him. Scipio hauing Marius by him, gently clapped him vpon his ſhoulder, and ſayd: Peraduenture this ſhall be he. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to ſhew from his youth that one day he ſhould come to be a great man, and the other alſo for wiſely coniecturing the end, by ſeeing of the beginning. Well, it fortuned ſo, that theſe words of Scipio (by report) aboue all things elſe put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene ſpoken by the Oracle of ſome god, and made him bold to deale in matters of ſtate and common wealth: where by meanes of the fauor and countenance Cæcilius Metellus gaue him (whoſe houſe his father and he had alwayes followed and honored) he obtained the office of Tribuneſhip. In this office he preferred a law touching the maner how to giue the voices in election of the Magiſtrates, which did ſeeme to take from the Nobility the authority they had in iudgement. And therefore the Conſull Cotta ſtepped vp againſt it, and perſwaded the Senate to reſiſt that law, and not ſuffer it to be authorized, and therewithall preſently to call Marius before them to yeeld a reaſon of his doing. So was it agreed vpon in Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abaſhed at anie thing, as ſome other young man would haue bene, that had but newly begun to enter into the world as he did, and hauing no other notable calling or qualitie in him, ſauing his vertue onely to commend him: but taking boldneſſe of himſelfe (as the noble acts he afterwards did, did, gaue shew of his valure) he openly threatned the Consull Cotta to send him to prison, if he did not presently withdraw the conclusion he had caused to be resolued vpon. The Consul then turning himselfe vnto Cæcilius Metellus, asked how he liked it? Metellus standing vp, spake in the behalfe of the Consull: and then Marius calling a sergeant out, commaunded him to take Metellus selfe, and to carie him to prison. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: so that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the conclusion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honour into the market place among the assembly of the people, caused this law to passe and be authorized: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a stout man, and such a one, as would not stoupe for any feare, nor shrinke for bashfulnesse, but would beard the Senate in fauour of the people. Notwithstanding he shortly after changed opinion, and altered the first, by another act he made: for when another went about to haue a lawe made, to distribute corne vnto every citizen without payment of any pennie, he was vehemently against it, and ouerthrew it: so that thereby he came to be alike honoured and esteemed of either partie, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the preiudice of the commonwealth. After he had bene Tribune, he sued for the chiefest office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two sorts: the first is called AEdilitas Curulis, so named, because of certaine chaires that haue crooked feete, vpon which they sit when they giue audience. The other is of lesse dignitie, and that is called AEdilitas popularis: and when they haue chosen the first and greater Ædilis at Rome, they presently proceed the same day also in the market place vnto election of the lesser. Marius seeing plainely that he was put by the chiefest of the Ædiles, turned againe straight yet to demaund the second: but this was misliked in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too shameless, and too presumptuous a man. So that in one self day he had two denials and repulses, which neuer man but himselfe before had. And neuertheless, all this could not cut his combe, but shortly after he sued also for the Prætorship, and he lacked but a litle of the deniall of that: yet in the end, being last of all chosen, he was accused to haue bribed the people, and bought their voices for mony. And surely amongst many other, this presumption was very great: that they saw a man of Cassius Sabacon within the bars where the election is made, running too and fro among them that gaue their voices, because this Sabacon was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the Iudges, and Sabacon was examined vpon it: wherunto he answered, that for the great extreame heat he felt, he was very dry, and asked for cold water to drinke, and that this man had brought him some in a pot where he was, howbeit that he went his way assoone as euer he had drunke. This Sabacon was afterwards put out of the Senate by the next Censors, and many iudge that he was worthy of this infamie, for that he was periured in iudgement, or because he was so subiect & giuē to his pleasure. Caius Herennius was also called for a witnesse against Marius: but he did alleadge for his excuse, that the lawe and custome did dispence with the Patron, to be a witnesse against his follower and client, and he was quit by the Iudges. For the Romaines alwaies call those Patrons, who take the protection of meaner then themselues into their hands: saying, that Marius predecessors, and Marius himselfe, had euer bene followers of the house of the Herennians. The Iudges receiued his answer, and allowed therof. But Marius spake against it, alleadging that since he had receiued this honor to beare office in the commonwealth, he was now growne from this base condition, to be any more a follower of any man: the which is not true in all. For euery office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the office, nor yet his posteritie to be vnder the patronage of another, nor doth discharge him from the dutie of honoring them: but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which the law doth permit to sit in the crooked chaire called Curulis, that is to say, caried vpon a charret through the city. But notwithstanding that at the first hearing of this cause, Marius had but ill successe, and that the Iudges were against him all they could: yet in the end for all that, at the last hearing of this matter, Marius, contrarie to all mens opinions, was discharged, because the Iudges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He vsed himselfe very orderly in his office of Prætorship, and after his yeare was out, when it came to deuide the prouinces by lot, Spaine fell vnto him, which is beyond the riuer of Bætis: where it is reported that he scowred all the country therabouts of theeues and robbers, which notwithstanding was yet very cruell and sauage, for the rude, barbarous, and vnciuill maner and fashion of life of the inhabitants there. For the Spaniards were of opinion euen at that time, that it was a goodly thing to liue vpon theft and robbery. At his returne to Rome out of Spaine, desiring to deale in matters of the cõmonwealth, he saw that he had neither eloquẽce nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which those that were at that time in credit and authoritie, did carie the people euen as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great account of his constancie and noble mind they found in him, of his great paines and trauell he tooke continually, and of the simplicitie of his life: which were causes to bring him to honour and preferm̃t, insomuch as he maried very highly. For he maried Iulia, that was of the noblest house of the Cæsars, and aunt vnto Iulius Cæsar: who afterwards came to be the chiefest man of all the Romaines, and who by reason of that alliance betweene them, seemed in some things to follow Marius, as we haue written in his life. Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be iudged by an act he did, putting himselfe into the hands of Surgeons. For his shankes and legges were full of great swollen veines, and being angrie because it was no pleasant thing to behold, he determined to put himselfe into the hands of Surgeons to be cured. And first, laying out one of his legges to the Surgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in like case: but patiently abode all the extreame paines a man must of necessitie feele being cut, without stirring, groning or sighing, still keeping his countenance, and said neuer a word. But when the Surgeon had done with his first legge, and would haue gone to the other, he would not giue it him: nay said he, I see the cure is not worth the paine I must abide. Afterwards Cæcilius Metellus the Consull, being appointed to go into Africke to make warre with king Iugurth, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenants. Marius being there, seeing notable good seruice to be done, and occasion to shew his manhood, was not of mind in this voyage to increase Metellus honour and reputation, as other Lieutenants did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him foorth for his Lieutenant, but Fortune her selfe that presented him a fit occasion to raise him to greatnes, and (as it were) did lead him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the proofe of that he could do. And for this cause therefore, he endeuoured himselfe to shew all the possible proofes of valiantnesse and honour he could. For the wars being great continually there, he neuer for feare refused any attempt or seruice, how daungerous or painefull soeuer it were, neither disdained to take any seruice in hand, were it neuer so litle: but exceeding all other his fellowes and companions in wisedome and foresight, in that which was to be done, and striuing with the meanest souldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, he wan the goodwill & fauor of euery man. For to say truly, it is a great comfort & refreshing to soldiers that labour, to haue companions that labour willingly with them. For they thinke, that their company labouring with them, doth in maner take away the compulsion and necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the Romaine souldier maruellously to see the generall eate openly of the same bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that himselfe is the first man to set his hand to any worke when a trench is to be cast, or their campe to be fortified. For they do not so much esteeme the Captaines that honour and reward them, as they do those that in daungerous attempts, labour and venture their liues with them. And further, they do farre better loue them that take pains with them, then those that suffer them to liue idlely by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the loue and goodwils of his souldiers: he straight filled all Lybia and the city of Rome with his glory, so that he was in euery mans mouth. For they that were in the campe in Africke, wrote vnto them that were at Rome, that they should neuer see the end of those wars against this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and chose him Consull. These things misliked Metellus very much, but specially the misfortune that came vpon Turpilius did maruellously trouble him: which fell out in this sort: Turpilius was Metellus friend, yea he and all his parents had followed Metellus in this warre, being maister of the workes in his campe. Metellus made him gouernor ouer the city of Vacca, a goodly great city: and he vsing the inhabitants of the same very gently and curteously, mistrusted nothing till he was fallen into the hands of his enemies through their treason. For they had brought king Iugurth into their city vnknowing to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but only begged him of the king, and let him go his way safe. And this was the cause why they accused Turpilius of treason. Marius being one of his Iudges in the counsell, was not cõtented to be bitter to him himself, but moued many of the counsel besides to be against him: so that Metellus by the voyces of the people, was driuen against his will to condemne him to suffer as a traitor: and shortly after it was found and proued, that Turpilius was wrongfully condemned and put to death. To say truly, there was not one of the counsell but were very sorie with Metellus, who maruellous impatiently tooke the death of the

the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily reioyced, and tooke it vpon him that he purſued his death, and was not aſhamed to make open vants, that he had hanged a furie about Metellus neck, to reuenge his friends bloud, whom he guiltleſſe had cauſed to be put to death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they ſay, that one day Metellus to mocke him with all, ſaid vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leaue vs then, and returne to ROME to ſue for the Conſulſhip: and canſt thou not be contented to tarie to be Conſull with my ſon? Now his ſon at that time was but a boy. But howſoeuer the matter went, Marius left him not ſo, but laboured for leaue all he could poſſible. And Metellus after he had vſed many delayes and excuſes, at the length gaue him leaue, twelue daies only before the day of election of the Conſuls. Wherfore Marius made haſt, and in two daies and a night came from the campe to VTICA vpon the ſea ſide, which is a maruellous way from it: and there before he tooke ſhip, did ſacrifices vnto the gods, & the Sooth-ſayer told him, that the gods by the ſignes of his ſacrifices, did promiſe him vncredible proſperity, and ſo great, as he himſelf durſt not hope after. Theſe words made Marius hart greater: wherupon he hoiſſed ſaile, and hauing a paſſing good gale of wind in the poope of the ſhip, paſſed the ſeas in foure daies, and being landed, rode poſt to ROME. When he was arriued, he went to ſhew himſelfe vnto the people: who were maruellous deſirous to ſee him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accuſations which he obiected againſt Metellus, in the end he beſought the people to chuſe him Conſull, promiſing that within few daies he would either kill, or take king Iugurth priſoner. Whereupon he was choſen Conſull without any contradiction. And ſo ſoone as he was proclaimed, he began immediatly to leauie men of war, cauſing many poore men that had nothing, and many ſlaues alſo, to be enrolled againſt the order of auncient cuſtome: where other Captaines before him did receiue no ſuch manner of men, and did no more ſuffer vnworthy men to be ſouldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the commonwealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goods behind them, as a pledge of their good ſeruice abroad in the wars. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be moſt hated, but they were his ſtout proud words full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offend the noble men in the city. For he proclaimed it euery where abroad as it were, that his Conſulſhip was a ſpoile he had gotten of the effeminate rich noble men through his valiantneſſe, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for the ſeruice of the cõmonwealth, were thoſe that recommended him to the people, and were his ſtrength, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images & ſtatues of others. And oft times naming Albinus, and otherwhile Beſtia, both noble men, and of great houſes, who hauing bene Generals of the ROMAINE armie, had very ill fortune in the countrey of LYBIA: he called them cowards and ſimple ſouldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their anceſtors would rather haue wiſhed to haue left their children that came of them like vnto himſelf, then ſuch as they had bene: conſidering that they themſelues had won honour and glory, not for that they were deſcended of noble bloud, but through their deſerued vertue and valiant deedes. Now Marius ſpake not theſe words in a fooliſh brauerie, and for vaine glory onely, to purchaſe the ill will of the nobilitie for nothing: but the common people being very glad to ſee him ſhame and deſpite the Senate, and meaſuring alwaies the greatneſſe of his courage with his haughty fierce words, they egged him forward ſtill not to ſpare the nobility, and to reproue the great men, ſo that he euer held with the communaltie. And furthermore, when he was paſſed ouer againe into AFRICKE, it ſpited Metellus to the heart, becauſe that he hauing ended all the warre, that there remained almoſt no more to take or win, Marius ſhould come in that ſort to take away the glory and triumph out of his hands, hauing ſought to riſe and increaſe by vnthankfulneſſe towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went another way, and left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenants, to deliuer the ſame vnto him. Howbeit, the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the end vpon Marius owne necke: for Sylla tooke out of Marius hands the honor of ending this war, euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, and after what ſort, I will repeat it in few words, becauſe we haue written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father in law vnto king Iugurth, vnto whom he gaue no great aide, whilſt he made wars with the ROMAINS, becauſe he hated his vnfaithfulneſſe, and feared leſt he would make himſelf greater then he was: but in the end, after Iugurth had fled, and wandred vp and downe in euery place, he was conſtrained of very neceſſity to caſt his laſt hope and anker vpon him, as his finall refuge, and ſo repaire vnto him. King Boc- chus receiued him rather for ſhame, becauſe he durſt not puniſh him, then for any loue or good will he bare him: and hauing him in his hands, ſeemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and ſecretly to write the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practiſed treaſon vnder hand, and ſent priuily for Lucius Sylla, who then was Quæſtor (to ſay, high treaſurer) vnder Marius, and of whom he had receiued certaine pleaſures in thoſe warres. Sylla truſting to this barbarous king, went at his ſending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promiſe, and altered his mind, ſtanding many daies in doubt with himſelfe how to reſolue, whether he ſhould deliuer king Iugurth, or keepe Sylla himſelfe: yet at the laſt he went on with his purpoſe and intented treaſon, and deliuered king Iugurth aliue into Syllaes hands. And this was the firſt originall cauſe of the peſtilent and mortall enmitie that grew afterwards betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to haue vtterly ouerthrowne the citie of Rome, and to haue razed the foundation of the empire vnto the ground. For many enuying the glorie of Marius, gaue it out euery where, that this act of the taking of king Iugurth, appertained only vnto Sylla: and Sylla himſelfe cauſed a ring to be made, which he ware commonly, and had grauen vpon the ſtone of the ſame, how Bocchus deliuered Iugurth into his hands. And afterwards he made it alwayes his ſeale to deſpite Marius withall, who was an ambitious and proud man, and could abide no companion to be partaker of the glory of his doings: and Sylla did it eſpecially at the procurement of enemies and ill willers, who gaue the glory of the beginning and chiefe exploits of this war, vnto Metellus, and the laſt and finall concluſion vnto Sylla, to the end that the people ſhould not haue Marius in ſo great eſtimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuie, detraction and hatred againſt Marius, was ſoone after extinguiſhed and troden vnder foote, by reaſon of the great daunger that fell vpon all Italy out of the Weſt: and they neuer ſpake of it afterwards, knowing that the commonwealth ſtood in need of a good Captaine, and that they began to looke about, and conſider who ſhould be that great wiſe Pylot, that might ſaue and preſerue it from ſo great and dangerous a ſtorme of warre. For there was not a noble man of all the auncient houſes of Rome, that durſt vndertake to offer himſelfe to demand the Conſulſhip: but Marius being abſent, was choſen Conſull the ſecond time. For Iugurth was no ſooner taken, but newes came to Rome of the comming downe of the Teutons, and of the Cimbres, the which would not be beleeued at the firſt, by reaſon of the infinite number of the fighting men which was ſaid to be in their company, and for the vncredible force and power of the armies which was iuſtified to come: but afterwards they knew plainely, that the rumour that ran abroad was leſſe then the truth fell out indeed. For they were three hundred thouſand fighting men all armed, who brought with them alſo another multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandred vp and downe ſeeking countries and townes to dwell and liue in, as they heard ſay the Gaules had done in old time, who leauing their owne countrie, came, and had poſſeſſed the beſt part of Italy, which they had taken away from the Thvscans. Now to ſay truly, no man knew of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no friendſhip with any other people, as alſo becauſe they came out of a farre country, as a cloud of people that was ſpread all ouer Gaule and Italy. It was doubted much they were a people of Germanie, dwelling about the North ſea: and this they coniectured by view of the greatnes of their bodies, and alſo for that they had dark blue eyes and red, beſides that the Germains in their tong do cal theeues and robbers, Cimbres. Other ſay that Celtica, for the great length & largenes of the country, ſtretching it ſelfe from the coaſt of the great Ocean ſea, & from the north parts, drawing towards the mariſhes Mœotides, and the Eaſt, runneth into Scythia, or Tartaria Pontica: and that for neighborhood theſe two nations ioyned together, and went out of their countrey, not that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many ſundry times, marching yerely in the ſpring further and further into the country. And thus by continuance of time, they paſſed by force of armes through all the firme land of Evrope: and that for this cauſe, although they had many particular names according to the diuerſitie of their nations, yet all this maſſe & multitude of people gathered together, were called notwithſtanding, the army of the Celtoscythes, as who would ſay, the Celtotartares. Other hold opinion that the nation of the Cimmerians, who were known in old time for ancient Grecians, the one part of them were not very great in reſpect of the whole, the which being fled (or driuen out of their country for ſome ciuill diſſention) were compelled by the Tartares to paſſe beyond the mariſhes Mœotides, into the countries of Asia, vnder the conduction of a captain called Ligdamis.

But

But the residue of them which were a far greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furthest parts of the earth, adioyning vnto the great Ocean sea, in a darke shadowed country couered with wonderfull forrests, of such length, and so great and thicke, and the trees so high, that the Sun can haue no power vpon the ground, and they ioyne hard vpon the great forrest of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder such a climate, where the pole is of such a height by the inclination of the circles equidistant, which they call Parallelles, that it is not farre from the point that answereth directly to the plummet vpon the head of the inhabitants: and where the dayes are equinoctiall. They do deuide all their time in two parts, the which giueth Homer occasion to faine, that when Vlysses would call vpon the dead, he went into the country of the CIMMERIANS, as into the country of hell. And this is the cause why they say these barbarous people left their owne countries to come into ITALY, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwards they say (and not without great likelihood) that they were surnamed CIMBRES: howbeit that is spoken rather by a likely coniecture, then by any assured troth of historie. And as for the multitude of men, the most part of historiographers do write, that they were rather mo then lesse, then we haue spoken of: and that they were so hardy and valiant, that nothing could stand before them, they did so great things by the strength of their hands, where they fought with any, so violently and so sodainly, that they seemed to be like a lightning fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durst resist them, but scraped together and caried away all that they found, hand ouer head: and there were many ROMAINE captaines appointed gouernors to keepe that, which the ROMAINES held in GAVLE beyond the mountaines, who with great armies were shamefully ouerthrowne by them. The cowardlinesse of those whom they had ouercome, was the chiefest cause that moued them to direct their iourney to ROME. For when they had vanquished the first they fought withall, & gotten great riches also: they were so fleshed by this, that they determined to stay no where before they had destroyed ROME, and sacked all ITALY. The ROMAINES hearing of this out of all parts, sent for Marius to giue him the conduction and leading of these wars, and chose him Consul the second time: notwithstanding that it was directly against the law, that did expresly forbid any man to be chosen being absent, and vntill also a certaine time appointed had past betweene the vacation and election, before they could chuse him officer twise in one office. Some alleadged this law, of intent to hinder the election: but the people repulsed them, obiecting to the contrarie, that this was not the first time the law had giuen place to the benefit of the commonwealth, and that the occasion offered to abrogate the law at that present was no lesse, then former occasions by the which they chose Scipio Consull, against the course and time appointed by the lawe, not for any feare they stood in to lose their owne country, but for the desire they had to destroy the country of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason whereof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his army againe out of LYBIA into ITALY, tooke possession of his Consulship the first day of Ianuary (on which day the ROMAINES begin their yeare) and therewithall made his triumph into the city of ROME, shewing that to the ROMAINS, which they thought neuer to haue seene: and that was, king Iugurth prisoner, who was so subtill a man, and could so well frame himselfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and subtiltie was of so great courage besides, that none of his enemies euer hoped to haue had him aliue. But it is said, that after he was led in this triumph, he fell mad straight vpon it: and the pompe of triumph being ended, he was caried into prison, where the sergeants for hast to haue the spoile of him, tare his apparell by force from off his backe: and becausethey would take away his rich gold eare-rings that hung at his eares, they pulled away with them the tippe of his eare, and then cast him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wits being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he said: O Hercules, how cold are your stoues? He liued there yet sixe daies, fighting with hunger, and desiring alwaies to prolong his miserable life vnto the last houre: the which was a iust deserued punishment for his wicked life. In this triumph were caried (as they say) three thousand and seuen hundred pound weight in gold, and of siluer niggots, fiue thousand seuen hundred and lxxv. pound weight: & more in gold and ready coine, eight and twenty thousand and seuen hundred crownes. After this triumph Marius caused the Senate to assemble within the Capitoll, where he entred into the company with his triumphing robe, either because he forgot it, or else of too grosse & vnciuill arrogancie: but perceiuing that all the assembly misliked of it, he rose suddenly, and tooke his long Consuls gowne, and then returned quickly againe into his place. Furthermore, Marius departing to go to the wars, thought to traine his army by the way, and to harden his ſouldiers vnto labour, cauſing them to run euery way, making great long iournies, compelling each ſouldier to carie his owne furniture, and to prepare him neceſſary victuals to find himſelf withall: ſo that euer after they made a prouerb of it, & called ſuch as were painefull & willing to do that which they were commanded without grudging, Marius moiles. Other notwithſtanding, do ſhew another cauſe and beginning of this Prouerbe: for they ſay, that Scipio lying at the ſiege of the citie of NVMANTIA, would not only take view of the armour and horſes of ſeruice that were in his armie, but alſo of the moiles and other beaſts of burden, becauſe he would ſee how they were kept and furniſhed. So Marius brought his horſe and moile to the muſter which he kept himſelfe, fat, faire, and very well dreſt, and his moiles haire ſo ſlike and ſmooth, and therewithall ſo luſty and trim, as none of the reſt were like vnto them. Scipio took great pleaſure to ſee theſe beaſts ſo well kept, and in ſo good plight: inſomuch as he ſpake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words, this manner of talke was taken vp euer after, and became a common prouerbe: when they meane to mocke any man that is painefull, and giuen to ſore labour, making as though they would praiſe him, they call him Marius moile. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that theſe barbarous people (like in force to the beating backe of the raging ſeas) turned their firſt furie towards SPAINE: and that he in the meane ſpace had time and leiſure to traine and exerciſe his ſouldiers, to make them bold, and withall, himſelfe to be throughly knowne amongſt them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to offend, nor diſobey, then they found his rough commaunding, and ſharpe ſeueritie in puniſhing ſuch as ſlacke their dutie, both profitable and very neceſſary, beſides that it was alſo iuſt and reaſonable. Againe his great furie, his ſharpe words, and his fierce lookes after they had awhile bene vſed to them, by litle and litle they ſeemed nothing ſo fearefull to thē, as to their enemies. But the thing that pleaſed the ſouldiers more then all the reſt, was his iuſtice and vpright dealing: whereof they report ſuch an example: Marius had a nephew of his in his campe called Caius Lucius, who had charge of men in the army. This Lucius was taken for a marueilous honeſt man, ſauing that he had this foule vice in him, that he would be ſuddenly in loue with faire young boyes: and as at that time he fell in loue with a trim young ſtripling, called Trebonius, that ſerued vnder him, and hauing many times lewdly enticed him, and neuer could obtaine his purpoſe, at the laſt ſent for him one night by his ſeruant. The young man might not diſobey his captaine being ſent for, but preſently went vnto him. When he was come into his tent, and that his Captaine did ſtriue with all his force to do him villanie: he drew out his ſword, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his campe: who ſo ſoone as he returned, cauſed the Marſhall to bring the yong man before him. Many ſtepped forth ſtraight to accuſe him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale himſelfe, and to name many witneſſes, who had both ſeene and knowne how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him diſhonour, and how that he had continually reſiſted his abhominable motion, and would neuer yeeld himſelfe vnto him, for any gift or preſent he could offer him. Wherfore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, cauſed preſently one of thoſe crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vſed to be giuen to them that in a day of battell haue done ſome valiant deed, and he himſelfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble act, and at ſuch a time, as good and honeſt examples were requiſite. This iudgement of Marius being caried to ROME, ſtood him to great good purpoſe towards the obtaining of his third Conſulſhip: beſide alſo that they looked for the comming backe of theſe barbarous people about the ſpring, with whom the ROMAINE ſouldiers would not fight vnder any other captaine then Marius. Howbeit they came not ſo ſoone againe as they looked for them, but Marius paſſed ouer alſo the yeare of his third Conſulſhip. So time comming about againe for the election of new Conſuls, and his companion alſo being dead, he was driuen to go himſelfe vnto ROME, leauing the charge of his campe in his abſence vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that ſued for the Conſulſhip: but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the communaltie vnder his girdle as he would himſelfe, more then any of the other Tribunes, and being wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perſwaded the people to chuſe Marius Conſull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, ſeemed to refuſe it, ſaying that he would none of it, though the people choſe him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traitor, crying out, that his refuſall in ſuch a danger and time of neceſſitie, was an

apparant part to betray the common wealth. It was found ſtraight that this was a groſſe packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by ſuch as could ſee day at a litle hole. Neuertheleſſe, the people conſidering that their preſent troubles required Marius skill and good fortune in the warres, they made him Conſull the fourth time, and ioyned Catulus Luctatius Conſull with him, a man that was greatly honoured of the Nobilitie, and not miſliked alſo of the common people. Marius hauing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, paſſed ouer the Alpes with great ſpeed, and fortifying his camp by the riuer of RHONE, he brought great prouiſion of all kinds of victuals thither with him, leaſt being ſtraighted by lacke thereof, he ſhould be forced to come to battel at any other time but euen as he would himſelf, & as it ſhould ſeeme good vnto him. And where before that time the tranſporting of victuals vnto his camp by ſea was very long, and dangerous, and a maruellous great charge beſides: he made it very ſhort and eaſie by this meanes. The mouth of the riuer of RHONE had gathered together ſo much mud, and ſuch ſtore of ſand, which the waues of the ſea had caſt on heapes together, that the ſame was become very high and deep: ſo as the banks made the entry into it very narrow, hard, & dãgerous for great ſhips of burdẽ that came from the ſea. Marius conſidering this matter, ſet his men a worke while they had nothing to do, and made them digge a large trench and deepe channell, into the which he turned a great part of the riuer, and caried it to a conuenient place of the coaſt, where the water fell into the ſea by an open gulfe, whereby he made it able to carie the greateſt ſhips that were: and beſides that, it was in a very ſtill quiet place, not being troubled with winds nor waues. The channell carieth yet his name, and is call Marius channell or trench. Theſe barbarous people deuided themſelues into two armies to paſſe into ITALIE, ſo that it fell out to the one part which were the CIMBRES, to go through high GERMANIE, and to force that paſſage which Catulus kept: and vnto the other part, which were the TEVTONS and AMBRONS, to paſſe through the countrey of the GENOVESIANS by the ſea ſide againſt Marius. Now the CIMBRES hauing the greater compaſſe to fetch about, ſtayed longer, and remained behind: but the TEVTONS and the AMBRONS going their way firſt, had in few dayes diſpatched their iourney they had to go, to bring them to the campe where the ROMAINES lay, vnto whom they preſented themſelues by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to behold, and their cries and voices farre contrary vnto other mens. They tooke in a maruellous deale of ground in length to campe vpon, and ſo came forth to defie Marius and prouoke him to battell in open field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragging defiances, but kept his men together within his camp, taking on terribly with them that would raſhly take vpon them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impatience of choller would needs go forth to fight, calling them traitors to their country. For ſaid he, we are not come to fight for our priuate glorie, neither to winne triumphs nor victories for our ſelues: but we muſt ſeeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great ſhower of warres from vs, and this lightning and tempeſt, that it ouercome not all ITALY. Theſe words he ſpake vnto the priuate captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauiour and qualitie: but as for the common ſouldiers, he made them ſtand vpon the trenches of his campe, one after another to behold the enemies, and to acquaint themſelues with ſight of their faces, their countenance, and marching, and not to be afraid of their voices, & the maner of their ſpeech, which was wonderful ſtrange and beaſtly: and alſo that they might know the faſhion of their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order and ordinarie viewing of them, in time he made the things that ſeemed fearefull vnto his men at the firſt ſight, to be afterwards very familiar: ſo that they made no more wondring at them. For he iudged, the thing which indeed is true, that a rare and new matter neuer ſeene before, for lack of iudgement & vnderſtanding maketh things vnknowne to vs, more horrible and fearefull then they are: and to the contrary, that cuſtome taketh away a great deale of feare, and terror of thoſe things, which by nature are indeed fearefull. The which was ſeene then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to looke vpon theſe barbarous people, it did not only diminiſh ſome part of the former feare of the ROMAINE ſouldiers: but furthermore, they whetting their choller with the fierce vntollerable threats and bragges of theſe barbareus brutiſh people, did ſet their hearts afire to fight with them, becauſe they did not only waſt and deſtroy all the country about them, but beſides that, came to giue aſſault euen vnto their campe, with ſuch a boldneſſe, that the ROMAINE ſouldiers could no longer ſuffer them, and they letted not to ſpeake words that came to Marius eares himſelf: What cowardlineſſe hath Marius euer knowne in vs, that he keepes vs thus from fighting, and vnder locke and key as it were, in the gard of porters, as if we were women?

Marius fourth Conſulſhip with Catulus Luctatius. Rhodanus fl.

Marius channell.

The Cimbres went through Germanie into Italie. The Teutons and Ambrons fall vpon Marius to paſſe into Italy, through the territorie of Genua.

Let vs therefore ſhew our ſelues like men, and go aske him if he looke for any other ſouldiers, beſides our ſelues to defend ITALY: and if he haue determined to employ vs as pioners only, when he would caſt a trench to rid away the mud, or to turne a riuer contrary. For therein hath he only hitherto employed vs in great labour, and they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Conſulſhips, whereof he maketh his boaſt vnto them at ROME. Is he afraid they ſhould take him as they did Carbo & Cæpio, whom the enemies haue ouerthrowne? He muſt not be afraid of that: for he is a captain of another maner of valour and reputation then they were, and his army much better then theirs was. But howſoeuer it be, yet were it much better (in prouing) to looſe ſomething, then to be idle, and to ſuffer our friends & confederats to be deſtroyed and ſacked before our eyes. Marius was maruellous glad to heare his men complaine thus, and did comfort them, and told them that he did nothing miſtruſt their courage and valiantneſſe: howbeit that through the counſell of certaine prophecies and oracles of the gods, he did expect time and place fit for victorie. For he euer caried a SYRIAN woman in a litter about with him called Martha, with great reuerence, whom they ſaid had the ſpirit of prophecie in her: and that he did euer ſacrifice vnto the gods by her order, and at ſuch time as ſhe willed him to do it. This SYRIAN woman went firſt to ſpeake with the Senate about theſe matters, and did foretell and prognoſticate what ſhould follow: but the Senate would not heare her, and made her to be driuen away. Whereupon ſhe went vnto the women, and made them ſee proofe of ſome things ſhe vaunted of, and ſpecially Marius wife, at whoſe feete ſhe was ſet one day in aſſembly of the cõmon playes, to ſee the ſword players fight for life & death: for ſhe told her certainly which of them ſhould ouercome. Wherupon this Ladie ſent her vnto her husband Marius, who made great reckning of her, and caried her euer in a litter with him whereſoeuer he went. She was alwaies at Marius ſacrifices, apparelled in a gowne of purple in graine, claſped to her with claſpes, & held a ſpeare in her hand wound all about with noſegayes, & garlands of flowers tied on with laces. This maner of geſt made many doubt whether Marius ſhewed this woman openly, beleeuing indeed that ſhe had the gift of prophecie: or elſe that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleeue it, to helpe her faining. But that which Alexander the MINDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wondred at. For he ſaid, there were two of them followed Marius in his warres, and that they euer ſhewed themſelues and miſſed not, when he ſhould win any great battell, and that they did know them by latin collers they ware about their neckes, which the ſouldiers had tied about them, and afterwards let them go where they would: by reaſon whereof, they did know the ſouldiers againe, and it ſeemed alſo that they ſaluted them, and were very glad when they ſaw them, and perſwaded themſelues, that it was a ſigne & token of good lucke to follow. Many ſignes and tokens were ſeene before the battell: howbeit all the reſt were ordinarie ſights, ſauing that which was reported to be ſeene at TVDERTVM, and AMERIA, two cities of ITALY. For they ſay, there were ſeene ſpeares & targets in the night, burning like fire in the element, which firſt were caried vp and down here & there, and then met together euen as men moue and ſtir that fight one with another, vntill at the length, the one giuing backe, and the other following after, they all vaniſhed away, and conſumed towards the Weſt. About the ſelfeſame time alſo, there came from the citie of PESSINVNTA, Barabaces, the chiefe prieſt of the great mother of the gods, who brought news, that the goddeſſe had ſpoken to him within her ſanctuarie, and told him that the victorie of this war ſhould fall out on the ROMAINES ſide. The Senate beleeued it, & ordained that they ſhould build a temple vnto that goddeſſe, to giue her thankes for the victorie which ſhe did promiſe thẽ. Barabaces alſo would haue preſented himſelfe vnto the people in open aſſembly, to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune that would not ſuffer him to do it, calling him tumbler or iugler, and violently thruſt him behind the pulpit for orations: but the miſchance that fel vpon Pompeius afterwards, made them the more to beleeue Barabaces words. For Pompeius the Tribune no ſooner came home vnto his houſe, but a great vehement ague tooke him, wherof he died the ſeuenth day after, as all the world could witneſſe. Now the TEVTONS perceiuing that Marius ſtirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to aſſault him: howbeit they were ſo well receiued with ſhot and ſlings, that after they had loſt certaine of their men, they gaue it ouer, and determined to go further, perſwading themſelues that they might eaſily paſſe the Alpes without danger. Wherefore truſſing vp all their baggage, they paſſed by Marius campe: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruellous great multitude of people, by the length of time which they took to paſſe their way. For it is ſaid, they were paſſing by his camp ſixe dayes continually together. And as they came raking by the Romaines campe, they asked them in mockerie, if they would write or ſend home any thing to their wiues, for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all paſſed and gone, and continued on their iourney ſtill, Marius alſo raiſed his campe, and followed them faire and ſoftly foot by foote, and euer kept hard at their taile as neare as he could, alwayes fortifying his campe very well, and euer chuſing ſtrong places of ſituation and aduantage to lodge in, that they might be ſafe in the night time. So they marched on in this ſort, vntil they came vnto the citie of Aix, from whence they had not far to go, but they entred ſtraight into the mountaines of the Alpes: wherfore Marius prepared now to fight with them, and choſe out a place that was very ſtrong of ſituation to lodge his campe in, howbeit there lacked water. And they ſay he did it of purpoſe, to the end to quicken his mens courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and told him that they ſhould ſtand in great danger to abide maruellous thirſt if they lodged there. Whereunto he made anſwer: ſhewing them the riuer that ran hard by the enemies campe, ſaying withall, that they muſt go thither and buy drinke with their bloud. The ſouldiers replied againe: and why then do ye not leade vs thither, whileſt our bloud is yet moiſt? He gently anſwered them againe: becauſe the firſt thing we do, we muſt fortifie our campe. The ſouldiers though they were angrie with him, yet they obeyed him: but the ſlaues hauing neither drinke for themſelues, nor for their cattell, gathered together a great troupe of them, and went towards the riuer: ſome of them carying axes, other hatchets, other ſwords and ſpeares, with their pots to carie water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwiſe they could not come by it. A few of the barbarous people at the firſt fought with them, becauſe the moſt part of their companie were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were ſtil in the bathe waſhing themſelues, finding in that place many ſprings of hot natural bathes. Thus the Romaines found many of the barbarous people making merrie, and taking their pleaſure about theſe bathes, for the great delight they tooke to conſider the pleaſantneſſe of the place: but when they heard the noiſe of them that fought, they began to runne one after another vnto the place from whence the noiſe came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keepe the Romaine ſouldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their ſlaues ſhould haue bene ſlaine of the barbarous people: and moreouer, becauſe the valianteſt ſoldiers of their enemies called the Ambrons (who before had ouercome Manlius and Cæpio, two Romaine Captaines with their armies, and that made of themſelues thirtie thouſand fighting men) ran to armes, being very heauie of their bodies, as hauing filled their bellies well, but otherwiſe valiant and couragious fellows, and more liuely then they were wont to be, by reaſon of the wine they had drunk. They ran not furiouſly to fight out of order, neither did they crie out confuſedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noiſe with their harneſſe all after one ſort, they oft rehearſed their owne name, Ambrons, Ambrons, Ambrons: which was, either to call one another of them, or elſe to feare the Romaines with their name onely. The Italians alſo on the other ſide, being the firſt that came downe to fight with them, were the Ligvrians, dwelling vpon the coaſt of Genva, who hearing this noiſe and crie of theirs, plainly vnderſtanding them: anſwered them againe with the like noiſe & crie, Ligvrians, Ligvrians, Ligvrians, ſaying, that it was the true ſurname of all their nation. And ſo before they ioyned together, this crie was redoubled many a time on either ſide: and the Captaines of both parts made their ſouldiers crie out all together, contẽding for enuy one againſt another, who ſhould crie it loudeſt. This contention of crying, inflamed the ſouldiers courages the more. Now the Ambrons hauing the riuer to paſſe, were by this meanes put out of order, & before they could put themſelues in battell ray againe, after they had paſſed the riuer, the Ligvrians ran with great fury to ſet vpon the foremoſt: and after them, (to aide the Ligvrians that had begun the charge) the Romaines themſelues fell alſo vpon the Ambrons, comming downe from the places of aduantage vpon theſe barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backes, and flie. So the greateſt ſlaughter they made, fortuned vpon the banke of the riuer, whereinto they thruſt one another in ſuch ſort, that all the riuer ran bloud, being filled with dead bodies. And they that could get ouer the riuer againe, and were on the other ſide, durſt not gather together any more to ſtand to defence: ſo as the Romaines ſlue them, and draue them into their campe, euen vnto their cariage. Then their women came out againſt them with ſwords and axes in their hands, grinding their teeth: and crying out for ſorrow and anger, they charged aſwell vpon their owne people that fled, as vpon them that chaſed them: the one as traitors, and the other as enemies.

The mannifiſneſſe of the women.

Furthermore, they thruſt themſelues amongſt them that fought, and ſtroue by force to pluck the Romaines targets out of their hands, and took hold of their naked ſwords bare handed, abiding with an inuincible courage to be hacked and mangled with their ſwords. And thus was the firſt battell giuen (as they ſay) by the riuers ſide, rather by chance vnlooked for, then by any ſet purpoſe, or through the Generals counſell. Now the Romaines after they had ouercome the moſt part of the Ambrons, retiring backe by reaſon the night had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had giuen ſuch an ouerthrow) ſing ſongs of victorie & triumph, nor make good cheare in their tents one with another, and leaſt of all ſleep: (which is the beſt and ſweeteſt refreſhing for men that haue fought happily) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, becauſe their camp was not trenched & fortified, and becauſe they knew alſo that there remained almoſt innumerable thouſands of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: beſides alſo, that the Ambrons that had fled and ſcaped from the ouerthrow, did howle out all night with loud cries, which were nothing like mens lamentations and ſighes, but rather like wild beaſts bellowing and roaring. So that the bellowing of ſuch a great multitude of beaſtly people, mingled together with threats and wailings, made the mountaines thereabouts and the running riuer to redound againe of the ſound and eccho of their cries maruellouſly: by reaſon whereof, all the valley that lay betweene both, thundred to heare the horrible and fearefull trembling. This made the Romaine ſouldiers afeard, and Marius himſelf in ſome doubt: becauſe they looked to haue bene fought withall the ſame night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithſtanding, the barbarous people did not aſſault them that night, nor the next day following, but onely prepared themſelues vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there was aboue the place where they were camped, certaine caues and litle valleys couered with wood: he ſecretly ſent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thouſand footmen well armed, and commanded him to keepe cloſe in ambuſh, vntil he ſaw that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he ſhould come and ſet vpon their rereward. The reſidue of his armie, they ſupped when time came, and after ſupper repoſed themſelues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the field out of his fort: where he put them in order of battell, ſending his horſemen before to draw the enemies out to skirmiſh. The Teutons ſeeing them come, had not the patience to tarie till the Romaines were come downe into the plaine field to fight without aduantage, but arming themſelues in haſte, and in a rage, ran vp the hil to the Romaines, where they ſtood in battel ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, ſent here and there vnto the priuate captaines, charging them they ſhould not ſtirre, and onely to temporize & forbeare, vntil the enemies came within a ſtones caſt of them: and that they ſhould then throw their darts at them, and afterwards draw their ſwords, and repulſe the barbarous people with their ſhields. For he did foreſee, that when they ſhould clime vp againſt the hill (vpon the hanging whereof the Romaines had ſet their battel) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and rankes could ſtand cloſe together to any effect or purpoſe: becauſe they could not haue ſure footing, nor march aſſuredly, but would eaſily be throwne backward if they were neuer ſo litle repulſed, by reaſon of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vnto his folke, and therewithall was himſelf the firſt man that put it in execution: for he was as trim a warrier, and as valiant a ſouldier, as any man in all his army: beſides, not one amongſt them all would venture further, and be more bold then himſelfe. So when the Romaines had reſiſted them, and ſtaid them ſodainly, going with furie to haue won the hill, perceiuing themſelues to be repulſed, they gaue backe by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field, and then began the foremoſt of them to gather together, and to put themſelues in battel ray vpon the plaine, when ſodainly they heard the noiſe and charging of them that were in the taile of their armie. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occaſion when it was offered him, becauſe that the noiſe of the firſt charge comming vp againſt the hils thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambuſh, gaue him aduertiſement thereof: whereupon he cauſed his men preſently to ſhew, & running with great cries, came to giue a charge vpō thoſe which were in the taile of the barbarous people, putting the hindmoſt to the ſword. They made their fellows whoſe backs were next vnto them, to turne their faces, and ſo from man to man, til at the length in ſhort time all their battel began to wauer in diſorder: and they made no great reſiſtance, when they ſaw they were ſo charged before & behind, but began ſtraight to flie for life. The Romaines following them hard at the heels, killed & tooke priſoners aboue a hundred thouſand of them, and took moreouer their carts, their tents & all their cariage.

Marius ſecond battell with the Teutons.

Marius victory of the Teutons and Ambrons.

Which

Which the whole armie by conſent agreed to preſent vnto Marius, excepting nothing, ſauing that which was inbezelled and conueied away vnder hand. Now, though this was a maruellous honorable & right noble preſent, yet they thought it not a recompence ſufficient for that he had deſerued, for the valour he had ſhewed of a famous Captaine, in leading of his armie, and for the good order he kept in this war: ſo happy thought they themſelues to haue eſcaped ſo great a danger. Notwithſtanding, ſome writers do not agree, that the ſpoile of the barbarous people was giuen vnto Marius: nor that there were alſo ſo great a number of men ſlaine as we haue ſpoken of. But they ſay, that after this battell, the MARSILLIANS did incloſe their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that the bodies being rotten and conſumed vpon the fields through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the gronnd waxed ſo fat, and did ſoake the greaſe ſo deepe in the ſame, that the ſommer following they did beare an incredible quantitie of all ſorts of fruites. And by this meanes were Archilocus words proued true, that the arable land doth wax fat with ſuch rottenneſſe or putrifaction. And it is ſaid alſo, that of ordinarie after great battels, there falleth great ſtore of raine. Either it is by meane of ſome god, that powring downe pure raine water, doth purifie, waſh, and cleanſe the ground, defiled & polluted with mans bloud: or elſe it happeneth by naturall cauſe: for that the ouerthrow of ſo many dead bodies, and of the bloud ſpilt, ingendreth a moiſt, groſſe, and heauy vapor, which doth thicken the aire (that by nature is changeable, and eaſie to alter) from a very ſmall or litle beginning, vnto an exceeding great change. After this battell, Marius cauſed the harneſſe and ſpoiles of the barbarous people to be laid aſide, that were left whole and faire to ſight, to beautifie and enrich the pomp of his triumph. Then he cauſed the reſt to be gathered together on a great heape, and laid vpon a ſtack of wood, to make a noble ſacrifice vnto the gods, all his armie being armed about him, crowned with garlands of triumph, & himſelfe apparelled in a long gowne of purple, according to the cuſtome of the ROMAINES in ſuch a caſe, & holding a torch burning in both his hands, which he firſt lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning down the torch to put fire to the ſtack of wood, they ſaw ſome of his friends a good way off on horſebacke, comming poſt vnto him: then ſodainly there was a great ſilence made of all the aſſembly, euery man deſirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted off their horſes, they ranne ſtraight to embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was choſen Conſull the fift time: and preſented him the letters ſent him from ROME confirming the ſame. And thus, this new ioy falling out beſides the victorie, the priuate ſouldiers did ſhew the great ioy and pleaſure they tooke in both, with great ſhouts and beating vpon their harneſſe: and the captaines alſo, they crowned Marius againe with new garlands of lawrel which they put about his head: & that done, he put fire vnder the ſtack of wood, and ended his ſacrifice. But that which neuer ſuffereth men quietly to enioy the good hap of any victorie clearely, but in this mortall life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either fortunne or ſpite of fatall deſtinie, or elſe the neceſſitie of the natural cauſes of earthly things: did ſhortly after this great ioy bring news vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Luctatius the other Conſul, who was like a cloud in a faire bright day, & brought the city of ROME againe into a new feare and trouble. For Catulus that went againſt the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keep the ſtraights of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for paſſing: becauſe that in ſo doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his armie into many parts, and had weakened himſelfe very much if he had taken that courſe. Wherfore comming a litle on this ſide the Alpes towards ITALY, he planted himſelfe vpon the riuer of ATHESIS, and built a bridge vpon it, to paſſe and repaſſe ouer his men when he would, and ſet vp at either end of the bridge two ſtrong forts well fortified, that he might more commodiouſly helpe the places on the other ſide of the riuer, if the barbarous people by chaunce would offer to force them, after they had gotten out of the ſtraights of the mountaines. Now, theſe barbarous people had ſuch a glorie in themſelues, and diſdained their enemies ſo much, that more to ſhew their force and boldneſſe, then of any neceſſitie that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they ſuffered it to ſnow vpon them being ſtarke naked, and did climbe vp to the top of the mountaines, through great heapes of yce and ſnow. And when they were at the very top of all, they layd their long broade targets vnder their bodies, and lay all along vpon them, ſliding downe the ſteepe high rockes, that had certaine hangings ouer of an infinit height. In the end, they came to the camp neare vnto the ROMAINES by the riuers ſide, and conſidered how they might paſſe it ouer: and began to fill it vp, tearing downe (like giants) great hils of earth which they found thereabouts, brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the rootes, threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake, and whole towers of earth after them, to ſtop and breake the courſe of the riuer. But beſides all this, they threw great timber into the riuer, which being caried downe the ſtreame, came with ſuch a force, and hit againſt the poſts of the bridge ſo violently, that they ſhaked the Romaines bridge maruellouſly. Whereupon many of the ſouldiers of the great campe were afraid, and forſaking it, began to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfect good Captaine ſhew, that he made leſſe account of his owne priuate honour and eſtimation, then he did of the generall honour of all his ſouldiers. For, ſeeing that he could not perſwade his men by any reaſon to tarie, and that in this feare they diſlodged, in diſorder againſt his will: he himſelfe commanded the ſtanderd bearer of the Eagle to march on, and ran to the formoſt that went their way, and marched himſelfe before them all, to the intent that the ſhame of this retire ſhould altogether light vpon him, and not vpon his countrey: and that it might appeare the Romaines did follow their captaine, & not flie away. The barbarous people therfore aſſaulting the fort at the end of the bridge of the riuer of Athesis, tooke it, & all the men that were in it. And becauſe the Romaines defended it like valiant men, and had luſtily ventured their liues to the death for defence of their country: the barbarous people let them go vpon compoſition, which they ſware to keepe faithfully, by their Bul of copper. This Bull afterwards was taken when they loſt the battell, and caried (as they ſay) into Catulus Luctatius houſe, as the chiefeſt thing of the victorie. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the country open without any defence, ſcattered here and there, and deſtroyed all where they came. Wherupon the Romaines ſent for Marius to Rome to go againſt them: and after he was arriued, euery man thought he ſhould haue entred in triumph, becauſe alſo the Senate did graunt it him very willingly. But he would not do it, either becauſe he would not depriue his ſouldiers and the captaines that had fought vnder him, of any part of the honour that was due vnto them, they being abſent: or becauſe that he would warrant the people from the preſent dãger they were in, by laying aſide the glorie of his former victories, into the hands of the good fortune of Rome, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards, by a more honorable and perfect confirmation of the ſecond. Wherefore after he had made an oration to the people and Senate, according to the time, he went his way immediatly towards Catulus Luctatius, whoſe comming did comfort him much: and ſent alſo for his armie that was yet in Gavle beyond the mountaines. And after his armie was come, he paſſed the riuer of Po, to keepe the barbarous people from hurting Italy on this ſide the Po. Now the Cimbres ſtill deferred to giue battell, becauſe they looked for the Tevtons, and ſaid: that they maruelled much what they meant to tary ſo long: either becauſe they knew not indeed of their ouerthrow, or elſe for that they would not ſeeme to know it, becauſe they handled them cruelly that brought the news of their deaths. At the length, they ſent vnto Marius to aske him lands and townes ſufficient to keepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambaſſadors what brethren they meant. They anſwered, that they were the Tevtons. Whereat the ſtanders by began to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them, ſaying: Care not for thoſe brethren, ſaid he, for we haue giuen thẽ ground enough, which they will keepe for euer. Theſe Ambaſſadorus found his mocke ſtraight, and began to reuile and threaten him, that the Cimbres ſhould preſently make him repent it, and the Tevtons ſo ſoone as they arriued. Why, ſaid Marius vnto them againe, they are come alreadie: and there were no honeſtie in you, if you ſhould go your way and not ſalute them, ſince they are your brethrẽ. And as he ſpake theſe words, he commanded his men to bring him the kings of the Tevtons bound and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the Sequani. The Cimeres vnderſtanding this by report of their Ambaſſadours, preſently marched towards Marius, who ſtirred not at all, but onely fortified and kept his campe. They ſay that it was for this battel that Marius firſt inuented the new deuice he brought in for the dart which the Romaines were wont alwayes to throw againſt the enemies at the firſt charge. For before, the ſtaffe of the dart was faſtened vnto the yron, and the yron vnto the ſtaffe, with two litle yron pins that paſſed through the wood: and then Marius left one of the yron pins as it was before, and taking away the other, put a litle thin pin of wood: eaſie to be broken, in place of the ſame, making it craftily, to the end that when the dart was throwne, and ſtucke in the enemies target, it ſhould not ſtand right forward, but bow downewards towards the yron, that the woodden pin being broken, the ſtaffe of the dart ſhould hang downewards, holding yet by the yron pin running quite through at the point. So Bœorix King of the Cimbres, comming neare to Marius campe with a ſmall ſmall number of horſemen, ſent him defiance, and willed him to appoint a day and place for battell, that they might trie it out, who ſhould be owners of the country. Whereunto Marius made anſwer, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to counſell with their enemies, of the time and place when they ſhould giue battell: but neuertheleſſe, he would not ſticke to pleaſure the CIMBRES ſo much. And thus they agreed betweene them, that it ſhould be the third day following, in the plaine of Verſelles, which was very commodious for the horſemen of the ROMAINES: and alſo for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Luctatius the other Conſul, had in his campe twenty thouſand, and three hundred ſouldiers: and Marius had in his campe two and thirty thouſand fighting men, which he placed in the two wings of the battell, ſhutting in Catulus with his men in the midſt; as Sylla writeth it, who was preſent at the ſame: ſaying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to ouerthrow his enemies with the two wings of the battell, to the end that the whole victorie ſhould light vpon his two wings, and that Catulus and his men in the midſt ſhould haue no part thereof. For he could not ſo much as front the enemie, becauſe that commonly when the front of a battell is of ſuch a breadth, the two wings are euer ſtretched out before, and are made like the creſſant of a moone, where the middeſt is thickeſt and fartheſt in. And it is written alſo in other ſtories, that Catulus himſelfe accuſing the malice of Marius, becauſe he did ſo: ſpake it to excuſe his owne diſhonour. As for the CIMBRES, the troupes of their footmen comming out of their fortes leiſurely, did put themſelues into a ſquadron, as broad as long, for in euery ſide they occupied almoſt thirty furlong: but their horſemen which were fifteene thouſand, marched before in ſumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heads faſhioned like wild beaſts necks, and ſtrange beuers or buffes to the ſame, and ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, as they had bene wings: which to ſight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curaſes on their backs, and caried great white targets before them: and for weapons offenſiue, euery man had two darts in his hand to beſtow a farre off, and when they came to hand ſtrokes, they had great heauy ſwords, which they fought withall neare hand. But at that time they did not march directly in ranke againſt the army of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to incloſe the ROMAINES betweene them and their footmen that were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Captaines found their pollicy ſtraight, but they could not keepe their ſouldiers backe: for there was one that cried, The enemies fled, and immediatly all the reſt began to run after. In the meane time, the footmen of the barbarous people that were like to a ſea before them, came forwards ſtill: and then Marius hauing waſhed his hands, and lifting them to heauen, promiſed and vowed a ſolemne ſacrifice vnto the gods of an hundred oxen. Catulus alſo made a vow, lifting vp his hands to heauen in like manner, that he would build a temple vnto Fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius hauing ſacrificed, when they ſhewed him the intrailes of the beaſts ſacrificed, he cried out aloude, The victory is mine. But when they came to giue the charge, Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred vpon him by Gods iuſtice, who turned his craft againſt himſelfe, as Sylla writeth: for there roſe very credibly ſo great a duſt, that both armies loſt the ſight one of another. And hereupon Marius being the firſt that ranne to begin the charge, and hauing placed his men about him, miſſed to meete with his enemies: and being paſſed beyond their battell, wandred a great while vp and downe the field, whileſt the barbarous people fought againſt Catulus. So that the greateſt furie of the battell was againſt Catulus and his armie: in the which, Sylla writeth he was himſelfe, and ſaith, that the heat and the Sun which was full in the CIMBRES faces, did the ROMAINES maruellous pleaſure at that time. For the barbarous people being very hard brought vp to away with cold (becauſe they were borne and bred in a cold countrey, ſhadowed altogether with woods and trees as we haue ſaid) were to the contrarie very tender againſt the heat, & did melt with ſweating againſt the Sun, and gaped ſtraight for breath, putting their targets before their faces: for it was alſo in the hart of ſommer, about the ſeuen and twentieth day of the moneth of Iuly that this battell was giuen, and this duſt alſo made the ROMAINS the bolder, and kept thē that they could not ſee the innumerable multitude of their enemies far from them. And euery man running to ſet vpon them that came againſt him, they were ioyned together in fight, before that the ſight of their enemies could make them afraid. And furthermore, they were ſo good ſouldiers, and ſo able to take paines, that how extreame ſoeuer the heate was, no man was ſeene ſweate nor blow, though they ran at the firſt to ſet vpon them: and this hath Catulus Luctatius himſelf left in writing vnto the praiſe of his ſoldiers. So were the moſt part of the barbarous people, and ſpecially of the beſt ſouldiers, ſlaine in the field. And becauſe they ſhould not open nor breake their rankes, the formoſt rancks were all tied and bound together with girdles, leather thongs, and long chaines of iron: and they that fled, were chaſed and followed into their campe by the Romaines, where they met with horrible and fearefull things to behold. For, their wiues being vpon the top of their carts, apparelled all in black, ſlue all thoſe that fled, without regard of perſons: ſome their fathers, other their husbands or their brethren, and ſtrangling the litle young babes with their owne hands, they caſt them vnder the cart wheeles, and betweene the horſe legs, and afterwards ſlue themſelues. And they ſay, that there was a woman hanged at the end of a cart ladder, hauing hanged vp two of her children by the neckes at her heeles. And that the men alſo, for lacke of a tree to hang themſelues on, tyed ſlipping halters about their neckes, vnto the hornes and feete of the oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwards with goades to make them fling and leape ſo long, that dragging them all about and treading them vnder feet, at the length they killed them. Now though numbers were ſlaine by this meanes, yet were there threeſcore thouſand of them taken priſoners, and the number of them that were ſlaine, came to twiſe as many moe. In this manner Marius ſouldiers ſpoiled the campe of the Cimberes: but the ſpoiles of dead men that were ſlaine in the field, with their enſignes and trumpets, were all brought (as it is ſaid) vnto Catulus campe, which was a plaine teſtimonie to ſhew that Catulus and his ſouldiers had won the field. Strife riſing thus betweene the ſouldiers of both campes about it, that the matter might be tried friendly betweene them: they made the ambaſſadors of Parma their arbitrators, who were by chance at that time in the army. Catulus Luctatius ſoldiers led the ambaſſadors to the place where the ouerthrow was giuen, ſhewing them the enemies bodies pierced through with their pikes, which were eaſie to be knowne, becauſe Catulus had made them graue his name vpon their pikes. For all this, Marius went away with the honor of this great victory, as well for the firſt battell he wan alone, when he ouerthrew the Tevtons and the Amerons, as for his great calling, hauing bene Conſull fiue times. And furthermore, the common people at Rome, called him the third founder of the city of Rome, thinking themſelues now deliuered from as great a danger, as before time they had bene in from the ancient Gavles. And euery man feaſting at home with his wife and children, offred the beſt diſhes of meat they had to ſupper, vnto the gods, and vnto Marius: and would needes haue him alone to triumph for both victories. But he would not in any caſe, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Luctatius, meaning to ſhew himſelfe curteous and moderate in ſo great proſperitie: and peraduenture alſo fearing Catulus ſouldiers, who were in readineſſe and prepared (if Marius would haue depriued their captaine of that honor) to let him alſo of his triumph. And thus you ſee how he paſſed his fifth Conſulſhip. After that, he made more earneſt ſute for the ſixth Conſulſhip, then euer any other did for his firſt: ſeeking the peoples good wils by all the faire meanes he could to pleaſe them, humbling himſelfe vnto them, not only more then became his eſtate & calling, but directly alſo againſt his owne nature, counterfeiting a curteous popular maner, being cleane contrary to his diſpoſition. His ambition made him timerous to deale in matters of the ſtate concerning the city. For that courage and boldnes which he had in battell againſt the enemy, he loſt it quite when he was in an aſſembly of people in the city: and was eaſily put out of his biaſe, with the firſt blame or praiſe he heard giuen him. And though they report, that on a time when he made a thouſand Camerines free of the city of Rome, becauſe they had done valiant ſeruice in the warres, that there were ſome that did accuſe him, ſaying, that it was a thing done againſt all law: he anſwered them, that for the noiſe of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithſtanding, it ſeemeth that indeed he was greatly afeard of the fury of the people in an aſſembly of the city. For in time of wars, he euer ſtood vpō his reputation and authority, knowing that they had neede of him: but in peace and ciuill gouernement, becauſe he would rather be the chiefeſt man then the honeſteſt man, he would creepe into the peoples boſomes to get their fauor and goodwill. And thus through his euill behauior, he brought all the nobility generally to be his enemies. But he feared nor miſtruſted none ſo much, as he did Metellus, for the great vnthankful part he remēbred he had plaid him: and the rather alſo, becauſe he knew him to be a iuſt & true dealing man, and one that was euer againſt theſe people-pleaſers and flatterers. Marius therfore practiſed all the waies he could, to get Metellus to be baniſhed Rome. Wherfore, to compaſſe passe his intent, he fell in friendship with Glaucia and one Saturninus, two of the most boldest, most desperate, and most harebraind young men that were in all ROME, who had all the rabblement of rogues and beggers, and such tumultuous people at their commandement: by whose meanes he made new popular lawes, and caused the souldiers to be called home out of the wars, and mingled them with the people of the city in common assemblies, to trouble and vexe Metellus. Moreouer Rutilius, an honest and true writer, (howbeit an enemy vnto Marius) writeth, that he obtained his sixth Consulship by corruption of mony, which he caused to be distributed amongst the tribes of the people: and that he bought it for ready mony to put by Metellus, and to haue Valerius Flaccus not for his fellow and companion in the Consulship, but rather for a minister of his will. There was neuer ROMAINE to whom the people granted the Consulship sixe times, except it were vnto Valerius Coruinus only. But for him, they say that there was fiue and fortie yeares betweene his first Consulship and the last. Where Marius since the first yeare of his Consulship, continued fiue yeares together by good fortune one after another. But in his last Consulship, he wanne himselfe great hate and malice, because he did many foule faults to please Saturninus withall: as amongst others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his competitor in the Tribuneship. Afterwards when Saturninus was chosen Tribune of the people, he preferred a law for distribution of the lands among the common people, and vnto that law he had specially added one article: that all the Lords of the Senate should come openly to sweare, that they should keepe and obserue from point to point, that which the people by their voices should decree, and should not deny it in any iote. But Marius in open Senate, made as though he would withstand this article, saying, that neither he nor any other wise man of iudgment would take this oath: for said he, if the law be euill, then they should do the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to grant it, and not of their owne goodwils. But he spake not that, meaning to do as he said: for it was but a bait he had laid for Metellus only, which he could hardly escape. For, imagining that to tell a fine lye, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he was throughly resolued with himself, not to passe for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And to the contrary also, knowing wel inough that Metellus was a graue wise man, who esteemed that to be iust and true (as Pindarus said) is the beginning and foundation of great vertue: he thought he would ouerreach him, making him affirm before the Senate that he would not sweare, knowing also that the people would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwards to sweare. And so indeed it happened. For Metellus hauing assured them then that he would not sweare, the Senate brake vp vpon it. And shortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators vnto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to sweare before the people: Marius went thither to offer himselfe to sweare. Whereupon the people making silence, listened attentiuely to heare what he would say. But Marius not regarding his large promise and brags made before the Senate, said then, his necke was not so long that he would preiudice the commonwealth in a matter of so great importance: but that he would sweare, and obey the law, if it were a law. This shifting subtiltie he added to it, to cloke and couer his shame: and when he had said so, he tooke his oth. The people seeing him sweare, were maruellous glad, and praised him with clapping of their hands: but the nobilitie hanging downe their heads, were ashamed of him, and were maruellous angrie in their hearts with him, that he had so cowardly and shamefully gone from his word. Therupon all the Senate tooke their othes, one after another against their wils, because they were afraid of the people: sauing Metellus, whome, neither parents, nor friends perswasion and intreaty could once moue to sweare, for any punishment that Saturninus had imposed vpō them which refused to take the othe, but continued one man still according to his nature, and would neuer yeeld vnto it, offering to abide any paine, rather then to be brought to cōsent to a dishoneſt matter vnbeseeming his estate. And therupon went out of the assembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to do euill it was too easie a thing: and to do good without danger, it was also a common matter: but to do well with danger, that was the part of an honest and vertuous man. Saturninus then commaunded the Consuls by edict of the people, that they should banish Metellus by sound of trumpet, with speciall commandement, that no man shold let him haue fire nor water, nor lodge him priuately nor openly. The common people, they were ready to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noble men being offended for the iniurie they had offered him, gathered together about him to saue him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus himself was so good a man, that he wold not any ciuill dissentiō should riſe for his ſake: and therefore he abſented himſelfe from Rome, wherein he did like a wiſe man. For ſaid he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting themſelues of the wrong they haue done me, will call me home againe: or elſe things ſtanding as they do now, it ſhall be beſt for me to be furtheſt off. But for his trauell in his exile, how much he was beloued and honoured, and how ſweetly he paſſed his time ſtudying Philoſophie in the citie of Rhodes, ſhall be declared more at large in his life. Now on the other ſide, Marius to recompence the pleaſure Saturninus had done him, being driuen to let him haue his will in all things, did not foreſee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the commonwealth, giuing the bridle to a deſperat man, who euery way, by force, by ſword and murder, plainely ſought to vſurpe tyrannicall power, with the vtter deſtruction and ſubuerſion of the whole commonwealth. And ſo bearing reuerence on the one ſide vnto the nobility, and deſiring on the other ſide to gratifie the common people: he plaid a ſhamefull part, and ſhewed himſelfe a double dealing man. For one night the nobilitie and chiefeſt citizens comming to his houſe, to perſwade him to bridle Saturninus inſolencie and boldneſſe: at the ſelfe ſame time alſo Saturninus going thither to ſpeake with him, he cauſed him to be let in at a backe doore, the noble men not being priuy to his comming. And ſo Marius telling the nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a looſeneſſe of his body, vnder this pretence whipped vp and downe, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing elſe but ſet them further out one againſt another, then they were before. Neuertheles, the Senat being maruellous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knights taking part with the Senate, Marius in the end was compelled to arme the people in the market place, to ſuppreſſe them that were vp, and draue them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yeeld themſelus at the length, becauſe he had cut off the pipes and conduits, by the which the water ran vnto the Capitoll. By reaſon wherof, they being vnable to continue any longer, called Marius vnto them, and yeelded themſelues to him, vnder the aſſurance of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could poſſible to his vttermoſt power to ſaue them, he could not preuaile, nor do them pleaſure: for they were no ſooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Wherupon he hauing now purchaſed himſelf the ill will of the people and nobility both, when time came about that new Cenſors ſhould be choſen, euery man looked that he would haue bene one of the ſuters: howbeit he ſued not for it, for feare of repulſe, but ſuffered others to be choſen of far leſſe dignity and calling then himſelfe. Wherin notwithſtanding he gloried, ſaying, that he would not ſue to be Cenſor, becauſe he would not haue the ill will of many, for examining too ſtraightly their liues and manners. Againe, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus baniſhment, Marius did what he could poſſible by word and deed to hinder it: howbeit, ſeeing in the end he could not haue his will, he let it alone. The people hauing thus willingly reuoked Metellus baniſhment, Marius hart would not ſerue him to ſee Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: wherefore he tooke the ſeas to go into Cappadocia and Galatia, vnder colour to pay certaine ſacrifices to the mother of the gods, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cauſe that made him to vndertake this iourny, for he had another ſecret meaning in it. For his nature not being framed to liue in peace, and to gouerne ciuil matters, and hauing attained to his greatnes by armes, and ſuppoſing that his glory and authority conſumed and decreaſed altogether liuing idlely in peace, he ſought to deuiſe new occaſion of wars, hoping if he could ſtir vp the kings of Asia, and ſpecially Mithridates (who without his procurement was feared much, that one day he would make wars againſt the Romaines) that he ſhould then vndoubtedly without let of any man be choſen Generall to make wars with him, and withall alſo, that by that meanes he ſhould haue occaſion to fill the city of Rome with new triumphs, and his houſe with the ſpoiles of the great kingdome of Pont, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates diſpoſing himſelfe to entertaine Marius, with all the honor and curteſies he could poſſibly ſhew him: Marius in the end notwithſtanding would not once giue him a good looke, nor a curteous word againe, but churliſhly ſaid vnto Mithridates at his departure from him: Thou muſt determine one of theſe two, king Mithridates: either to make thy ſelfe ſtronger then the Romaines, or elſe to looke to do what they commaund thee, without reſiſtance. Theſe words amazed Mithridates, who had heard ſay before, that the Romains would ſpeake their minds freely: howbeit he neuer ſaw nor proued it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto Rome, he built a houſe neare vnto the market place, becauſe he would not (as he ſaid himſelfe) that ſuch as came vnto him ſhould ſhould trouble thēſelues in going far to bring him home to his houſe: or elſe for that he thought this would be an occaſion that diuerſe would come to ſalute him, as they did other Senatours. Howbeit, that was not the cauſe indeed: but the only cauſe was, for that he had no naturall grace nor ciuility to entertain men curteouſly that came vnto him, and that he lacked behauior beſides to rule in a commonwealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckening of him then they did of an old ruſty harneſſe or implement, that was good for nothing, but for the wars only. And for all other that profeſſed armes as himſelfe did, no man grieued him ſo much to be called forward to office and ſtate before himſelfe, as Sylla did. For he was ready to burſt for ſpite, to ſee that the noble men did all what they could to prefer Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that Syllaes firſt riſing and preferment grew, by the quarrels and contentions he had with him. And ſpecially when Bocchus king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senat, a friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people: he offered vp ſtatues of victories, carying tokens of triumph into the temple of the Capitoll: and placed neare vnto them alſo, an image of gold of king Iugurth, which he deliuered by his owne hands vnto Sylla. And this made Marius ſtark mad for ſpite and iealouſie, and could not abide that another ſhould take vpon him the glorie of his doings: inſomuch as he determined to plucke thoſe images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the other ſide ſtomached Marius, and would not ſuffer him to take them out of the place where they were: ſo that this ciuill ſedition had taken preſent effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betweene, and reſtrained them for a time. For the beſt ſouldiers and moſt warlike people of all ITALIE, and of greateſt power, they all together roſe againſt the ROMAINES, and had welneare ouerthrowne their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force, and power, and well armed: but their Captaines alſo, for valiantnes and skill, did in manner equall the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this war fell out wonderfully, by reaſon of the calamitie and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius ſhame and diſhonour. For he ſhewed himſelfe very cold and ſlow in all his enterpriſes, ſtill delaying time, either becauſe age had mortified his actiue heate, and killed that quicke ready diſpoſition of body that was wont to be in him, being then aboue threeſcore and fiue yeare old: or elſe as he ſaid himſelfe, becauſe he was waxen gowtie, and had ach in his veines and ſinewes, that he could not well ſtirre his body, and that for ſhame: becauſe he would not tarie behind in this war, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithſtanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were ſlaine ſixe thouſand of their enemies: and ſo long as the warres endured, he neuer gaue them aduantage of him, but patiently ſuffered them ſometime to intrench him, and to mocke him, and giue him vile words, chalenging him out to fight, and yet all this would not prouoke him. It is ſaid alſo, that Pompedius Silo, who was the chiefeſt Captaine of reputation and authority the enemies had, ſaid vnto Marius on a time: if thou be Marius, ſo great a Captaine as they ſay thou art, leaue thy campe and come out to battell. Nay, ſaid Marius to him againe: if thou be a great Captaine, plucke me out by the eares, and compell me to come to battell. Another time when the enemies gaue them occaſion to giue a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the ROMAINES were faint hearted, and durſt not ſet vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were retired, Marius cauſed his men to aſſemble, and ſpake vnto them in this ſort: I cannot tell which of the two I ſhould recken moſt cowards: you your ſelues, or your enemies: for they durſt not once ſee your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithſtanding, he was compelled to reſigne his charge, being able to ſerue no longer for the weakeneſſe and debilitie of his body. Now all the rebels of ITALY being put downe, many at ROME (by the orators meanes) did ſue to haue the charge of the warres againſt Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, (a very bold and raſh man) beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perſwaded them to giue him the charge of theſe wars, with title and authoritie of Vice-conſul. The people therupon were deuided in two parts: for the one ſide ſtood for Marius, and the other would haue Sylla take the charge, ſaying, that Marius was to thinke now vpon the hot bathes at Baies, to look to cure his old body, brought low with rewme and age, as himſelfe ſaid. For Marius had a goodly ſtately houſe in thoſe parts neare vnto the mount of Miſene, which was far more fine and curiouſly furniſhed then became a Captaine that had bene in ſo many foughten battels and daungers. They ſay that Cornelia afterwards bought that fine houſe for the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand fiue hundred crownes, and ſhortly after alſo, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fiftie thouſand crownes: to ſo great exceſſe was vanitie and curioſitie growne in very ſhort time at Rome. Notwithſtanding all this, Marius too ambitiouſly ſtriuing like a paſſioned young man againſt the weakeneſſe and debilitie of his age, neuer miſſed day but he would be in the field of Mars to exerciſe himſelfe among the young men, ſhewing his body diſpoſed and ready to handle all kind of weapons, and to ride horſes: albeit that in his later time, he had no great health of bodie, becauſe he was very heauie & ſad. There were that liked that paſſing well in him, and went of purpoſe into the field to ſee what paines he tooke, ſtriuing to excell the reſt. Howbeit thoſe of the better ſort were very ſorie to ſee his auarice and ambition, conſidering ſpecially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane perſon a great eſtate, that he could not now containe his proſperitie within reaſonable bounds, nor content himſelfe to be eſteemed and honoured, quietly enioying all he had wonne, and which at that preſent he did poſſeſſe: but as if he had bene very poore and needie, after he had receiued ſuch great honor and triumphs, would yet carie out his age ſo ſtoutly, euen into Cappadocia, and vnto the realme of Pont, to go fight there againſt Archelaus, and Neoptolemus, Lieutenants of king Mithridates. Indeed he alleadged ſome reaſons to excuſe himſelfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he ſaid that he deſired in perſon to bring vp his ſonne in exerciſe of armes, and to teach him the diſcipline of warres. That diſcouered the ſecret hidden plague, which of long time had lurked in Rome, Marius ſpecially hauing now met with a fit inſtrument, and miniſter to deſtroy the commonwealth, which was the inſolent and raſh Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, ſauing that he was found too cowardly and faint hearted in all his enterpriſes, and for that did Marius iuſtly reproue him. But Sulpitius, becauſe he would not dally nor delay time, had euer ſixe hundred young gentlemen of the order of knights, whom he vſed as his gard about him, and called them the gard againſt the Senate. And one day as the Conſuls kept their common aſſembly in the market place, Sulpitius comming in armed vpon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Conſuls ſons being taken tardy, was ſlaine. Sylla being the other Conſull, and perceiuing that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius houſe, ranne into the ſame againſt the opinion of all the world: whereof they that ran after him not being aware, paſſed by the houſe. And it is reported that Marius himſelf conueyed Sylla ſafely out at a backe doore, and that he being ſcaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithſtanding, Sylla himſelfe in his commentaries doth not ſay, that he was ſaued in Marius houſe when he fled: but that he was brought thither to giue his conſent vnto a matter which Sulpitius would haue forced him vnto againſt his will, preſenting him naked ſwords on euery ſide. And he writeth alſo, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius houſe, he was kept there in this feare, vntill ſuch time as returning into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adiornement of iuſtice, which he and his companion by edict had commaunded. This done, Sulpitius then being the ſtronger, cauſed the commiſſion and charge of this warre againſt Mithridates to be aſſigned vnto Marius by the voice of the people. Therefore Marius giuing order for his departure, ſent two of his Colonels before to take the army of Sylla: who hauing won his ſouldiers hearts before, and ſtirred them vp againſt Marius, brought them on with him directly towards Rome, being no leſſe then fiue and thirty thouſand fighting men: who ſetting vpon the Captaines Marius had ſent vnto them, ſlue them in the field. In reuenge whereof, Marius againe in Rome put many of Syllaes friends and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by ſound of trumpet, to all ſlaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three only that offered themſelues. Wherupon, hauing made a litle reſiſtance vnto Sylla when he came into Rome, he was ſoone after compelled to run his way. Marius was no ſooner out of the city, but they that were in his companie forſaking him, diſperſed themſelues here and there being darke night: and Marius himſelfe got to a houſe of his in the country, called Salonium, and ſent his ſonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes, not far from thence, to make ſome prouiſion for victuals. But Marius in the meane time, went before to Ostia, where one of his friends Numerius had prepared him a ſhip, in the which he imbarked immediatly, not tarying for his ſon, and hoiſſed ſaile, hauing onely Granius his wiues ſonne with him. In the meane time the yonger Marius being at his father in law Mutius farme, ſtaied ſo long in getting of prouiſion, in truſſing of it vp, & carying it away, that broad day light had like to haue diſcouered him: for the enemies had aduertiſement whither he was gone, wherupon certaine horſemen were ſent thither ſuppoſing to haue found him. But the keeper of the houſe hauing an inckling of their comming, and preuen-preuenting them alſo before they came, ſodainly yoked his oxen to the cart, which he loded with beanes, & hid this yonger Marius vnder the ſame. And pricking the oxen forward with his gode, ſet out, and met them as he went towards the citie, and deliuered Marius in this ſort into his wiues houſe: and there taking ſuch things as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the ſea, and tooke ſhip, finding one croſſe ſailed, bound towards AFRIKE. Marius the father ſailing on ſtill, had a very good wind to point alongſt the coaſt of ITALY: notwithſtanding, being afraid of one Geminius, a chiefe man of TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gaue the mariners warning thereof betimes, and willed them to take heed of landing at TERRACINE. The mariners were very willing to obey him, but the wind ſtood full againſt them comming from the maine, which raiſed a great ſtorme, and they feared much that their veſſel which was but a boate, would not brooke the ſeas, beſides that, he himſelfe was very ſicke in his ſtomacke, and ſore ſea-beaten: notwithſtanding at the length with the greateſt difficultie that might be, they recouered the coaſt ouer againſt the citie of CIRCES. In the meane time, the ſtorme increaſed ſtill, and their victuals failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp and down not knowing what to do, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in ſuch like caſes of extremitie, they thought it alwayes the beſt ſafetie for them, to flie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they ſaw not: for if the ſea were their enemie, the land was ſo likewiſe. To meete with men, they were afraid: and not to meete with them on the other ſide lacking victuals, was indeede the greater daunger. Neuertheleſſe, in the end they met with heard men that could giue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warned him to get him out of the way as ſoone as he could poſſible, becauſe it was not long ſince that there paſſed by a great troupe of horſemen that ſought him all about. And thus being brought vnto ſuch perplexitie, that he knew not where to beſtow himſelfe, and ſpecially for that the poore men he had in his companie were almoſt ſtarued for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithſtanding, and ſought out a very thicke wood, where he paſſed all that night in great ſorrow, and the next morning being compelled by neceſſitie, determined yet to employ his body before all his ſtrength failed. Thus he wandered on alongſt the ſea coaſt, ſtill comforting them that followed him the beſt he could, and praying them not to diſpaire, but to referre themſelues to him, euen vntill the laſt hope, truſting in certaine propheſies which the Soothſayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the countrey, he gathered vp in the lap of his gowne, the ayrie of an Eagle, in the which were ſeuen yong Eagles: whereat his father and mother much wondring, asked the Soothſayers what that meant. They anſwered, that their ſonne one day ſhould be one of the greateſt men in the world, and that out of doubt he ſhould obtaine ſeuen times in his life the chiefeſt office of dignitie in his countrey. And for that matter, it is ſaid, that ſo indeed it came to paſſe. Other hold opinion, that ſuch as were about Marius at that time, in that preſent place, and elſewhere, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell his tale, beleeued it, and afterwards put it downe in writing, as a true thing, although of troth it is both falſe and fained. For, they ſay that the Eagle neuer hath but two young ones: by reaſon whereof it is maintained alſo, that the Poet Muſæus hath lyed, in that which he hath written in theſe verſes:

Marius the ſonne flieth into Africke.

Marius found an ayrie of Eagles.

The Eagle layes three egges, and two ſhe hatcheth forth:
But yet ſhe bringeth vp but one, that any thing is worth.

How many egs the Eagle layeth.

Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying ſaid, that he was aſſured he ſhould come vnto the ſeuenth Conſulſhip. When they were come neare now to the citie of MINTVRNES, about a two mile and a halfe from it, they might perceiue a troupe of horſemen comming by the ſea ſide, and two ſhips on the ſea that fell vpon the coaſt by good hap. Wherefore they all began to run (ſo long as they had breath and ſtrength) towards the ſea, into the which they threw themſelues, and got by ſwimming vnto one of the ſhips where Granius was: and they croſſed ouer vnto the Ile that is right againſt it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heauie and ſicke of bodie, two of his ſeruants holpe to hold him vp alwayes aboue water, with the greateſt paine and difficultie in the world: and at the laſt they laboured ſo throughly, that they put him into the other ſhip at the ſelfeſame preſent, when the horſemen came vnto the ſea ſide, who cried out aloud to the mariners to land againe, or elſe throw Marius ouer boord, and then to go where they would. Marius on the other ſide humbly beſought them with teares, not to do ſo: whereby the maiſters of the ſhip in a ſhort ſpace were in many minds whether to do it, or not to do it. In the end notwithſtanding, they anſwered the horſemen they would not throw him ouer boord: ſo the horſemen went their way in a great rage. But aſſoone as they were gone, the maiſters of the ſhippe chaunging mind, drew towards land, and caſt anker about the mouth of the riuer of Liris, where it leaueth her bankes, and maketh great mariſhes: and there they told Marius he ſhould do wel to go on land to eate ſomwhat, and refreſh his ſea-ſick bodie, till the wind ſerued them to make ſaile, which doubtleſſe ſaid they, will be at a certaine hower when the ſea wind fals and becomes calme, and that there riſeth a litle wind from the land, ingendred by the vapors of the mariſhes, which will ſerue the turne very well to take ſeas againe. Marius following their counſel, and thinking they had meant good faith, was ſet on land vpon the riuers banke: and there laid him down vpon the graſſe, nothing ſuſpecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners preſently taking their ſhip againe, and hoiſſing vp their ankers ſailed ſtraight away, and fled: iudging it no honeſtie for them to haue deliuered Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor ſafety for themſelues to haue ſaued him. Marius finding himſelfe all alone, and forſaken of euery man, lay on the ground a great while, and ſaid neuer a word: yet at the length taking heart a litle to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandered vp and downe, where was neither way nor path at all, ouerthwart deepe mariſhes and great ditches full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore old mans cotage, dwelling there in theſe mariſhes, and falling at his feete, beſought him to helpe to ſaue and ſuccour a poore afflicted man, with promiſe that one day he would giue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might eſcape this preſent daunger wherein he was. The old man whether for that he had knowne Marius aforetime, or that ſeeing him (by coniecture only) iudged him to be ſome great perſonage, told him that if he meant but to lie downe and reſt himſelfe a litle, his poore cabine would ſerue that turne reaſonably well: but if he meant to wander thus, to flie his enemies that folowed him, he would then bring him into a more ſecret place, and farther off from noiſe. Marius praied him that he would do ſo much for him: and the good man brought him into the mariſh, vnto a low place by the riuers ſide, where he made him lie downe, and then couered him with a great deale of reed and bent, and other ſuch light things as could not hurt him. He had not long bin there, but he heard a great noiſe comming towards the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminius of Terracine had ſent men all about to ſeek for him, whereof ſome by chance came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatned him that he had receiued and hidden an enemy of the Romaines. Marius hearing that, roſe out of the place where the old man had laid him, and ſtripping himſelfe ſtark naked, went into a part of the mariſh where the water was ful of myre and mud, and there was found of thoſe that ſearched for him: who taking him out of the ſlime all naked as he was, caried him into the citie of Mintvrnes, and deliuered him there into the gouernours hands. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all Italy, that they ſhould apprehend Marius, and kill him whereſoeuer they found him. Notwithſtanding, the gouernours and magiſtrates of Mintvrnes thought good firſt to conſult thereupon amongſt themſelues, and in the meane time they deliuered him into the ſafe cuſtodie of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to haue bene a bitter enemie of his, for an old grudge ſhe had to him, which was this. Fannia ſometime had a husband called Tinnius, whom ſhe was willing to leaue, for that they could not agree, and required her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husband againe ſaid, ſhe had plaid the whoore. The matter was brought before Marius in his ſixth Conſulſhip, who had giuen iudgement vpon it. Both parties being heard, and the law proſecuted on either ſide, it was found that this Fannia was a naughtie woman of her body, and that her husband knowing it well enough before, yet he tooke her with her faults, & long time liued with her. Wherefore Marius being angry with them both, gaue ſentence that the husband ſhould repay backe her dower, and that for her naughtie life, ſhe ſhould pay foure farthings. This notwithſtanding, when Fannia ſaw Marius, ſhe grudged him not for that, and leaſt of all had any reuenging mind in her towards him, but contrarily did cõfort & help him what ſhe could with that ſhe had. Marius thãked her marueilouſly for it, & bad her hope well: becauſe he met with ſo good lucke as he was comming to her houſe, and in this maner. As they were leading of him, when he came neare vnto Fanniaes houſe, her doore being open, there came an aſſe running out to go drinke at a conduit not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked vpon him with a liuefull countenance, firſt of all ſtopping ſodainly before him, and then beginning to bray out aloud, and to leape and skip by him.

Whereupon

Whereupon Marius ſtraight coniecturing with himſelf, ſaid, that the gods did ſignifie vnto him, that he ſhould ſaue himſelfe ſooner by water then by land: becauſe that the aſſe leauing him, ran to drinke and cared not to eate. So when he had told Fannia this tale, he deſired to reſt, & prayed them to let him alone, & to ſhut the chāber doore to him. But the Magiſtrates of the citie hauing conſulted together about him, in the end reſolued they muſt deferre no longer time, but diſpatch him out of the way preſently. Now when they were agreed vpon it, they could not find a man in the citie that durſt take vpon him to kill him: but a man of armes of the GAVLES, or one of the CIMERES (for we find both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his ſword drawne in his hand. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he ſaw two burning flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voice out of that darke corner, ſaying vnto him: O fellow, thou, dareſt thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAVLE hearing theſe words, ranne out of the chamber preſently, caſting his ſword in the middeſt of the floore, and cryed out theſe words onely: I cannot kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTVRNIANS afraid in the citie at the firſt, but afterwards it moued them to compaſſion. So they were angrie with themſelues, & did repent them that they conuerted their counſell to ſo cruell and vnkind a deed, againſt one that had preſerued all ITALY: and to denie him aide in ſo extreme neceſſitie, it was too great a ſinne. Therefore let vs let him go, ſaid they to themſelues, where he will, and ſuffer him take his fortune appointed him elſewhere: and let vs pray to the gods to pardon this offence of ours, to haue thruſt Marius naked and beggerly out of our citie. For theſe cōſiderations, the MINTVRNIANS went all together to Marius where he was, and ſtood about him, determining to ſee him ſafely conducted vnto the ſea ſide. Now though euery man was readie and willing to pleaſure him, ſome with one thing, ſome with another, and that they did haſten him all they could poſſible, yet they were a good while a going thither: becauſe there was a wood called Marica, that lay right in their way betweene their citie and the ſea coaſt which they greatly reuerence, and think it a ſacriledge to carie any thing out of that wood, that was once brought into it. On the other ſide, to leaue to go through this wood, and to compaſſe it round about, it would aske a maruellous long time. So they ſtanding all in doubt what they ſhould do, one of the ancienteſt men of the citie ſpake aloud vnto them, and ſaid: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to ſaue Marius life. Then Marius himſelfe being the foremoſt man, taking vp ſome of the fardels which they caried with him, to pleaſure him in the ſhip, went through the wood. All other things neceſſarie being thus readily prepared for him with like good will, and ſpecially the ſhip which one Bellæus had ordained for him: he cauſed all this ſtorie to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he tooke ſhip. After he was departed thence, the wind by good fortune caried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he found Granius and ſome other of his friends, with whom he tooke ſea againe, and pointed towards AFRICKE. But lacking water, they were compelled to land in SICILIA, in the territorie of the citie of ERIX: where by chance there lay a ROMAINE Quæſtor, who kept that coaſt. Marius being landed there, ſcaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he ſlue ſixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all ſpeed, croſſed the ſeas, vntill he arriued in the Ile of MENYNGE, where he firſt vnderſtood that his ſonne was ſaued with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempſall King of the NVMIDIANS to beſeech him of aide. This gaue him a litle courage, and made him bold to paſſe out of that Ile, into the coaſt of CARTHAGE. Now at that time, Sextilius a ROMAINE Prætor was gouernour of AFRICKE, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, and therefore he hoped, that for pitie onely he might perhaps haue helpe at his hand. Howbeit he was no ſooner landed with a few of his men, but a ſergeant came and ſaid vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernour of LYBIA, doth forbid thee to land in all this prouince: otherwiſe he telleth thee, that he will obey the Senates commaundement, and purſue thee as an enemie of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing this commandement, was ſo angrie and ſorie both, that he could not readily tell what anſwer to make him, and pawſed a good while, and ſaid neuer a word, ſtill eying the ſergeant with a grim looke: vntill he asked him what anſwere he would make to the Prætors commaundement. Marius then fetching a deepe ſigh from his heart, gaue him this anſwere: Thou ſhalt tell Sextilius, that thou haſt ſeene Caius Marius baniſhed out of his countrey, ſitting amongſt the ruines of the citie of CARTHAGE. By this anſwere, he wiſely laid the example of the ruine and deſtruction of that great citie of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune, to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vpon him. In the meane time, Hiempſall king of the NVMIDIANS, not knowing how to reſolue, did honourably intreat yong Marius and his companie: but when they were willing to go their way, he alwayes found new occaſion to ſtay them, and was very glad to ſee that he ſtarted not for any oportunitie or good occaſion that was offered: notwithſtanding, there fortuned a happie meane vnto them, whereby they ſaued themſelues. And this it was. This Marius the yonger being a faire complexioned young man, it pitied one of the Kings concubines to ſee him ſo hardly dealt withall. This pitie of hers was a ſhadow to cloke the loue ſhe bare him, but Marius would not hearken at the firſt to her intiſements, & refuſed her. Yet in the end, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to eſcape thence, and conſidering that ſhe did all things for their auaile, more diligently and louingly then ſhe would haue done, if ſhe had not meant further matter vnto him, then only to enioy the pleaſure of him: he then accepted her loue and kindnes, ſo as at the length ſhe taught him a way how to flie, and ſaue himſelfe and his friends. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had embraced and ſaluted ech other, going alongſt the ſea ſide, they found two ſcorpions fighting together. Marius tooke this for an ill ſigne: whereupon they quickly took a fiſher boat, and went into the Ile of CERCINA, which is no great diſtance off from firme land. They had no ſooner hoiſed vp anker, but they ſaw the horſemen which king Hiempſal had ſent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greateſt dangers that Marius ouer eſcaped. In the meane time there was newes at ROME, that Sylla made warre againſt king Mithridates Lieutenants: and furthermore, that the Conſuls being vp in armes the one againſt the other, Octauius wanne the battell, and being the ſtronger, had driuen out Cinna who ſought to haue vſurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Merula Conſull in his place: and that Cinna on the other ſide leauied men out of other parts of ITALY, and made wars vpon them that were in ROME. Marius hearing of this diſſention, thought good to returne as ſoone as he could poſſible into ITALY. And aſſembling certaine horſemen of the nation of the MAVRVSIANS in AFRIKE, and certaine ITALIANS that had ſaued themſelues there, vnto the number of a thouſand men in all: he took ſea, and landed in a hauen of THVSCANE called TELAMON, and being landed, proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, libertie to all ſlaues and bondmen that would come to him. So the laborers, heardmen and neat-heards of al that marſh, for the only name and reputation of Marius, ran to the ſea ſide from all parts: of the which he hauing choſen out the ſtouteſt and luſtieſt of them, wanne them ſo by faire words, that hauing gathered a great companie together in few dayes, he made fortie ſaile of them. Furthermore, knowing that Octauius was a maruellous honeſt man, that would haue no authoritie otherwiſe then law and reaſon would: and that Cinna to the contrary was ſuſpected of Sylla, & that he ſought to bring in change and innouation to the common wealth, he determined to ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius ſent firſt vnto Cinna, to let him vnderſtand that he would obey him as Conſull, and be readie to do all that he ſhould command him. Cinna receiued him, and gaue him the title and authoritie of Viceconſull, and ſent him ſergeants to carie axes and rods before him, with all other ſignes of publike authoritie. But Marius refuſed them, and ſaid, that pompe became not his miſerable fortune: for he euer went in a poore threed-bare gowne, and had let his haire grow ſtill after he was baniſhed, being aboue threeſcore and ten yeares old, and had a ſober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that ſaw him. But vnder all this counterfaite pitie of his, he neuer chaunged his naturall looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible then otherwiſe. And where he ſpake but litle, and went very demurely and ſoberly, that ſhewed rather a cankered courage within him, then a mind humbled by his baniſhment. Thus when he had ſaluted Cinna, and ſpoken to the ſouldiers, he then began to ſet things abroach, and made a wonderfull change in few daies. For firſt of all, with his ſhips he cut off all the victuals by ſea, and robbed the merchants that caried corne and other victuals to ROME: ſo that in ſhort ſpace he was maiſter purueyer for all neceſſarie prouiſion and victuals. After this he went alongſt the coaſt, and tooke all the cities vpon the ſea ſide, and at the length wan OSTIA alſo by treaſon, put the moſt part of them in the towne to the ſword, and ſpoiled all their goods: and afterwards making a bridge vpon the riuer of TIBER, tooke from his enemies all hope to haue any maner of prouiſion by ſea. That done, he went directly towards ROME with his armie, where firſt he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Octauius fault: who ouerthrew himſelfe in his doings, not ſo much for lacke of reaſonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curioſitie and ſtrictneſſe in in obſeruing the law. For when diuers did perſwade him to ſet the bondmen at libertie to take armes for defence of the common wealth: he anſwered, that he would neuer giue bondmen the law & priuiledge of a ROMAINE citizen, hauing driuen Caius Marius out of ROME, to maintaine the authoritie of the law. But when Cæcilius Metellus was come to ROME, the ſonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that hauing begun the warres in LYBIA againſt King Iugurth, was put out by Marius: the ſouldiers forſooke Octauius immediatly, and came vnto him, becauſe they tooke him to be a better captaine, and deſired alſo to haue a leader that could tell how to commaund them to ſaue the citie, and the common wealth. For they promiſed to fight valiantly, and perſwaded themſelues that they ſhould ouercome their enemies, ſo that they had a skilfull and valiant captaine that could order them. Metellus miſliking their offer, commanded them in anger to returne againe vnto the Conſull: but they for ſpite went vnto their enemies. Metellus on the other ſide, ſeeing no good order taken in the citie to reſiſt the enemies, got him out of ROME. But Octauius being perſwaded by certaine Soothſayers and CHALDEAN ſacrificers, who promiſed him all ſhould go well with him, taried ſtill in ROME: for that man being otherwiſe, as wiſe as any ROMAINE of his time, and one that dealt as vprightly in his Conſulſhip, not caried away with flattering tales, and one alſo that followed the auncient orders and cuſtomes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any part thereof: me thinkes yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Soothſayers, wiſe men, and Aſtronomers, more then men skilfull in armes and gouernement. Wherefore, before that Marius himſelfe came into the citie, Octauius was by force pluckt out of the pulpit for orations, & ſlaine preſently by Marius ſouldiers whom he had ſent before into the citie. And it is ſaid alſo, that when he was ſlaine, they found a figure of a CHALDEAN prophecie in his boſome: & here is to be noted a great cõtrarietie in theſe two notable men, Octauius and Marius. The firſt loſt his life by truſting to Soothſaying, and the ſecond proſpered, and roſe againe, becauſe he did not deſpiſe the art of Diuination. The ſtate of ROME ſtanding then in this maner, the Senate conſulting together, ſent ambaſſadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into ROME, and not to embrue their hands with the bloud of their citizens. Cinna ſitting in his chaire as Conſull, gaue them audience, and made thẽ a very reaſonable and curteous anſwer. Marius ſtanding by him ſpake neuer a word: but ſhewed by his ſower looke that he would ſtraight fill ROME with murder and bloud. So when the Ambaſſadors were gone, Cinna came into ROME enuironed with a great number of ſouldiers: but Marius ſtaid ſodainly at the gate, ſpeaking partly in anger, and partly in mockerie, that he was a baniſhed man, and driuen out of his country by law: and therefore if they would haue him come into ROME againe, they ſhould firſt by a contrary decree aboliſh and reuoke that of his baniſhment, as if he had bene a religious obſeruer of the lawes, and as though ROME had at that preſent enioyed their freedome and libertie. Thus he made the people aſſemble in the market place to proceed to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to giue their voices, diſguiſing the matter no longer, and ſhewing plainly that he meant not to be lawfully called home againe frõ exile: he came into ROME with a guard about him, of the verieſt raſcals and moſt ſhameleſſe ſlaues, called the BARDIÆIANS, who came to him from all parts: and they for the leaſt word he ſpake, or at the twinckling of his eye, or at a nod of his head made to them, ſlue many men through his commandement, and at the length ſlue Ancharius a Senator (that had bene Prætor) at Marius feet with their ſwords, becauſe onely that Marius did not ſalute him whẽ he came one day to ſpeak with him. After this murther, they cõtinued killing al thẽ that Marius did not ſalute, and ſpeake vnto: for that was the very ſigne he had giuen them to kil them openly in the ſtreetes before euery man, ſo that his very friends were afeard of being murthered, when they came to ſalute him. Thus a great number of men being ſlaine, Cinna in the end began to be ſatisfied and to appeaſe his anger. But Marius anger and vnſatiable deſire of reuenge increaſed more and more, ſo that he ſpared not one if he ſuſpected him neuer ſo litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skouts and ſpies to hunt them out that hid themſelues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no friend is faithfull, and to be truſted, if fortune frowne neuer ſo litle: for there were very few that did not betray their friends that fled to them for ſuccour. And therefore do Cornutus ſeruants ſo much the more deſerue praiſe, who hauing ſecretly hidden their maiſter in his houſe, did hang the dead body of ſome common perſon by the neck, and hauing put a gold ring on his finger, they ſhewed him to the BARDIÆIANS, Marius guard, and buried him in ſtead of their owne maiſter, without ſuſpition of any man that it was a fained thing: and ſo Cornutus being hidden by his ſeruants, was ſafely conueyed into the country of GAVLE. Marke Anthonie the Orator had alſo found out a faithfull friend, yet was he vnfortunate. This faithful friend of his, was a poore ſimple man, who hauing receiued one of the chiefeſt men of ROME into his houſe to keepe him cloſe there: he being deſirous to make him the beſt cheare he could with that litle he had, ſent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetch wine, who taſting the wine more curiouſly then he was wont to do, called for better. The drawer asked him why the new ordinarie wine would not ſerue him, but he muſt needes haue of the beſt and deareſt: the fooliſh fellow ſimply anſwered him (telling him as his familiar friend) that his maiſter did feaſt Marke Anthonie, who was hidden very ſecretly in his houſe. He was no ſooner gone with his wine, and his backe turned, but the vile traiterous drawer ranne vnto Marius, who was ſet at ſupper when he came. The drawer being brought vnto him, promiſed him to deliuer Marke Anthonie into his hands. Marius hearing of that, was ſo iocond, that he cried out and clapt his hands together for ioy: and would haue riſen from the boord, and gone thither himſelfe in perſon, had not his friends kept him backe. But he ſent Annius one of his captaines thither with a certaine number of ſouldiers, and commanded them to bring him his head quickly. So they went thither, and when they were come to the houſe which the drawer had brought them to, Annius taried beneath at the doore, and the ſouldiers went vp the ſtaiers into the chamber, and finding Anthonie there, they began to encourage one another to kill him, not one of them hauing the heart to lay hands vpon him. For Anthonies tongue was as ſweet as a Syrene, and had ſuch an excellent grace in ſpeaking, that when he began to ſpeake vnto the ſouldiers, and to pray them to ſaue his life: there was not one of them ſo hard hearted, as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewards, fell a weeping. Annius perceiuing they taried long, and came not downe, went himſelfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthonie talking to his ſouldiers, and them weeping, his ſweete eloquent tongue had ſo melted their hearts: but he rating them, ran furiouſly vpon him, and ſtrake off his head with his owne hands. And Catulus Luctatius alſo, that had bene Conſull with Marius, and had triumphed ouer the CIMBRES with him, ſeeing himſelfe in this perill, ſet men to intreate Marius for him: but his anſwer was euer, he muſt needs die. So Catulus locked himſelfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the ſmoake thereof choked himſelfe. Now after their heads were cut off, they threw out the naked bodies into the ſtreetes, and trod them vnder their feete: the which was not onely a pitifull, but a fearefull ſight to all that ſaw them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that grieued the people ſo much, as the horrible leacherie and abhominable crueltie of his guard of the BARDIÆIANS, who comming into mens houſes by force, after they had ſlaine the maiſters, defiled their young children, and rauiſhed their wiues and maides, and no man would once reproue their crueltie, leacherie, and vnſatiable auarice: vntill Cinna and Sertorius in the end ſet vpon them as they ſlept in their campe, and ſlue them euery one. But in this extremitie, as if all things had bene reſtored vnto their firſt eſtate, newes came againe from all parts to ROME, that Sylla hauing ended his warre againſt king Mithridates, and recouered the prouinces which he had vſurped: returned into ITALY with a great power. This cauſed theſe euils and vnſpeakeable miſeries to ceaſe a litle, becauſe the wicked doers of the ſame, looked they ſhould haue warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereupon Marius was choſen Conſull the ſeuenth time. He going out of his houſe openly the firſt day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take poſſeſſion of his Conſulſhip, cauſed one Sextus Lucinus to be throwne downe headlong from the rocke TARPEIAN, which ſeemed to be a great ſigne and certaine token of the euils and miſeries, that fell out afterwards the ſelfe ſame yeare vpon them of their faction, and vnto all the citie beſide. But Marius being ſore broken with his former troubles, and his mind oppreſſed with extreme ſorrow and griefe, could not now at this laſt time of neede plucke vp his heart to him againe, when he came to thinke of this new toward warre that threatned him, and of the daungers, griefes, and troubles he ſhould enter into, more great and perillous then any he had paſſed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for feare when he began to thinke of it, conſidering that he had to fight, not with Octauius, nor with Merula, Captaines of a companie of rebels gathered together: but with a noble Sylla, that had driuen him out of ROME before, and that came now from driuing the puiſſant king Mithridates, vnto the furtheſt part of the Realme of PONT, and of the ſea Euxinum. Thus, deeply weighing and conſidering the ſame, and ſpecially when he looked back vpon his long time of baniſhment, how vagabondlike he wandred vp and downe in other countries, and remembred the great misfortunes he had paſſed, and the ſundry daungers he fell ſo often into, being purſued ſtill by ſea and by land: it grieued him to the heart, and made him ſo vnquiet, that he could not ſleepe in the night, or if he ſlept, had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and ſtill he thought he heard a voice buzzing in his eares:

Marius thoughts and feare.

A Lions very denne is dreadfull to behold,
Though he himſelfe be gone abrode, and be not there in hold.

But fearing moſt of all that he ſhould no more ſleepe and take his reſt, he gaue himſelfe to make vnreaſonable banquets, and to drinke more then his yeares could beare, ſeeking to win ſleepe by this meanes, to auoide care the better. But at the length there came one from the ſea, that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: and that was an increaſe of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extreamely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, and partly alſo for the ouer heauie burden of his preſent ill, there needed but litle more aggrauation, to fall into the diſeaſe whereof he died, which was a pleuriſie: as Poſidonius the Philoſopher writeth, who ſaith plainely that he went into his chamber when he was ſicke, and ſpake vnto him about matters of his ambaſſade, for the which he came to Rome. Yet another hiſtoriographer Caius Piſo writeth, that Marius walking one day after ſupper with his friends, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and againſt him: concluding, that it is no wiſe mans part to truſt her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leaue of them, and laid him downe vpon his bed, where he lay ſicke ſeuen daies together, and on the ſeuenth day dyed. Some write that his ambition appeared plainely, by a ſtrange rauing that tooke him in his head during his ſickneſſe: for he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, and ſhewed in his bed all his geſtures and mouings of his bodie, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the ſelfe ſame cries out aloud, which he was wont to crie when he was in the extreameſt fight. The deſire he had to haue taken this charge in hand againſt Mithridates, was ſo deepely ſetled in his mind through extreame ambition and iealouſie that poſſeſt him, that being then threeſcore and ten yere old, after he had bene the firſt man that euer was choſen ſeuen times Conſull in Rome, and alſo after that he had gotten a world of goods and riches together that might haue ſuffiſed many kings: yet for all this he dyed for ſorrow, lamenting his hard fortune, as if he had dyed before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had deſired. But this was cleane contrarie vnto that the wiſe Plato did, when he drew neare to his death. For he gaue God thanks for his fatal end and good fortune. Firſt, for that he had made him a reaſonable man, and no brute beaſt: ſecondly, a Grecke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported alſo, that one Antipater of Tharsis, calling to mind a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forget among other things, to tell of the happie nauigation he made, comming from his country vnto Athens: which did witneſſe that he put vpon the file of his good accounts for a ſingular great grace, all fauour fortune had ſhewed him, and that he kept it in perpetuall memorie, being the onely and moſt aſſured treaſure a man can haue, to keepe thoſe gifts that nature or fortune do beſtow vpon him. But contrariwiſe vnthankefull fooles vnto God and nature both, do forget with time the memorie of their former benefites, and laying vp nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memorie, are alwaies voide of goods and full of hope, gaping ſtill for things to come, and leauing in the meane time the thing preſent, though reaſon perſwades them the contrary. For fortune may eaſily let them of the thing to come, but ſhe cannot take that from them which is already paſt: and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefite of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto them, and dreame alwaies of that which is vncertaine. And ſure it chaunceth to them by great reaſon: for, hauing gathered outward goods together, and locking them vp before they haue built and laid a ſure grounded foundation of reaſon through good learning, they cannot afterwards fill nor quench their vnſatiable greedie couetous mind. Thus ended Marius his life, the ſeuenteenth day of his ſeuenth Conſulſhip, whereof all the citie of Rome was not a litle glad, and tooke heart againe vnto them, ſuppoſing they had then bene deliuered from a bloudy cruel tyrannie. But within few daies after they knew it to their coſt, that they had chaunged an old maiſter taken out of the world, for a younger that came but newly to them: ſuch extreame vnnaturall cruelties, and murthers did Marius the yonger commit, after the death of his father Marius, murthering in maner all the chiefeſt noble men of Rome. At the firſt, they tooke him for a valiant and hardy young man, whereupon they named him the ſonne of Mars: but ſhortly after his deedes did ſhew the contrary, and then they called him the ſon of Venus. In the end he was ſhut in, and beſieged by Sylla in the citie of PERVSIA, where he did what he could poſſible to ſaue his life, but all was in vaine: and laſtly, ſeeing no way to eſcape, the citie being taken, he ſlue himſelfe with his owne hands.

Note that in Syllaes life following, it appeareth that Marius the younger was beſieged in the citie of Præneſte, and not in Peruſia, as ye reade here. So as the citie ſeemeth to be miſtaken in one of the liues.

THE LIFE OF Lyſander.

IN the treaſurie of the ACANTHIANS, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inſcription: Braſidas, and the ACANTHIANS, with the ſpoile of the ATHENIANS. That inſcription maketh many men thinke, that the image of ſtone that ſtandeth within the chamber by the doore thereof, is the image of Braſidas: howbeit in truth it is the liuely image of Lyſander himſelfe, made with a great buſh of haire, and a thicke long beard after the old ancient faſhion. And where ſome ſay that the ARGIVES, after they were ouercome and had loſt a great battell, did all of them ſhaue themſelues in token and ſigne of common ſorow: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other ſide to ſhew the ioy of their victory, did let all their haires grow, that is not true, no more then this is true which other do report of the BACCHIADES: who being fled frõ CORINTH vnto LACEDÆMON, the LACEDÆMONIANS found thẽ ſo ill fauouredly diſguiſed & deformed, becauſe their heads were all ſhauen, that thereupon they had a deſire to let their haire and beards grow. For that was one of the ordinances of Lycurgus, who ſaid that the long buſh of haire maketh them that are naturally faire, the pleaſanter to looke vpon: and thoſe that are ill fauoured, more vgly and fearefull to ſee to. And furthermore, it is ſaid that Ariſtoclitus, the father of Lyſander, was not of the royall bloud of the kings of SPARTA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: & that his ſon Lyſander was very meanely and poorely brought vp, being as obedient to the lawes & ſtatutes of his countrey, as any other man was, ſhewing himſelf alwaies very ſtrong & conſtant againſt all vanity & pleaſure, ſauing only in matters of honor and curteſie, which they offer vnto thoſe that deſerue well. For they think it no ſhame nor diſhoneſtie in SPARTA, that the young men do ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome with that delight and pleaſure: but do bring vp their children, that from their youth they would haue haue them to haue ſome taſt and feeling of honour, delighting to be praiſed, and ſory to be diſcommended. For they make no account of him that is not moued with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a baſe cowardly nature, that hath no maner of mind to do good. And therfore it is to be thought, that the ambition and ſtoutneſſe that was bred in Lyſander, proceeded of the LACONICAL dicipline and education he had, and not ſo much of his owne nature. But indeed of his owne nature he was a right courtier, and could tell how to entertaine and flatter great ſtates and nobilitie, farre better then the common maner of the naturall SPARTANS: and moreouer for his priuate benefit, he could eaſily beare with the ſtoutneſſe of greater men of authority then himſelf, which ſome iudge to be a great point of wiſedome, to know how to deale in matters of ſtate. Ariſtotle in a place where he ſaith, that the greateſt wits commonly are ſubiect vnto melancholie, (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) writeth, that Lyſander in his later age fell into the melancholy diſeaſe, but not in his youth. He had alſo this ſingular gift aboue all other, that in his pouerty he alwaies kept that honeſt modeſty with him, as he would neuer be ouercome nor corrupted with gold nor ſiluer: and yet he filled his countrie with riches and couetouſneſſe, which loſt him the reputation he had won, becauſe himſelfe made none account of riches nor getting. For, bringing ſtore of gold and ſiluer into his country after he had ouercome the ATHENIANS, he reſerued not vnto himſelfe one Drachma onely. And furthermore, when Dionyſius the tyrant of SYRACVSA had on a time ſent goodly rich gownes out of SICILIA to his daughters: he refuſed them ſaying, that he was afraid ſuch gowns would make them fowler. Neuertheleſſe, ſhortly after being ſent Ambaſſadour out of his country vnto the ſame tyrant, Dionyſius hauing ſent him two gownes, praying him to chooſe which he would, to carie to his daughter: he anſwered, that ſhe her ſelfe could beſt chooſe which was the fitter, & ſo caried both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike cauſes: the wars of PELOPONNESVS fell out maruellous long. For after the ouerthrow of the army which the ATHENIANS had ſent into SICILIA, when euery man thought they had vtterly loſt all their force by ſea, and that by all coniecture they ſhould ſoone after loſe all by land alſo: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the ſtate, made an exceeding great change and alteration. For he ſet the ATHENIANS aflote againe, and made them as ſtrong by ſea as the LACEDÆMONIANS: who therupon began to quake for feare, and to look eftſoones for a freſh war, perceiuing that they ſtood in need of a greater power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Wherupon they made Lyſander their Admirall, who arriuing in the city of EPHESVS, found them very well affected towards him, and maruellous willing and ready to take the LACEDÆMONIANS part: howbeit otherwiſe in very poore ſtate, and ready almoſt to take vp al the barbarous maners and faſhions of the PERSIANS, becauſe they did continually frequent thē, being enuironed round about with the country of LYDIA, where the king of PERSIAES captains were euer reſident. Wherefore, hauing planted his campe there, he brought thither merchants ſhips out of all parts, and ſet vp an arſenall or ſtore houſe to build gallies in: ſo that in ſhort ſpace, by oft recourſe of merchants that began to trade thither, he quickened their hauens, and ſet vp their ſtaple againe for the trafficke of merchandiſe, and filled euery priuate artificers houſe with an honeſt trade to make them rich by, ſo that euer after it grew in continuall hope to come vnto that flouriſhing ſtate and greatneſſe, in the which we ſee it at this preſent. Furthermore, Lyſander being aduertiſed that Cyrus, one of the great king of PERSIAES ſonnes, was come vnto the citie of SARDIS, he went thither to ſpeake with him, and to complaine of Tiſaphernes: who hauing commaundement giuen him from the king to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to helpe to expulſe the ATHENIANS, and to driue them from the ſea, ſeemed to deale but coldly and faintly againſt them, for the fauour he bare to Alcibiades. For, in furniſhing the LACEDÆMONIANS very ſcantly with money, he was the cauſe that all their army by ſea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne part was very glad that he heard complaints of Tiſaphernes, and that they ſpake againſt him: becauſe he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had himſelfe a litle odde grudge to him. Wherefore he loued Lyſander maruellous well, as well for the complaints he made of Tiſaphernes, as alſo for the pleaſure he tooke in his company, becauſe he was a man that could wonderfully pleaſe and delight noble men: by which meanes hauing wonne the fauour of this young Prince, he did perſwade, and alſo incourage him to follow this warre. And when Lyſander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus feaſted him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuſe the offer of his liberalitie, and that was: that he would freely aske him what he wold, aſſuring him he ſhould not be denied any thing. Whereunto Lyſander anſwered him. Sithence I ſee (Cyrus) you are ſo willing to pleaſure vs, I beſeech you, and do alſo counſell you then to increaſe the ordinary pay of our mariners, one halfe peny a day: to the end that where now they haue but three halfe pence, they may thencefoorth receiue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lyſanders bounty, and the increaſe that he would make, and cauſed ten thouſand Darickes to be deliuered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinary pay of the mariners, the increaſe of a halfe peny a day. This liberalitie, within few daies after, emptied all their enemies gallies of their men. For the moſt part of their mariners and gallie men went where they might haue the beſt pay: and ſuch as remained behind, became very dull, lazie, and ſeditious, daily troubling their Captaines and gouernours. Now though Lyſander had drawn his enemies men from them by this pollicie, & had done thē this great hurt, yet he durſt not fight it out by ſea, fearing the worthines of Alcibiades: who was a valiant man, and had greater ſtore of ſhips then he had, and beſides that, was neuer ouercome by land nor by ſea, in any battell where he was generall. So it chanced that Alcibiades went out of the Ile of SAMOS vnto the citie of PHOCEA, which ſtandeth vpon firme land directly ouer againſt SAMOS, and leauing the whole charge of his fleete in his abſence, with Antiochus his pylot: he being more hardie then wiſe, in ſcorne and deriſion of Lyſander, went with two gallies only into the hauen of EPHESVS, and went by the arſenall (where all their ſhips lay in docke) with great noiſe & laughing. This put Lyſander in ſuch a heate and chafe, that firſt of all he put a few gallies to the ſea, and had him in chaſe with them. But afterwards, perceiuing that the other captaines of the ATHENIANS came out one after another to the reſcue, he armed other gallies alſo: ſo that ſupplying ſtill with a few on either ſide, at length they came to a main battell, which Lyſander wan, and hauing taken fifteene of their gallies, he ſet vp a token of triumph and victory. When the people at ATHENS heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were ſo angry with Alcibiades, that they depoſed him preſently of his charge: and the ſouldiers alſo that lay in campe in the Ile of SAMOS, began to miſlike him, and to ſpeake ill of him. Whereupon he preſently left his campe, and went into the countrey of CHERRONESVS in THRACIA. This batttel was more ſpoken of then there was cauſe, by reaſon of Alcibiades reputation. Furthermore, Lyſander cauſing the ſtouteſt and boldeſt men of euery citie, aboue the common ſort, to come to EPHESVS vnto him: laid there ſecret foundations of great change and alteration, which he ſtabliſhed afterwards in the gouernments of cities. For he perſwaded his priuate friends to make tribes amongſt themſelues, to winne them friends, and to practiſe to get the rule of their cities into their hands: promiſing them, that ſo ſoone as the ATHENIANS were ouerthrowne, they themſelues alſo ſhould be deliuered from ſubiection of their people, and euery one of them ſhould beare chiefe rule in their country. And this he performed to them all, and made euery one of them proue his words true: for he preferred all them that had bene his old friends, vnto the beſt offices and charges, not ſparing to do againſt all right and reaſon, ſo that they were aduaunced by it. And for this cauſe euery man came to take his part, and they all ſought and deſired to gratifie and pleaſe him: hoping, that what great matter ſoeuer fell out, they might aſſure themſelues that they ſhould obtaine it of him, when he came to haue the gouernment in his own hands. And therfore they nothing reioyced at Callicratidas coming, who came to ſucceed him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards alſo, when they ſaw by experience that he was as honeſt and iuſt a man as could be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerning, which was plaine & without any art or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of ſome demi-god made after the old faſhion, which had bene of ſingular beautie. But in the meane time, they wiſhed for Lyſander, as well for the tender loue and good-will he bare to his friends and them, as alſo for the profit and commoditie they got by him. So when Lyſander tooke the ſeas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as ſorie as could be poſſible, inſomuch as the teares ſtood in their eyes: & he on the other ſide, ſtudied to make them worſe affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongſt many other things, he ſent the reſt of the money backe againe to SARDIS, which Cyrus had giuen him to pay the mariners: ſaying, that Callicratidas ſhould go himſelfe to aske it, if he would haue it, and find the meanes to entertaine his men. And laſtly, when he was ready to imbarke, he proteſted before all them that were preſent, that he did deliuer, leaue, and aſſigne ouer the armie into his hands, commaunding all the ſea. But Callicratidas, to ouercome his falſe ambition, and foule boaſting lye, anſwered him againe & ſaid: If that be true thou ſayeſt, come then and deliuer me the gallies in the city

citie of MILETVM, as thou goest by, before the Ile of SAMOS: for sith thou commandest all the sea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in SAMOS. Lysander thereto replied, that the army was no more at his commandement, and that he had the charge ouer them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly vnto PELOPONNESVS, and left Callicratidas in great perplexitie: for he had brought no money out of his country with him, neither would he compell the cities to furnish him with any, seeing that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to go to the Lieutenants of the King of PERSIA, to aske them money as Lysander had done. But he was the vnmeetest man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberall nature, and thought it lesse dishonour and reproch vnto the GRECIANS, to be ouercome by other GRECIANS, then to go flatter the barbarous people, & seek to the that had gold and siluer enough, but otherwise no goodnesse nor honestie. In the end notwithstanding, making vertue of necessitie, he tooke his iourney towards LYDIA, and went directly to Cyrus court: where at his first comming he willed them to let him vnderstand, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the LACEDÆMONIANS would speake with him. One of the souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: my friend, sir stranger, Cyrus is not at leisure now, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas answered plainly againe: No force, I will tarie here till he haue dined. The barbarous PERSIANS hearing this, tooke him for some plaine lout, and so he went his way the first time with a mocke at their hands. But the second time when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the citie of EPHESVS, cursing and banning them that at the first had so much imbased themselues, as to go sue to the barbarons people, teaching them to be proude and stately for their goods and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so soone as he came to SPARTA againe, he would do all that he could possible to pacifie the GRECIANS, and set them at peace one with another, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, and also that they should meddle with them no more, nor need their aide to destroy one another. But Callicratidas hauing the noble hart of a SPARTAN, and being to be compared in iustice, valiancie, and greatnesse of courage, with the most excellentest GRECIANS in his time, dyed shortly after in a battell by sea, which he lost vpon the Iles ARGINVSES. Wherefore, the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing that their state was in declining, they all together sent an ambassade vnto SPARTA, by whom they made request to the councell, that they would send Lysander againe for their Admirall: promising that they would do all things with better courage and goodwill vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Captaine they could send them. So much did Cyrus also write vnto them. But because there was an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twise Admirall, & besides, they being willing to grant the request of their confederates, made one Aracus their Admirall, but in effect gaue Lysander the whole authoritie of all things: who was maruellous welcome vnto them, & specially vnto the heads and rulers of cities, which long before had wished for his comming: because that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and open magnanimitie in the manners of a gouernour and generall, when they came to compare Lysander with Callicratidas, they found that Lysander had a fine subtill head, and did more in wars with his pollicie & subtilty, then by any other meanes. And moreouer, that he esteemed iustice, when it fell out profitable: & tooke profit, for iustice & honesty, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the one and the other, by the profit that came out of the, and mocking of them that said, that the race of Hercules should not make wars with craft and subtilty. For said he, when the lions skin will not serue, we must helpe it with the case of a foxe. And hereunto agreeth that, which they write he did in the citie of MILETVM. For his friends and familiars to whom he had promised aide for destruction of the peoples authoritie, & to driue their enemies out of the city: they hauing changed their minds, and being reconciled vnto their aduersaries, he openly made great shew of gladnesse, and seemed as though he would helpe to agree them together: but secretly being alone, he tooke them vp sharply, and told them that they were cowards to do it, and did procure them to the contrary, to set vpon the people. And then when he vnderstood that there was commotion among them in the citie, he ranne thither suddenly as it were to appease it. But when he was also come into the citie, the first he met with of them that would alter the state of gouernement, and take the authoritie from the people, he fell out withall, & gaue them rough words, commanding with extremitie that they should follow him, as though he would haue done ſome great puniſhment. And againe, meeting with thē on the contrary part, he willed them alſo that they ſhould not be afraid, nor doubt that any man ſhould do them hurt where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practiſe of him, to ſtay the chiefeſt of them that were moſt affected to the popular faction, to the end that afterwards he might put them all to death, as he did: for they that truſting to his words remained quiet in the citie, were all put to death. Moreouer, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lyſander was wont to ſay: by the which it appeareth, that he made very litle reckening to be periured. For he ſaid, that children ſhould be deceiued with the play of kayles, and men with othes of men, following therein Polycrates the tyrant of Samos, but without reaſon: for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent vſurper of tyrannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true Laconian, to behaue himſelfe towards the gods none otherwiſe, then towards men, but rather worſe, & more iniuriouſly. For he that deceiueth his enemie, and breaketh his oath to him: ſheweth plainely that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore hauing ſent for Lyſander to come to Sardis to him, gaue him money largely, and promiſed him more: and becauſe he would more honourably ſhew the goodwill he had to gratifie him, told him, that if the king his father would giue him nothing, yet he would giue him of his owne. And furthermore, when all other meanes failed to helpe him with money, that rather thē he ſhold lacke, he would melt his owne chaire to make mony of (which he ſate in when he gaue audience in matters of iuſtice) being altogether of gold and ſiluer. And to be ſhort, when he was going into Media to the king his father, he gaue Lyſander power to receiue the taxes and ordinarie tributes of the cities vnder his gouernement, and made him Lieutenant of all his countrey. And laſtly, bidding him farewell, prayed him that he would not giue battell by ſea vnto the Athenians, vntill he returned from the Court: and that before his coming againe, he wold haue authoritie to leauie a great number of ſhippes, aſwell out of Phoenicia, as out of Cilicia. Wherefore whileſt Cyrus was in his iourney, Lyſander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of ſhippes, nor alſo to lye ſtill and do nothing with ſo good a number of gallies, went and ſcoured the ſeas, where he tooke certaine Ilands, and robbed alſo Ægina and Salamina. From thence he went and landed on the firme land in the country of Attica, and did his dutie there vnto Agis king of Lacedæmonia, who came purpoſely from the fort of Decelea to the ſea ſide to ſee him, becauſe their army by land alſo ſhould ſee what power they had by ſea, and how it ruled more by ſea then they would. Neuertheleſſe, being aduertiſed that the fleete of the Athenians followed hard after him, he tooke another courſe to flye backe againe into Asia by the Iles: and returning againe, found all the country of Hellespont without men of warre. So he laid ſiege before the city of Lampsacvs, and did aſſault it with his gallies by ſea: and Thorax being come thither alſo at the ſelfe ſame time in great haſt with his army by land gaue the aſſault on his ſide. Thus was the citie taken by force, which Lyſander left to the ſpoile of the ſouldiers. Now in the meane time the fleete of the Athenians (which was a hundred and foure ſcore ſaile) came to an ancker before the citie of Elevnte, in the country of Cherronesvs: and newes being brought them that the citie of Lampsacvs was taken, they came with all ſpeed poſſible vnto the city of Sestos, where getting freſh cates and victuals, they coaſted all alongſt the coaſt vnto a certain place called the goates riuer, directly ouer againſt the fleet of their enemies, which lay yet at anker before the citie of Lampsacvs. Now there was a captaine of the Athenians amongſt other called Philocles, he that perſwaded the Athenians to cut off the priſoners thombes of their right hands that were taken in the warres, to the end they ſhould no more handle the pike, but onely ſerue to pull the ower. Both the one and the other reſted that day, hoping to haue battell without faile the next morning. But Lyſander hauing another meaning with him, commaunded the maiſters and mariners notwithſtanding, that they ſhould haue their galleys readie to giue battell the next morning by breake of day, becauſe euery man ſhould get a boord betimes, and ſhould keepe themſelues in order of battell, making no noiſe at all, attending what he would commaund them: and further, made the armie by land alſo to be raunged in battell ray, by the ſea ſide. The next morning at Sunne riſing, the Athenians began to row with all their gallies ſet in order of battell in a front. But Lyſander, though he had his ſhippes in order to fight, the prores lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not for all that againſt them, but ſending out pinnaſes vnto the firſt galleys, commanded them ſtraightly that they ſhould not ſtirre at all, but keepe themſelues in order, making no noiſe, nor rowing againſt againſt the enemie. Though the ATHENIANS alſo were retired in the night, he would not giue the ſouldiers leaue to come to land out of the gallies, before he had ſent firſt two or three gallies to deſcrie the fleete of his enemies: who brought him word that they had ſeene the ATHENIANS take land. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth alſo all in one ſort: ſo that the ATHENIANS began to be bold of themſelues, and to deſpiſe their enemies, imagining they lay thus cloſe for feare of them, and durſt not come forward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the countrey of CHERRONESVS, in certaine places which he had conquered) came riding to the campe of the ATHENIANS, to tell the Captaines and Generals of the armie, the great faults they committed. Firſt, for that they had caſt anker, and kept their ſhips in an open place, where there was no maner of ſuccor, nor harbor to retire vnto vpon any ſtorme: and worſt of all, becauſe that they were to fetch their victuals farre off, at the citie of SESTOS, vnto which hauen they ſhould rather draw themſelues, conſidering that they had but a litle way to go, and alſo they ſhould haue the citie to backe them, which would furniſh them with all things neceſſarie: and beſide that, they ſhould be further off from their enemies, which were gouerned by one Generall onely that did commaund them all, and were ſo well trained, that at a whiſtle they were readie ſtraight to execute his commandement. Alcibiades perſwaſions to theſe Captaines of the ATHENIANS were not onely miſliked, but furthermore there was one called Tydeus, that anſwered him very leudly: that he had nothing to do to commaund the armie, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades miſtruſting thereby ſome treaſon, quietly went his way. The fifth day, the ATHENIANS hauing made the ſame countenance to preſent battell vnto their enemies, and retiring the ſame night as of cuſtome very negligently, and in ill order, as men that made no reckoning of their enemies: Lyſander ſent againe certaine galliots to diſcrie them, commaunding the Captaines of the ſame, that when they perceiued the ATHENIANS had left their galleys and taken land, they ſhould then returne backe with all poſſible ſpeed they could, and being mid way ouer the ſtraights, that they ſhould lift vp a copper target into the aire, vpon the top of a pike in the fore-decke, for a ſigne to make all the whole fleete to row in battell. Now Lyſander himſelfe in the meane time went in perſon from galley to galley, perſwading and exhorting euery captaine, that they ſhould put their galliots, mariners, and ſouldiers in good readineſſe, to the end that when the ſigne ſhould be lifted vp, they ſhould row with all their might in battell againſt the enemies. Wherefore, ſo ſoone as the copper target was ſet vp in the ayre, and that Lyſander had made his trumpet ſound out of the Admirall, for a token to hale out into the ſea: the galleys immediatly began to row for life in enuy one of another, and the footmen that were vpon the land, ranne with ſpeed alſo to the top of a high cliffe neare vnto the ſea, to ſee what would be the end of the fight, becauſe the diſtance from one ſide to the other in that place was not fully two miles, which they had ſoon cut ouer, and in a litle ſpace, through the great diligence and force of rowing with their owers. So Conon the chiefe Captaine of the ATHENIANS perceiuing from the ſhore this great fleet comming with a ful force to aſſault them: he then cried out to the ſouldiers that they ſhould runne to their ſhips, and being in a rage to ſee things in this danger, called ſome by their names, others he intreated, and the reſt he compelled to take their galleys. But all his diligence was to no purpoſe, becauſe the ſouldiers were wholly ſcattered here and there. For ſo ſoone as they were ſet a land out of their galleys at their returne, ſome went to buy prouiſion, other went a walking in the fields, ſome were ſet at ſupper in their cabins, and other were laid downe to ſleepe, nothing miſtruſting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignorance and lacke of experience. But when the enemies were readie to ioyne and fal vpon them with great cries and noiſe of owers, Conon hauing eight gallies, ſtale ſecretly out of the fleete, and flying vnto Euagoras, ſaued himſelfe in the Ile of CIPRVS. In the meane time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling vpon the other galleys, tooke ſome of them emptie, and brake the others as the ſouldiers began to come aboord vpon them. And as for the men, ſome were ſlaine by their ſhips as they ran vnto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to haue ſaued themſelues: other were killed in flying, becauſe the enemies landed and had them in chaſe. And there were taken aliue of them, three thouſand priſoners with the Captaines. Lyſander moreouer tooke all the whole fleete of their ſhips, the holy galley excepted, called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had deſtroyed all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he faſtened the galleys that were taken, vnto the keele of his galleys, and returned with ſongs of triumph, with the ſound of flutes and hoboyes, towards the citie of Lyſanders victorie of the Athenians.

Paralos, the holy galley of Athens.

LAMPSACVS, hauing wonne a great victorie with litle labour, and had cut off in a ſmall time, the long continuing and moſt diuerſe warre that euer was, and had brought forth ſo many ſundrie ſtrange euents of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene infinite battels fought both by ſea and land, and had altered many ſundrie times, and there was ſlaine at that time moe Captaines, than in all the other warres of GREECE together: all which were at length brought to end and determined, by the good wiſedome and conduction of one onely man. And therefore ſome thought, that this great ouerthrow was giuen by the gods, and ſaid: that at the departure of Lyſanders fleete out of the hauen of LAMPSACVS, to go ſet vpon the fleete of the enemies, they perceiued ouer Lyſanders galley the two fires, which they call the ſtarres of Caſtor and Pollux: the one on the one ſide of the galley, and the other on the other ſide. They ſay alſo, that the fall of the ſtone was a token, that did ſignifie this great ouerthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the aire a maruellous great ſtone, in the place they call the goates riuer, which ſtone is ſeene yet vnto this day, holden in great reuerence by the inhabitants of the citie of CHERRONESVS. It is ſaid alſo, that Anaxogoras did prognoſticate, that one of the bodies tied vnto the vault of the heauen, ſhould be plucked away, and ſhould fall to the ground by a ſliding and ſhaking that ſhould happen. For he ſaid, that the ſtarres were not in their proper place where they were firſt created, conſidering that they were heauy bodies, and of the nature of ſtone: howbeit that they did ſhine by reflection of the fire elementarie, and had bene drawne vp thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the element, euen as at the beginning of the world they had bin ſtaid and let from falling downe beneath, at that time when the ſeparation was made of the cold and heauie bodies, from the other ſubſtance of the vniuerſall world. There is another opinion of certaine Philoſophers, where there is more likelihood then in that. For they ſay, that thoſe which we call falling ſtars, be no fluxions nor deriuations of the fire elementarie, which are put out in the ayre, in a maner ſo ſoone as they be lighted: nor alſo an inflammation or combuſtion of any part of the aire, which by her too ouermuch quantitie doth ſpread vpwards: but they are celeſtiall bodies, which by ſome ſlackneſſe of ſtrength, or falling from the ordinarie courſe of heauen, are throwne and caſt downe here beneath, not alwaies in any part of the earth inhabited, but more ofter abroad in the great Ocean ſea, which is the cauſe that we do not ſee them. Notwithſtanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of religion, that the ſpace of three ſcore and fifteene yeares together, before that this ſtone did fal, they ſaw a great lump of fire continually in the ayre like a cloud inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went & came with diuers broken remouings, by the driuing whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the ſtarres do that fall. In the end, when this great bodie of fire fell in that part of the earth, the inhabitants of the countrey, after that they were a litle boldned from their feare and wonder, came to the place to ſee what it was: and they found no maner of ſhew or apparance of fire: but onely a very great ſtone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in compariſon of the leaſt part of that which the compaſſe of this bodie of fire did ſhew, if we may ſo name it. Sure herein, Damachus words had need of fauourable hearers. But againe if they be true, then he vtterly confuteth their arguments, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boiſterons wind did teare from the top of a mountaine, and caried in the aire, ſo long as this hurle wind continued: but ſo ſoone as that was downe, and calme againe, the ſtone fell immediatly. Neither do we ſay, that this lightning bodie, which appeared ſo many dayes in the element, was very fire indeed, which comming to diſſolue and to be put out, did beget this violent ſtorme and boiſterous wind in the element, that had the force to teare the ſtone in ſunder, and to caſt it downe. Neuertheleſſe, this matter requireth better diſcourſe in ſome other booke then this. But now to our ſtorie. When the three thouſand ATHENIANS that were taken priſoners at that ouerthrow, were condemned by the counſell to be put to death: Lyſander calling Philocles, one of the captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would iudge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens ſo cruell and wicked counſell. Philocles being nothing abaſhed to ſee himſelfe in that miſerie, anſwered him: Accuſe not them that haue no iudge to heare their cauſe: but ſince the gods haue giuen thee grace to be conquerour, do with vs, as we would haue done with thee, if we had ouercome thee. When he had ſaid ſo, he went to waſh himſelfe, and then put on a faire cloake vpon him, as if he ſhould haue gone to ſome feaſt: and went luſtily the foremoſt man to execution, leading his countrimen the way, as Theophraſtus writeth. thisdone, Lyſander with all his fleete went by all the cities of the ſea coaſt, where he commanded ſo many ATHENIANS as he found, that they ſhould get them to ATHENS, letting them vnderſtand that he would not pardon a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their city. And this he did of pollicy to bring them all within the precinct of the wals of ATHENS, becauſe he might ſo much the ſooner famiſh them for lacke of victuals: for otherwiſe they would haue troubled him ſore, if they had had wherwithall to haue maintained a long ſiege. But in all the cities as he paſſed by, if they were gouerned by the authority of the people, or if that there were any other kind of gouernment, he left in euery one of them a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine or gouernor, with a counſell of ten officers, of them that had bene before in league and amity with him: the which he did aſwel in the cities that had euer bene confederates and friends vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, as in thē that not long before had bin their enemies. So he went ſailing all alongſt the coaſts, faire and ſoftly making no haſt, ſtabliſhing in maner a general principality ouer all GRECE. For he did not make thē officers that were the richeſt, the nobleſt, or honeſteſt men, but ſuch as were his friends, out of thoſe tribes which he had placed in euery city: & to them he gaue authority to puniſh, and reward ſuch as they liked of, & would be preſent himſelfe in perſon to helpe them to put thoſe to death whom they would execute, or otherwiſe expulſe or baniſh their country. But this gaue the GRECIANS ſmall hope of good or gracious gouernement vnder the rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherefore, me thinkes that Theopompus the comicall poet doted, when he compared the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto tauerners, ſaying, that they had giuen the GRECIANS a taſte of the ſweet drinke of liberty, and that afterwards they had mingled it with vineger. For, the taſte they gaue the GRECIANS of their gouernment from the beginning, was very ſharpe vnto them: becauſe Lyſander tooke the rule and authority of gouernement out of the peoples hands, and gaue it vnto a few of the boldeſt, and moſt ſeditious men in euery city. Thus hauing ſpent a great time in this voyage, to make theſe alterations, he ſent newes before to LACEDÆMON, that he was comming with 200 ſaile. He ſpake alſo with the kings Agis and Pauſanias, in the countrey of ATTICA, perſwading himſelfe that he ſhould win the city of ATHENS at the firſt aſſault. But when he ſaw his expectation failed, and that the ATHENIANS did valiantly reſiſt him, he returned once againe with his fleete into ASIA, where he made an end of changing and altering the maner of gouernment through euery city in equall maner, ſtabliſhing a counſell of ten officers only in euery one of them, and putting euery where many citizens to death, and baniſhing many alſo. Among others, he draue all the SAMIANS out of their countrey, and reſtored againe all them that had bene baniſhed before: and the city of SESTOS alſo, being yet in the ATHENIANS hands, he tooke it from them. And furthermore, he would not ſuffer the naturall SESTIANS to dwell there, but draue them away, and gaue their city, their houſes, & lands, vnto ſhip-maiſters, officers of galleys, and galley-ſlaues, that had bene in the wars with him. But therein the LACEDÆMONIANS were againſt him, and this was the firſt thing that they did forbid him: for they reſtored the SESTIANS, againſt his will, vnto their lands and goods againe. But as the GRECIANS were very much offended, to ſee the parts Lyſander played: ſo were they all very glad againe, to ſee theſe others which he afterwards did. For he reſtored the ÆGINETES againe to their lands and houſes, who had bene put from them a long time. He reſtored alſo the MELIANS, and the SCIONÆIANS to their lands againe, which the ATHENIANS had gotten from them, and draue out the ATHENIANS. Furthermore, Lyſander being aduertiſed, that the citizens and inhabitants of ATHENS were pinched ſore for lacke of victuals, he returned againe, and came into the hauen of PYRÆA: by meanes whereof he kept the city ſo ſtraight, that he made them yeeld vpon ſuch conditions as he himſelfe would. Howbeit there are certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that ſay, Lyſander wrote vnto the Ephores: The city of ATHENS is taken: and that the Ephori wrote againe vnto him: it is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deuiſed to make the matter ſeeme better: for indeed the capitulations which the Ephori ſent vnto him, were theſe: The Lords of the councell of LACEDÆMON haue thus decreed: That ye do raſe the fortification of the hauen of PIRÆA: That ye do ouerthrow alſo the long wall that ioyneth the hauen to the city: That ye yeeld vp and redeliuer all the cities which ye do hold, and content your ſelues with your liues and country only. This doing, ye ſhall haue peace, ſo that ye performe our demaunds: That ye ſhall receiue thoſe which are baniſhed: and for the number of ſhips, ye ſhall diſpoſe of them as we ſhall will you. The ATHENIANS agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counſell of Theramenes the ſonne of Agnon.

Lyſanders cruelties.

Theopompus the comicall poets ſaying of the Lacedæmonians.

The Athenians yeeld vp Athens to Lyſander.

The maner of peace offered by the Lacedæmonians to the Athenians.

Who when a young Orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were ſo bold to dare to do, or ſay, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themiſtocles had done before time, to aſſent vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the wall which he built in deſpite of them, ſhould by their commandement now be raſed: he anſwered him openly againe: Yong man, my friend, I do nothing contrary to Themiſtocles doings: for like as he heretofore did build the wall, for the ſafety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in ATHENS at that time: euen ſo do we that are here now, for the ſelfe ſame cauſe plucke it downe and raze it. And if it be true that wals do make cities happy, then it muſt needs follow that the city of SPARTA which neuer had any wals, ſhould be the vnfortunateſt of all other. So Lyſander hauing receiued all the ATHENIANS ſhips but twelue, and the wals of the city alſo to vſe them at his pleaſure: on the ſixteenth day of March (on which day in old time the ATHENIANS had won the battell by ſea, within the ſtraight of SALAMINA, againſt the king of PERSIA) he counſelled them ſtraight to change the forme of their gouernment. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruellouſly offended withall. Whereupon Lyſander ſent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made betweene them, for that their wals were yet ſtanding, the ten dayes being expired in which they had promiſed to ouerthrow them: and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the determination of the councell, how they ſhould be vſed, that had broken the articles and couenants of the firſt peace. Other ſay, that immediatly he referred it vnto the deliberation of the councell of their confederates, that is to ſay: whether they ſhould altogether deſtroy the city, and make the inhabitants thereof ſlaues and bondmen, or no. In this councell, it is reported that there was a THEBAN called Erianthus, whoſe opinion was, that they ſhould vtterly raze the city, and make the countrey a deſert: ſo that it ſhould neuer after ſerue for other thing, but for paſturage of beaſts. But during this diet and councell, there was a banket made, whereunto all the captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden, there was a PHOCIAN, a ſinger of ſongs, that ſang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Poet Euripides, which began in this ſort:

Electra noble Dame, and daughter to a king,
Euen Agamemnon, king of Grece, whoſe fame ſo wide did ring:
I come now to your courts, which lie both wide and waſt,
By ſpoile of warres depopulate, deſtroyed, and diſgraſt.

These words moued all the hearers with cõpaſſion, ſo that the moſt part of them thought it were too great a ſin to deſtroy ſo noble a city, which brought forth ſo many famous wiſe men, & great perſons. Wherefore Lyſander, when the ATHENIANS had ſubmitted themſelues altogether to his will, cauſed all the women-players of pipes or ſhalmes to come out of the city, and gathered all thoſe together which he had in his owne campe alſo, and with the ſound of their inſtruments he made the wals & fortifications of the city of ATHENS to be pulled downe to the very ground, & ſet all their galleys on fire, & burnt them in the preſence of the confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS, who danced and played in the meane ſeaſon with garlands of flowers on their heads, in token that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediatly after he changed alſo the ſtate of the gouernment, eſtabliſhing a counſell of thirty Magiſtrates in the city, & other ten alſo in the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing all equall and like authority: and therewithall made Callibius a gentleman of SPARTA captaine of the caſtell there, and left a good garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his ſtaffe he had in his hand to ſtrike Autolycus withall, a ſtrong made man to wreſtle: wherupon Xenophon the Philoſopher made his booke in old time, called Conuiuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wreſtler, hauing all the ſleights of wreſtling, ſuddenly tripped Callibius with his leg, and lifting him vp at the armes end, caſt him to the ground. Howbeit Lyſander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him that he ſhould haue remembred (if he had bene wiſe) that he had the gouernment ouer free men, and not of bond men. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after the thirty gouernors of the city, to ſatisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lyſander had done all theſe things, he tooke ſea againe, and went into the country of THRACIA, & ſent by Gylippus before vnto SPARTA (who had bin Captaine and Generall of the SYRACVSANS in SICILIA) all the gold and ſiluer that was left in his hands, with all the preſents beſides which had bene priuately giuen him, and with the crownes alſo that had bin preſented him: which were maruellous in nũber, as it is to be thought, for that many came to preſent him, conſidering the great power he had, and that in maner he was chiefe chief and ſole prince of all GRECE. This Gylippus did rip the ſeames of euery bag in the bottome where the mony was, & tooke a good ſum out of euery of them: and afterwards ſewed them vp again, not thinking that there had bin a border vpon euery bag, vpon the which was declared, the number and kinds of gold & ſiluer that were therein. Now when he was come to SPARTA, he hid the mony he had ſtolne vnder the houſe eauings, & went and deliuered the bags he had brought into the hands of the Ephori, ſhewing them Lyſanders ſeale, which he had ſet to euery one of thē. The Ephori hauing opened the bags, and told the mony, found that the ſum agreed not with the borders of the contents: and yet could not tell where the fault was. But a ſeruant of Gylippus told them in darke words, ſaying: that vnder the tiles of his maiſters houſe there lay a great number of owles. Now the greateſt part of the coine of gold & ſiluer which was currant through GRECE, was ſtamped with the marke of an owle, by reaſon of the ATHENIANS. Thus Gylippus after ſo many noble exploites done in wars, committing ſo ſhamefull and vile a deed, was baniſhed out of his countrey of LACEDÆMONIA. But the wiſeſt men of SPARTA, and of deepeſt iudgement, fearing the power of gold & ſiluer, & ſeeing by proofe of Gylippus doings, that it had ſuch power to make one of their chiefeſt men to fall through couetouſnes: they greatly blamed Lyſander for bringing of it into LACEDÆMON, beſeeching the Ephori that they would ſend all this gold and ſiluer out of SPARTA, as a plague, prouocation, & wicked baite, to make them do euill: declaring vnto them, that they ſhould vſe no other mony, but their owne only. Wherupon they referred al to the wiſdom & determinatiō of the councell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphidas was he that did moue the councell of the Ephori in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the firſt that ſpake againſt it in the councell, that they ſhould not admit, nor receiue into the city of SPARTA, any mony of gold or ſiluer: but ſhould only content themſelues with their owne country iron coine, the which firſt of all, comming from the fire red-hot, was quenched with vineger, to the end they ſhould be forged no more, nor employed vnto any other vſe. For it was ſo eager and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they could no more conuert it to any other purpoſe: and beſide, it was very heauy and vnhandſome to remoue, conſidering that a great heape and quantity of it, was but of ſmall value. And it ſeemeth they did vſe of old time, certaine litle iron mony, and in ſome places copper money, called Obeliſci, from whence the ſmall peeces of mony now extant are called Oboli, whereof ſixe made a Drachma, ſo termed, for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuertheleſſe, at the earneſt ſute of Lyſanders friends that ſtood againſt it, and held hard with him: it was decreed in the councell, that the money ſhould remaine in the city, and ordained that it ſhould be currant only but for the affaires of the commonwealth. And if it were found, that any priuate man did either locke vp, or keepe any mony, that he ſhould ſuffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his lawes, feared gold or ſiluer, & not the couetouſneſſe and auarice which the gold and ſiluer bringeth with it. The which was not taken away ſo much, prohibiting priuate men to haue it: as it was engendred onely by a tolleration of getting it. For, the profit which they ſaw it brought withall, made it to be eſteemed and deſired. For it was vnpoſſible they ſhould deſpiſe a thing priuatly for vnprofitable, which they ſaw reckoned of commonly, as a thing very neceſſary: and that they ſhould thinke it would not ſerue their turne priuatly, ſeeing it ſo commonly eſteemed and deſired. But we are rather to thinke, that priuate mens maners are confirmed according to the common vſes & cuſtomes of cities: then that the faults and vices of priuate men do fill cities and commonweales with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the parts are marred and corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out ill: then that the parts corrupted ſhould draw the whole vnto corruption. For to the contrary, the faults of a part deſtroyed, which might be preiudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes redreſſed and corrected by the other parts, whole and entire. But they that tooke this reſolution in their councell at that time, to haue mony in the commonwealth, made feare of puniſhment, and of the law, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houſes, to keepe that no money ſhould come into them. But all this while they made no inward prouiſion, to keepe the entry of their ſoules from all paſſion and greedy deſires of mony: but to the contrary, they made them all to haue a couetous deſire to be rich, as if it were a great & honorable thing. But for that we haue heretofore in other places reproued the LACEDÆMONIANS. And moreouer Lyſander cauſed a ſtatue of braſſe to be made like himſelfe of the ſpoile he had gotten of the enemies, to ſet it vp in the city of DELPHES, & for euery priuate captaine of the galleys in like caſe: and the two ſtars of Caſtor and Pollux in gold beſides, which vaniſhed away a litle before the battell of LEVCTRES, and no man knew what became of them. Againe, in the chamber of the treasurie of Brasidas, and of the ACANTHIANS, there was also a galley made of gold and iuorie, of two cubits long, which Cyrus sent vnto him after the victorie he had won by sea of the ATHENIANS. And furthermore, Alexandrides the historiographer borne at DELPHES, writeth, that the self same Lysander had left there to be kept safe, a talent of siluer, two and fiftie Minas, and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other historiographers write, agreeing of his pouerty. But Lysander being aloft then, and of greater power then euer any GRECIAN was before him: caried a greater port and countenance then became his abilitie. For as Duris writeth,

Lysanders honors and pride

he was the first of the GRECIANS vnto whom they did euer erect any altars, and offer sacrifice vnto as a god, and in honor of whom they did first sing any hymnes: and at this day there is yet good memorie of one which began in this manner:

The noble Captaines praise, we meane to celebrate
Of Greece: that land which is deuine in euery kind of state.
Euen he which was both borne, and brought to high renowne,
Within the noble wealthie walles of Sparta stately towne.

The SAMIANS by publicke decree ordained, that the feastes of Iuno, which were called in their citie Heroea, should be called Lysandria. Lysander had euer one Chærilus a SPARTAN Poet about him, to write and set forth all his doings in verse. Another Poet called Antilochus, one day made certaine verses in his praise: which pleased him so well, that he gaue him his hat full of siluer. There were two other Poets, Antimachus COLOPHONIAN, and Niceratus borne at HERACLEA, which did both write verses to honour him, striuing whether of them should do best. Lysander iudged the crowne and victorie vnto Niceratus: wherewith Antimachus was so angry, that he razed out all that he had written of him. But Plato who at that time was yong, and loued Antimachus because he was an excellent Poet, did comfort him, and told him that ignorance did blind the vnderstanding of the ignorant, as blindnesse doth the sight of the blind. Aristonus an excellent player of the citherne, and one that had sixe times won the prises of the Pythian games: to win Lysanders fauor, promised him, that if euer he wan the prise of his art againe, he would cause himselfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slaue. This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grieuous, onely vnto great persons, and men of his estate: but besides his ambition, in the end he became very proud and cruell, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: so that he exceeded in recompencing his friends, as also in punishing of his enemies. For, to gratifie his friends and familiars, he gaue them absolute power and authoritie of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appease his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all possibility of pardon. And that he plainely shewed afterwards in the city of MILETVM, where, fearing lest they would flie that tooke part with the people, and because he would haue them appeare that hid themselues: he gaue his word, and sware that he would do them no hurt at all. The poore men gaue credit to his word: but so soone as they came out, and did appeare, he deliuered them all into the hands of their aduersaries, (which were the chiefest of the nobilitie) to put them all to death: and they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with another. He caused great murders of people also to be done in other cities: for he did not onely put them to death that had priuately offended him, but numbers besides, onely to satisfie and reuenge the priuate quarrels, enmities and couetousnes of his friends, whom he had in euery place. And therfore was Eteocles LACEDÆMONIAN greatly commended for his saying: That GRÈCE could not abide two Lysanders. Theophrastus writeth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing, but his insolencie, and vaineglory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a seuere nature, and sharpe conditions, that made his power fearefull & intollerable. Neuertheless, the LACEDÆMONIANS passed ouer all other complaints exhibited against him, sauing when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purposely sent Ambassadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and iniuries Lysander had done him, spoiling and destroying the country vnder his gouernment: then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his friends and Captaines that had serued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and siluer in his house contrary to the lawe, put him to death. And to himselfe they sent immediately that which they call Scytala, (as who would say, the scrolle written vpon a round staffe) commaunding him that he should returne immediatly vpon receipt thereof. The Scytala is in this sort. When the Ephori do send ſend a Generall, or an Admirall to the warres, they cauſe two litle round ſtaues to be made of the like bigneſſe and length, of which the Ephori do keepe the one, and the other they giue to him whome they ſend to the warres. Theſe two litle ſtaues they call Scytales. Now when they will aduertiſe their Generall ſecretly of matters of importance, they take a ſcrolle of parchment, long and narrow like a leather thong, and wreath it about the round ſtaffe, leauing no voide ſpace betweene the borders of the ſcrolle. Afterwards when they haue bound them faſt together, then they write vpon the parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they haue done writing, vnfold it and ſend it to their Generall, who cannot elſe poſſibly reade it to know what is written, (becauſe the letters are not ioyned together, nor follow in order, but are ſcattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rolle of wood which was giuen him at his departure: and then wreathing the ſcrolle of parchment about it which he receiueth, the folding and wreaths of the parchment falling iuſt into the ſelfe ſame place as they were firſt folded, the letters alſo come to ioyne one with another, as they ought to do. This litle ſcrolle of parchment alſo is called as the rolle of wood, Scytala, euen as we commonly ſee in many places that the thing meaſured, is alſo called by the name of the meaſure. When this parchment ſcrolle was brought vnto Lyſander, who was then in the countrey of HELLESPONT, he was maruellouſly troubled withall, fearing aboue all other things the accuſations of Pharnabazus: ſo he ſought meanes to ſpeake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lyſander prayed him he would write another letter vnto the Lords of SPARTA, contrarie to his firſt, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cauſe to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a CRETAN, (as the common Prouerbe ſaith) that could deceiue another CRETAN. For Pharnabazus hauing promiſed him that he would performe his deſire, wrote a letter openly, purporting the effect of Lyſanders requeſt: but behind he had another of contrarie effect, ſo like on the outſide vnto the other, that by ſight no man could diſcern the one from the other. And when he came to put too his ſeale, he changed the firſt with the laſt that was hidden, and gaue it him. When Lyſander came vnto SPARTA, he went as the manner is, ſtraigbt to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, thinking that by them he ſhould haue bene cleared from all daunger of the greateſt accuſations they could haue burdened him withall: becauſe that Pharnabazus was very well thought on of the Lords of LACEDÆMONIA, for that he did euer ſhew himſelfe willing and readie to helpe them in all their warres, more then any other of the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA. The Ephori hauing read this letter, they ſhewed it vnto him. Then did Lyſander plainely ſee, that the common prouerbe was true:

The Laconian Scytala what maner thing it is, & how vſed.

Lyſander caſteth letters againſt himſelfe.

That Vlyſſes was not ſubtill alone.

Thereupon he went home to his houſe maruellouſly troubled: but within few dayes after returning to the pallace againe to ſpeake with the Lords of the councell, he told them that he muſt needs make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to diſcharge certain ſacrifices which he had vowed and promiſed to him before he had wonne the battels. Some ſay, that indeed Iupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dream as he did beſiege the citie of the APHYTÆIANS, in the countrey of THRASIA, and that by his commaundement he raiſed the ſiege, and charged them of the city, that they ſhould thanke Iupiter Ammon, and do ſacrifice vnto him: by reaſon whereof, they thinke that he meant good faith, when he ſued for licence to make this voyage into LYBIA, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the moſt part did certainely beleeue, that he made ſute to go this iourny, for a cloke and colour only to abſent himſelf, becauſe he feared the Ephores, & that he could not endure the yoke & ſubiection which he muſt abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commaunded. And this was the true cauſe of his ſute to go this voyage, much like vnto a horſe taken out of a freſh paſture and goodly medowes, to bring him into a ſtable, and make him to be iorneyed as he was before. Neuertheles, Ephorus writeth another cauſe, the which I will recite hereafter. In the end, Lyſander hauing hardly obtained licence, took ſhip and hoiſſed ſaile: but during his abſence, the kings of LACEDÆMON remembring that he kept all the cities at his commaundement, by meanes of the friends he had in euery city, whom he had made chiefe gouernours of the ſame, and that by their meanes he came in maner to be abſolute prince ouer all GREECE, they tooke vpon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the towns and cities againe into the hands of the people, and alſo to put downe his friends whom he had ſtabliſhed there. And herupon fell out great inſurrection again: for firſt of all, they that were baniſhed from ATHENS, hauing ſurpriſed and taken the caſtell of Phyla, vpon the ſodaine did ſet vpon the thirty gouernors tyrants (whom Lyſander had placed there) and ouercame them in battel. Whereupon Lyſander ſtraight returned to SPARTA, and perſwaded the LACEDÆMONIANS to refer the gouernment to the number of a few, and to puniſh the inſolencie of the people. So by his procurement, they ſent firſt an hundred talents vnto the thirty tyrants for an aide to maintaine this war, and appointed Lyſander himſelfe generall. But the two kings of SPARTA enuying him, and fearing leſt he ſhould take the city of ATHENS againe, they determined that one of them would go. Wherupon Pauſanias went thither immediatly, who in apparance ſeemed to maintaine the tyrants againſt the people: but in effect, he did his indeuour to appeaſe this warre, for feare leſt Lyſander by meanes of his friends and followers ſhould once againe come to haue the citie of ATHENS in his power, the which he might eaſily do. And thus hauing agreed the ATHENIANS againe one with another, and pacified all faction and commotion among them, he plucked vp the root of Lyſanders ambition. But ſhortly after, the ATHENIANS rebelling againe againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, Pauſanias himſelfe was reproued, becauſe he yeelded ſo much to the boldneſſe and inſolencie of the people, which were bridled and reſtrained before, by the authority of the ſmall number of gouernors: and to the contrary, they gaue Lyſander the honor to be generall, who ruled not in this rebellion to pleaſe mens minds and to content them, neither with fond oſtentation of glory, but ſeuerely, for the profit and commodity of SPARTA. It is true, he would giue great words, & was terrible to them that reſiſted him. As he anſwered the ARGIVES one day, who contended for their confines with the LACEDÆMONIANS, & ſeemed to alledge the beſt reaſons. Euen they (ſaid he) that ſhal proue the ſtronger hereby (ſhewing thē his ſword) ſhall be they that ſhall pleade their cauſe beſt for their confines. Another time, when a MEGARIAN had told his mind boldly enough in open councell, he anſwered him: Thy words (good friend) had need of a city, meaning thereby that he was of too meane a towne to vſe ſo great words. And to the BOEOTIANS alſo, who were in doubt to profeſſe themſelues friends or enemies: he ſent vnto thē, to know if he ſhould paſſe through their country with his pikes vpwards or downwards. And when the CORINTHIANS alſo were reuolted frō their alliance, he brought his army hard vnto their wals: but when he ſaw his men were afraid, and made curſey whether they ſhould go to the aſſault or not: by chance ſpying a hare coming out of the towne ditches, he ſaid vnto them: Are ye not aſhamed to be afraid to go & aſſault your enemies, that are ſo cowardly and ſlothfull, as hares do keepe their formes at eaſe within the circuit of their wals? Now king Agis being deceaſed, he left behind him his brother Ageſilaus, and his ſuppoſed ſon Leotychides. Wherfore Lyſander that had loued Ageſilaus afore time, gaue him counſell to ſtand for the right of the crowne, as lawful heire and next of the bloud, deſcending of the race of Hercules: becauſe it was ſuſpected that Leotychides was Alcibiades ſon, who ſecretly had kept Timæa Agis wife at what time he was baniſhed out of his country, and came then to remaine in SPARTA. And Agis ſelfe alſo, concluding by reckening of the time of his abſence, that his wife could not be with child by him: made reckening of Leotychides, (and had openly ſhewed it all the reſt of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his ſon, vntill ſuch time as falling ſicke of that diſeaſe whereof he died, he was caried to the citie of HERÆA: and there lying in his death bed, at the humble ſute of Leotychides himſelfe, and partly at the inſtant requeſt of his friends, who were importunate with him, he did acknowledge Leotychides for his ſon in the preſence of diuerſe, whō he prayed to be witneſſes vnto the Lords of LACEDÆMON, of his acceptatiō and acknowledging of him to be his ſon: which they all did in fauour of Leotychides. For all that, Ageſilaus tooke it vpon him, by the ſupport and maintenance of Lyſanders fauour. Howbeit, Diopithes a wiſe man, and knowne to be skilfull in ancient prophecies, did great hurt to Ageſilaus ſide, by an auncient oracle which he alleadged againſt a defect Ageſilaus had, which was his lameneſſe:

King Pauſanias reconciled the Athenians with the Spartans.

Lyſanders terrible words.

The death of king Agis. Lyſander depriueth Leotychides of his kingdome.

O Spartan people you, which beare high haughty hearts,
And looke aloft: take heed I ſay, looke well vnto your marts:
Leſt whiles you ſtand vpright, and guide your ſtate by grace,
Some halting kingdome priuily come creeping in apace.
By that meanes might you moue, great troubles, carke and care,
And miſchiefes heape vpon your head, before you be aware:
And plunged ſhould you be, euen ouer head and eares,
With waſt of wars, which here on earth doth periſh many peeres.

Many

Many by occaſion of this oracle, fell to take Leotychides part: but Lyſander declared vnto them, that Diopithes did not conſtrue the meaning of the oracle well. For God ſaid he, cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that ſhould come to be king of LACEDÆMON: but indeed, the crown and kingdome ſhould halt and be lame, if baſtards not lawfully begotten, ſhould come to raigne ouer the true naturall iſſue and right line of Hercules. By theſe perſwaſions, Lyſander with his great countenance and authoritie beſides, wanne all men to his opinion: ſo that Ageſilaus by this meanes, was proclaimed king of LACEDÆMON. This done, Lyſander beganne ſtraight to counſell him to make warres in ASIA, putting him in hope that he ſhould deſtroy the kingdome of PERSIA, and ſhould come to be the greateſt man of the world. Moreouer he wrote vnto his friends in the cities of ASIA, that they ſhould ſend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to require king Ageſilaus for their Generall, to make warres againſt the barbarous people. Which they did, & ſent Ambaſſadours purpoſely vnto SPARTA to ſue that they might haue him: the which was no leſſe honour procured vnto Ageſilaus by Lyſanders meanes, then that he did, in making him to be choſen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwiſe not vnapt nor vnfit to command, haue this imperfection: that through the iealouſie of glorie, they do commonly enuie their equals, the which doth greatly hinder them for doing any notable things. For they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue, whoſe ſeruice and meanes might helpe them to do great matters. Thus Ageſilaus being choſen Generall of this enterpriſe, tooke Lyſander with him in this iourney, amongſt the thirty counſellers which were giuen vnto him to aſſiſt him: and made ſpeciall choiſe of him, as by whoſe counſell he hoped moſt to be gouerned, and to haue him neareſt about him, as his chiefeſt friend. But when they were arriued in ASIA, they of the countrey hauing no acquaintance with Ageſilaus, ſeldome ſpake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, hauing knowne Lyſander of long time, they followed him, and waited vpon him to his tent or lodging, ſome to honour him, becauſe they were his friends, others for feare, becauſe they did miſtruſt him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there: that he that ſhall play the perſon of ſome meſſenger or ſeruant, ſhall be the beſt player, and ſhall haue the beſt voice to be heard aboue all others: and to the contrarie, that he which hath the royall band about his head, and the ſcepter in his hand, a man doth ſcant heare him ſpeake. Euen ſo it fell out then: for all the dignitie due vnto him that commandeth all, was ſhewed only vnto the counſeller: and there remained to the king no more, but the royall name onely of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinkes that this vndiſcreete and importunate ambition of Lyſander, did well deſerue reproofe, euen to make him to be contented onely with the ſecond place of honor next vnto the king. But for Ageſilaus againe, through extreame couetouſnes and iealouſie of glorie, to caſt Lyſander altogether off, and to ſet ſo light by his friend and benefactor, that ſurely became not him neither. For firſt of all, Ageſilaus neuer gaue Lyſander occaſion to do any thing, neither did commit any matter of waight vnto him, that might be honourable for him: but which is worſt of all, if he perceiued that he had taken any mens cauſes in hand, and that he did fauour them, he did alwaies ſend them backe againe into their countrey, denying their ſute, without that they could obtaine any thing they ſued for, leſſe then the meaneſt perſons that could haue come, extinguiſhing Lyſanders credit by litle and litle, and taking from him all authoritie by this meanes. Wherefore, Lyſander perceiuing how he was thus refuſed and reiected in all things, ſeeing that the countenance and fauor which he thought to ſhew vnto his friends, fell out hurtfull vnto them: left off to ſolicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbeare to come vnto him, or to follow him, but to go to the king, and vnto thoſe that could do them better pleaſure then himſelfe, and ſpecially thoſe that honoured him. When they heard that, many deſiſted to trouble him any more in matters of importance, but not to do him all the honour they could, and continued ſtill to accompany him, when he went out to walke, or otherwiſe to exerciſe himſelfe: the which did aggrauate and increaſe Ageſilaus anger more againſt him, for the enuie he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge and commiſſion in the wars, oftentimes vnto very meane ſouldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lyſander ſurueyor generall of all the ordinarie prouiſion of victuals, and diſtributer of fleſh. And then mocking the IONIANS that did honor him ſo much: Let them go now, ſaid he, and honor my fleſh diſtributer. Wherfore, Lyſander ſeeing it high time to ſpeake, went vnto Ageſilaus, and told him in few words after the LACONIAN maner: Truly Ageſilaus, thou haſt learned well to abaſe thy friends. Indeed, ſaid he againe, ſo haue I, when they will be greater then my ſelfe: & to the contrarie, they that maintain and increaſe my honor & authoritie, it is reaſon that I eſteeme of them. Yea mary, ſaid Lyſander, but perhaps I haue not done as thou ſayeſt: yet I pray thee giue me ſuch an office, as I may be leaſt hated, and moſt profitable for thee: though it be but in reſpect of ſtraungers eyes that looke vpon vs both. After this talke betweene them, Ageſilaus ſent him his Lieutenant into the countrey of HELLESPONT, where Lyſander ſtill kept this anger ſecret in his heart againſt him, but for all that, did not leaue to do all that he could for the benefite of his maiſters affaires. As amongſt many other things, he cauſed a PERSIAN Captaine called Spithridates, to rebell againſt his maiſter, who was a valiant man of his hands, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army alſo which he brought with him vnto Ageſilaus. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iourney. Wherefore he returned againe to SPARTA not long after, with litle honor, being maruellouſly grieued & offended with Ageſilaus, and hating more then before, all the ſtate and gouernement of the city of SPARTA: by reaſon wherof, he determined to put that in practiſe, which he had long time thought vpon, concerning the alteration of gouernment, and his enterpriſe was this: Amongſt the offspring and iſſue of Hercules, who were mingled with the DORIANS, and returned again into the country of PELOPONNESVS, the greateſt number and chiefeſt of them, dwelled in the city of SPARTA: howbeit, all they that came of that race had no right of ſucceſſion to the crowne, ſauing two families only, the Eurytiontides, and the Agiades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobilitie of bloud deſcended out of one ſelfe houſe, yet had they no more right nor intereſt vnto the realme, then the reſidue of the people: for the dignities that were attained vnto by vertue, were giuen vnto the inhabitants that could deſerue thē. Lyſander then being one of thoſe which was deſcended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithſtanding had no intereſt in the crowne: when he ſaw himſelfe aloft, and called to great honor through his famous acts and merits, & that he had won many friends, and great credit & authority by dealing in matters of the ſtate: it grieued him much, to ſee that they which were no nobler then himſelfe, ſhould be kings in that city which he had increaſed by his vertue, and that he could not haue ſo much power as to take from theſe two houſes, the Eurytiontides & the Agiades, the prerogatiue that the kings ſhould be choſen only ont of one of theſe two houſes, and to caſt it vpon the offſpring of Hercules. Some ſay againe, that he would not only haue enlarged that prerogatiue vnto the iſſue of Hercules, but vnto all the naturall SPARTANS alſo: becauſe that Hercules race ſhould not only deſire this reward of honor, but euen they alſo that followed his ſteps in vertue, which had made him equall with the gods in honor. For he doubted not, but if they would diſpoſe the crowne in this ſort, that there was no man in the city of SPARTA that ſhould ſooner be choſen king then himſelfe: wherupon he attempted firſt to perſwade his citizens by very good reaſons, & to bring this about the better he conned an oration without book, penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus, made him for this purpoſe. But afterwards weighing with himſelfe, that ſo great and ſtrange a change as he would bring in, had need of ſome better and ſtronger helpe: he began to frame a deuice, as they ſay, to moue the people by, much after the maner they vſe in tragedies, framing engines to bring ſome god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his fained inuention. He deuiſed certaine oracles & prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rhetoricke would ſtand him in no ſtead, if firſt of all he did not fill the citizens harts with ſome ſuperſtition and feare of the gods, that he might bring them afterwards more eaſily vnto reaſon. And Ephorus ſaith, that he proued firſt to corrupt the Nun with money, that giueth all the oracles and anſwers in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES: and that afterwards, he would haue won the Nun alſo of the temple of DODONE with mony, by Pherecles practiſe. And that he being reiected by them both, went laſtly vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon: and that there he ſpake vnto the prieſts, and offered them great ſtore of money for the ſame purpoſe. But they were ſo offended with Lyſander, that they ſent men of purpoſe to SPARTA, to accuſe him, that he would haue corrupted them with mony. The councell clearing Lyſander of this accuſation, the LYBIANS his accuſers at their departing ſaid: We will one day iudge more iuſtly, then you my Lords of LACEDÆMON haue done now, when you ſhall come to dwell in our country of LYBIA: ſuppoſing there was an ancient propheſie that ſaid, the LACEDÆMONIANS one day ſhould come to dwell in the countrey of LYBIA. But we ſhall do better to write the whole ſtorie at large of this practiſe, ſubtilty, & malitious deuice, which was no matter of ſmall importance, nor lightly grounded: but as in a mathematicall propoſition, there were many great coniectures and preſuppoſitions, and many long circumſtances to bring it to concluſion, cluſion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an hiſtoriographer & philoſopher both hath written. There was in the marches of the Realme of PONT, a woman that ſaid ſhe was gotten with child by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not beleeue at all, and many alſo did beleeue it: ſo that ſhe being deliuered of a goodly ſonne, diuers noble men and of great eſtate were carefull to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This child I know not whereupon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lyſander fetching the plat of his deuice from thence, added to all the reſt of himſelfe, to go on with his practiſe. Now he had many (and they no ſmall men) that made his way to frame this ieſt, giuing out a rumour of the birth of this child, without any ſuſpition gathered out of the intent of this rumor. And furthermore, they brought other newes from DELPHES, which they diſperſed abroad through the city of SPARTA, to wit: that the priſtes of the temple kept ſecret bookes of very auncient oracles, which they themſelues durſt not touch nor handle, neither might any man reade them, vnleſſe he were begotten of the ſeede of Apollo, who ſhould come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the prieſts that kept theſe papers, and that by ſome ſecret marke and token, which they had amongſt them: and thereby being knowne for Apolloes ſon, he might then take the books and reade the auncient reuelations and propheſies of the ſame. Theſe things prepared in this ſort, there was order taken that Silenus ſhould come and aske for theſe bookes as though he were the ſon of Apollo: and that the prieſts which were priuy to this practiſe, ſhould make as though they did diligently examine him of euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had ſeemed to know all, they ſhould deliuer theſe propheſies vnto him, as if he had bene indeed Apolloes ſonne: and that he ſhould openly reade them in the preſence of many witneſſes. And among the reſt of the propheſies, that he ſhould reade that ſpecially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of LACEDÆMONIA: that it was better, & meetlier for the SPARTANS they ſhould chooſe them for their kings, whom they found the meeteſt men of all their magiſtrates. But when Silenus was come to full age, and brought into GRECE of purpoſe to performe this practiſe, all the myſterie was marred by the faint heart of one of the players and companions of Lyſander, who holp him to countenance this deuice: who when the matter ſhould haue taken effect, ſhrunke for feare, and let the myſterie alone. This notwithſtanding, nothing was bewrayed in Lyſanders life time, till after his death. For he died before king Ageſilaus returned out of ASIA, being fallen into warres with BOEOTIA before his death, or rather hauing himſelfe made GRECE to fall into warres. They do report it either way, and ſome lay the fault vpon him, other vpon the THEBANS, and other vpon them both: and they burthen the THEBANS withall, becauſe they did vtterly ouerthrow the common ſacrifices which Ageſilaus made in the citie of AVLIDE. And they ſay alſo, that Androclides and Amphitheus did raiſe this warre among the GRECIANS, being before corrupted with mony by the king of PERSIA to bring warres vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS in GRECE: and began to inuade and deſtroy the country of the PHOCIANS. Other ſay that Lyſander was very angry with the THEBANS, becauſe they onely of all other their confederates did aske the tenth part of all the ſpoile which was won in the war againſt the ATHENIANS: and that they were not pleaſed that Lyſander had ſent the money away vnto SPARTA. But aboue all, Lyſander did malice them moſt, becauſe they were the firſt that made way for the ATHENIANS to be deliuered from the oppreſſion of thirty tyrants, whom he had ſtabliſhed gouernors in ATHENS, & in whoſe fauor (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACEDÆMONIANS had ordained by a common edict, that they that were baniſhed and did flee from ATHENS, might lawfully be taken & apprehended in what place ſoeuer they fled vnto, & that whoſoeuer ſhold reſiſt or let them to do it, they ſhould be proclaimed rebels, & open enemies vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. Againe, to contrarie this edict, the THEBANS made another very like, & meet for the glorious deeds of Bacchus and Hercules their anceſtors, for whom it was made: that euery houſe & city through the country of BOEOTIA, ſhould be open for the ATHENIANS that would come thither, & that he that wold not helpe a baniſhed man frō ATHENS, againſt him that would take him away by force, ſhould be fined & amerced at a talent. And alſo if there were any ſouldiers that went vnto ATHENS, through the country of BOEOTIA, that the THEBANS ſhould not ſee nor heare it. This was no diſſimulation to ſpeake of, that they ſhould ordaine things with ſo gentle words, and ſo meete for the people of GRECE, and then that the deedes ſhould not anſwer vnto their edicts and proclamations. For, Thraſybulus, and his fellowes of the conſpiracie, who kept the caſtle of Phyla, they departed frō

An edict made by the Thebans in fauor of the baniſhed men.

THEBES, with armour and mony, and the THEBANS did helpe them to begin and practise their enterprise so secretly, that it was not discouered. These were the causes why Lysander was so earnestly bent against the THEBANS, and his choler being so extreme, by reason of his melancholinesse that grew daily vpon him more and more through his age, he solicited the EPHORES so, that he perswaded them to send a garrison thither: and himselfe taking the charge of them, vndertooke the iourny straight with his men. But afterwards they sent king Pausanias also with an armie thither, who was to fetch a great compasse about to enter into the country of BOEOTIA, by mount Cithæron: and Lysander should go to meete him through the countrey of PHOCIDES, with a great companie of souldiers besides. Now as Lysander went, he tooke the city of the ORCHOMENIANS, who willingly yeelded themselues to him as soone as he came thither. From thence he went to the city of LEBADIA, which he spoiled: and from thence he wrote vnto king Pausanias, that departing from PLATÆES, he should march directly to the city of ALIARTE, where he would not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne wals. These letters were intercepted by certaine scouts of the THEBANS, who met with the messenger that caried them. Thus the THEBANS hauing intelligence of their purpose, left their city in custodie vnto the ATHENIANS who were come to aide them, and departed out of THEBES about midnight, and marched all night with great speed, that they came to ALIARTE in the morning a litle before Lysander, and put halfe their men into the city. Now for Lysander, he was determined at the first to keepe his men vpon a hill which is neare to the city, and there to tary the coming of king Pausanias. But afterwards when he saw that the day was farre spent, and that he came not, he could tarie no longer, but arming himselfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battell ray, longer then large, by by the high way that went vnto the city. In the mean season, the THEBANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIARTE on the left hand, did set vpon Lysanders rereward of his army against the fountaine called Cissusa: where the poets faine that the nurses of Bacchus did wash him, when he came out of his mothers wombe, because the water that commeth out of it (though it be very cleare & sweet to drinke) hath notwithstanding (I cānot tell by what meanes) a colour like wine: and not far from thence there grow great plenty of Styrap trees. The which the ALIARTIANS do alledge, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that part, and do shew his sepulcher there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there is the monument of Alcmena, which was buried (as they say) in that place, and was maried to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THEBANS who were within the city with the ALIARTIANS, stirred not vntill they saw that Lysander with the first of his troupe was neare vnto the towne wals: and then opening the gates on the sudden, they made a sally out vpon Lysander, & slue him with his soothsayer and a few other, because the most part of the voward fled into the strength of the battell. Howbeit the THEBANS gaue them not ouer so, but followed them so valiantly, that they brake their order, and made them all flie through the mountaines, after they had slaine 3000 of them in the field: so were there three hundred THEBANS also slaine there, who followed their enemies so fiercely, till they recouered straight narow waies, of great strength for them. These three hundred were in maner all those that were suspected in THEBES to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS secretly: wherefore, for the desire they had to take away this opinion from their citizens, they hazarded themselues to no purpose, and were cast away in this chase. King Pausanias heard newes of this ouerthrow, going from PLATÆES vnto THESPIES, and went on further, marching still in battell ray towards ALIARTE, where Thrasybulus also arriued at the selfe same time, bringing the aide of the ATHENIANS from THEBES. And when Pausanias was purposed to send to aske licence of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had slain, to the intent to bury thē: the old SPARTANS that were in his armie, misliking it much, at the first were angry in themselues. But afterwards they went vnto the king himself, to tell him that he dishonored SPARTA, to offer to take vp Lysanders body by his enemies leaue and fauour, and that he should valiantly recouer him by force of armes, and honourably burie him, after that he had ouercome their enemies: or else if it were their fortune to be ouerthrowne, that yet it should be more honorable for them to lie dead in the field by their Captaine, then to aske leaue to take vp his body. But notwithstanding all these words of the old men, king Pausanias seeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the THEBANS in battell, now that they had gotten the victorie, and furthermore, that the body of Lysander lay hard by the wals of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away away without great danger, although they ſhould win the battell: he ſent a herauld to the enemies; and hauing made truce for certaine daies, he led his army away, and tooke vp Lyſanders bodie with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of BOEOTIA, within the territorie of the PANOPEIANS: where vntill this day his tombe remaineth vpon the high way, going from DELPHES vnto the city of CHÆRONEA. Thus Pauſanias campe being lodged there, it is ſayd there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, ſayd that the enemies came to giue a charge vpon them, as Lyſander had paſſed the Oplites. The other wondring at that, there was a SPARTAN a very friend of Lyſanders by, hauing heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? anſwered the PHOCIAN to him againe. Euen there it was where the enemies did ouerthrow the firſt of our men which were ſlaine in the fields: for the riuer that runneth by the wals of the city, is called Oplites. The SPARTAN hearing that, burſt out of weeping for ſorow, ſaying: then I ſee it is vnpoſſible for a man to auoide his deſtinie. For Lyſander aforetime had an Oracle that told him thus:

Lyſander's tombe.

Oplites fl. Deſtinie inuitable.

Lyſander, take good heed, come not I thee aduiſe:
Neare Oplites that riuers bankes, in any kind of wiſe.
Nor neare the Dragon he, which is the earth her ſonne,
Who at the length will thee aſſault, and on thy backe will runne.

Howbeit ſome take it, that this riuer of Oplites is not that which paſſeth by the wals of ALIARTE, but it is the riuer that runneth neare vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into the riuer of Phliarus, hard by the city, and they ſay that in old time it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Iſomantus. He that ſlue Lyſander, was an ALIARTIAN called Neochorus, who caried a Dragon painted vpon his target: and this was that which the Oracle of likelihood did ſignifie. They ſay alſo, that in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the THEBANS had an Oracle from the temple of Apollo Iſmenias: which Oracle did prophecy the battell which they wan by the caſtell of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE alſo, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that Oracle was this:

Phliarus fl. Hoplia, Iſomantus. Neochorus ſlue Lyſander.

When thou thy nets ſhalt ſpread, the wolues for to intrap,
Beware thou come not neare vnto, a litle hill by hap,
Of Orchalide. Nor neare, to any his confines:
For there, the craſty foxes keepe their dens and priuy mines.

He calleth the territorie that is about DELIVM, the vttermoſt confines, becauſe BOEOTIA doth confine there with the countrey of ATTICA, and the hill Orchalide which is now called Alopecon (to ſay the foxe denne) which lieth on that ſide of the city of ALIARTE, that looketh towards mount Helicon. Lyſander being ſlaine, the SPARTANS tooke his death ſo ill, that they would haue condemned king Pauſanias of treaſon by law: who durſt not abide the triall, but fled vnto the city of TEGEA, where he ended the reſt of his life within the ſanctuary of the temple of Minerua. When Lyſander was dead, his pouerty appeared to the world, which made his vertue farre more famous, then when he liued. For when they ſaw, that for all the gold and ſiluer which had paſſed through his hands, for all his great authority and countenance that he had caried, and for all that ſo many cities and townes did come to honor him: and briefly, for all that he had ſo great and puiſſant a kingdome in maner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increaſe his houſe with ſo much as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we ſhould rather beleeue when he praiſeth, then when he diſcommendeth: for commonly he taketh more delight to diſpraiſe, then to praiſe any. It fortuned not long after, as Ephorus writeth, that the LACEDÆMONIANS and their confederates fell at variance together, whereupon Lyſanders letters were to be ſeene that were in his houſe. King Ageſilaus going thither to peruſe them, amongſt other writings, found the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnaſſeus which Lyſander had prepared to perſwade the SPARTANS to change their gouernement, and to declare vnto them that they ſhould reuoke the prerogatiue which the Eurytiontides and the Agiades had: that the kings of SPARTA could not be choſen but out of thoſe two families, and to leaue the prerogatiue at liberty, that the chiefeſt magiſtrates might be lawfully choſen kings of SPARTA. Ageſilaus ſtood indifferent to haue ſhewed this oration openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might ſee what manner a citizen Lyſander had bene in his heart. But Lacratidas, a graue wiſe man, and preſident at that time of the councell of the Ephori, would not ſuffer him: ſaying, that he ſhould not dig Lyſander out of his graue againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that was ſo paſſingly well and eloquently penned to perſwade. Yet notwithſtanding, they did him great honor after his death: & amongſt others, condemned two citizens in a great ſumme of mony, that were made ſure to two of his daughters while he liued, and refuſed to marry them when he was dead, ſeeing their father died ſo poore: becauſe they ſought to match in his houſe, ſuppoſing he had bene rich, and forſooke them afterwards for their fathers pouerty, when they ſaw he died a good and iuſt man. Thus we ſee, that at SPARTA there was a puniſhment for them that did not marry, or that maried too late, or that maried ill: and vnto this puniſhment were they moſt ſubiect, that ſought great matches for couetouſneſſe of goods: This is all we haue to write of Lyſanders life and acts.

THE LIFE OF Sylla.

Sillaes kinred.

Vcius Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the noblemen and gentlemen of ROME: and there was one of his anceſtours called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Conſull. He notwithſtanding his Conſulſhip, wan more diſhonor by defame, then he obtained honor by dignitie of Conſull. For they finding in his houſe aboue ten pounds worth of plate, contrary to the law at that time expreſly forbidding it, he was expulſed the Senate, and loſt his place there, after which diſhonor once receiued, his iſſue neuer roſe, nor yet recouered it. And Sylla himſelfe had very litle left him by his father: ſo that in his youth he was faine to hire another mans houſe, and ſate at a ſmall rent, as afterwards he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they ſaw him richer then they thought he had deſerued. For when he gloried and boaſted of the victory at his returne from the wars of AFRICKE, there was a noble man that ſayd vnto him: Why, how is it poſſible thou ſhouldeſt be an honeſt man, that hauing nothing left thee by thy father, thou art now come to haue ſo much? Now, though ROME had left her ancient iuſtice and pureneſſe of life, wherewith ſhe brought vp her people in former times, and that their hearts were poyſoned with couetous deſire of vaine ſuperfluous delights: yet notwithſtanding it was as foule a reproch to them that did not maintaine themſelues in the pouertie of their fathers, as vnto them that did conſume their patrimony, and bring all to naught which their parents had left them. But afterwards alſo when he caried the whole ſway in ROME, and that he had put ſo many men to death: a free man being borne of the ſlaues infranchiſed, and being readie to be throwne downe the rocke Tarpeian, becauſe he had ſaued and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death whereſoeuer they were found, caſt it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had liued & dwelt together a long time in one ſelfe houſe, he hauing payed a thouſand Nummos for the rent of the vppermoſt roomes of the ſame houſe, and Sylla three thouſand for all the neathermoſt roomes. So that betweene both their wealths, there was but only two thouſand and fiftie Drachmas of ATHENS difference. And this is that we find in writing of his firſt wealth. As for his ſtature and perſon, that appeareth ſufficiently by the ſtatues and images that were made for him, which yet remaine. But for his eies, they were like fire, and wonderfull red: and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull to behold. For he was copper-noſed, and that was full of white ſtreakes here and there: whereupon they ſay that the ſurname of Sylla was giuen him, by reaſon of his colour. And there was a ieſter at ATHENS that finely mocked him in his verſe:

Sylla is like a blacke Bery ſprinckled with meale.

It is not amiſſe to ſearch out the naturall diſpoſition of this man by ſuch outwards markes and tokens. It is ſayd alſo that he was ſo naturally giuen to mocke and ieſt, that being a yong man vnknowne, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tumblers, but ſtill eating and tippling with them in diſſolute maner. And afterwards alſo when he was in his chiefeſt authority, he would commonly eate and drinke with the moſt impudent ieſters and ſcoffers, and all ſuch rakehels, as made profeſſion of counterfeit mirth, & would ſtriue with the baddeſt of them to giue the fineſt mockes: wherein he did not only a thing vncomely for his yeares, and diſhonored the maieſty of his office and dignity, but thereby alſo grew careleſſe and negligent in matters of great importance, whereunto he ſhould haue taken good regard. For after he was once ſet at his table, he was not to be moued any more in matters of waight. Now, though from the table he was commonly found both very actiue, painefull, and ſeuere: yet falling into ſuch company, by drinking, bowſing, and making good cheere, he ſuddenly became another maner of man. So that without all compaſſe of modeſty and iudgement, he was too familiar and conuerſant with players, ieſters, tumblers, and dancers: who when they had him in that vaine, might do what they would with him. Of this ryoting came (in mine opinion) his vice of lecherie, whereunto he was greatly giuen, and eaſily drawen after loue and pleaſure: in ſuch ſort, as his gray haires could not reſtraine his voluptous life. His vnlawfull luſting loue beganne in his young yeares, with one Metrobius a common player, which ſtretched on increaſing his amorous deſire vntill his latter age. For at the firſt he loued Nicopolis a rich curtiſan: and frequentiug her company by oft acceſſe, and beſides that he ſpent the prime of his beauty and youth in feaſting her with great delight and paſſing pleaſure, ſhe afterwards became in loue with him, ſo that when ſhe died, ſhe made Sylla her heire of all ſhe had. He was heire alſo vnto his mother in law, who loued him as her owne begotten ſonne: and by theſe two good haps he was ſtept vp to prety wealth. Afterwards being choſen Quæſtor (to ſay treaſurer) the firſt time that Marius was Conſull, he imbarked with him in his iourney into AFRICKE, to warre with king Iugurth. When he was arriued at the campe, he ſhewed himſelfe a man of great ſeruice in all other things, but in this eſpecially, that he could wiſely vſe the benefit of any occaſion offered him, and thereby wan Bocchus king of the NVMIDIANS to be his faſt and faithfull friend: whoſe Ambaſſadours, that ſcaped from a companie of NVMIDIAN theeues, he courteouſly entertained, and hauing giuen them goodly preſents, ſent them backe againe with a ſafe conuoy. Now concerning king Bocchus, he had of long time both hated and feared king Iugurth his ſonne in law: inſomuch, that after he was ouercome in battell, and came to him for ſuccour, Bocchus practiſed treaſon againſt him, and for this cauſe ſent ſecretly for Sylla, deſiring rather that Iugurth ſhould be taken by Sylla, then by himſelfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom hauing receiued a ſmall number of ſouldiers to accompany him (without reſpect of perill or daunger) went and committed himſelfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous king, to take another: conſidering alſo that the king whom he truſted was ſo vniuſt of his word, euen vnto his neareſt friends and confederates. Now Bocchus hauing Iugurth and Sylla both in his power, and brought himſelfe to that pinch, that of neceſſity he muſt betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath to reſolue which of the two he ſhould deale withall, in the end went on with his firſt plot and deuice of treaſon, and ſo deliuered Iugurth into Syllaes hands. Indeed Marius triumphed for taking of king Iugurth: but his euill willers, for the ſpite and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory and honor of Iugurths taking wholly vnto Sylla. That ſecretly went to Marius hart, and ſpecially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from a baſe, obſcure, and vnknowne life, to be knowne and well accepted of the people in Rome, and to taſte alſo what honor meant) became ſo ambitious and couetous of glory, that he cauſed the ſtory to be grauen in a ring, which he did euer after vſe to weare and ſeale withall: wherein king Bocchus was deliuering of Iugurth vnto Sylla, and Sylla alſo receiuing Iugurth priſoner. Theſe things miſliked Marius much: but notwithſtanding, iudging that Sylla was not ſo much enuied as himſelfe, he tooke him with him vnto the wars. Marius in his ſecond Conſulſhip, made Sylla one of his Lieutenants: and in his third Conſulſhip, he had charge vnder him of a thouſand footmen, and did many notable and profitable exploits for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenant, he tooke one Copillus, a Generall of the Gavles Tectoſages. And when he was Colonell of a thouſand footemen, he ſo wrought the Marsians (a populous nation of Italie) that he perſwaded them to remaine good friends and confederates of the Romaines. For this his good ſeruice, he found that Marius grew in great miſliking with him, becauſe from thencefoorth he neuer gaue him any honorable charge, or occaſion to ſhew good ſeruice: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his riſing. Wherefore, Sylla afterwards tooke Catulus Luctatius part, who was companion with Marius in his Conſulſhip. This Catulus was a very honeſt man, but ſomewhat ſlacke and cold in marſhall matters, which was the cauſe that indeed he did commit vnto Sylla all the ſpeciall ſeruice, and matters of weight in his charge: whereupon he gaue him occaſion not only to increaſe his eſtimation, but alſo his credit and power. For, by force of armes, he conquered the moſt part of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus campe lacking victuals, hauing commiſſion, he made a maruellous great quantity of prouiſion to be brought thither, inſomuch as Catulus campe being plentifully victualled, they ſent their ſtore and ſurpluſſage vnto Marius ſouldiers, the which Sylla himſelfe writeth, did much miſlike Marius. And this is the firſt cauſe of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon ſo light occaſion, was followed with ciuill warres, great effuſion of bloud, and with incurable factions and diſſentions, that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confuſion of all the Romaine ſtate and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wiſe man, and one that foreſaw the ruines of commonweales, when he counſelled, and alſo commanded gouernors to flie ambition, as a moſt peſtilent and mortall fury vnto them that are once infected withall. Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the wars, would haue made his way open to preferre him to ſome honorable office in the city of Rome: he was no ſooner returned from the warres, but he would needs proue the peoples good wils vnto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that ſued for the Prætorſhip of the city (that is to ſay, the office of the ordinary Iudge that miniſtreth iuſtice vnto the citizens) but he was reiected by the voice of the people. For the which he layd the fault vpon the meaner ſort, ſaying, that the communalty knew well inough the friendſhip he had with king Bocchus, and that therefore they hoping that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, he would make them ſee noble huntings and great fightings of wild beaſts of Lybia: and that therefore they did chuſe other Prætors, and put him by his ſuite, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be firſt of all Ædilis. Howbeit it ſeemeth that he doth not confeſſe the truth of his refuſall: for his owne act doth condemne himſelfe: becauſe the next yeare following he was choſen Prætor, partly for that he wan the people with curteſie, and partly with mony. So he falling out with Cæſar vpon that occaſion, in his anger threatned him that he would vſe the power and authority of his office vpon him. But Cæſar ſmiling, anſwered him: thou haſt reaſon to call it thine office, for indeed it is thine, becauſe thou haſt bought it. But after the time of his Prætorſhip was expired, he was ſent with an army into Cappadocia, colouring his voyage thither with commiſſion to reſtore Ariobarzanes into his kingdome againe: howbeit the only cauſe of his iourny was indeed to ſurpreſſe king Mithridates a little, who tooke too many things in hand, and increaſed his power and dominion with a new ſigniory of no leſſe greatneſſe then that which he had before. In truth he brought no great army out of Italy with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the confederates of the Romaines in euery place, through whoſe aide he ouerthrew a great number of the Cappadocians, and afterwards alſo a great number of the Armenians, which came in like caſe to aide them: ſo that he

expulsed Gordius King of PHRYGIA out of CAPPADOCIA, and restored Ariobarzanes to his Realme againe. After which victorie, Sylla remained by the riuer of Euphrates, and thither came vnto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambassadour of Arsaces king of the PARTHIANS. Now these two nations, the ROMAINES and the PARTHIANS, were neuer friends before: and that with other things shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANS came first to him by his meanes to seeke friendship with the ROMAINES. They say, that receiuing this Ambassadour Orobazus, he made three chaires to be brought out, the one for King Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassadour, and the third for himselfe, which he placed in the middest betweene them both, and sitting downe in the same, gaue audience vnto the Ambassadour: for which cause the king of PARTHIA afterwards put Orobazus to death. Some do commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such maiestie among the barbarous people. Other do reproue his ambition in it, shewing himselfe stately out of time, and to no purpose. We do reade that a Soothsayer of CHALDEA being in Orobazus traine, hauing diligently viewed and considered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouings and gestures of mind and body, to iudge not by the clymate of the countrey, but according to the rules of his art what his nature should be: all well considered of, he sayd that Sylla one day must needes come to be a great man, and that he maruelled how he could suffer in that he was not euen then the chiefest man of the world. When Sylla was returned againe to ROME, one Censorinus accused him of extortion, that he had caried away a great summe of money with him, contrary to the law, out of one of their confederates countrey: howbeit he prosecuted not his accusation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time the enmitie begun betwixt him and Marius, kindled againe vpon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the peoples fauour of ROME, and partly also for to gratifie Sylla, gaue and dedicated certaine images of victorie carying tokens of triumph, vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and next vnto them also the image of Iugurth, which he deliuered into the hands of Sylla, being all of pure gold. This did so offend Marius, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the citie of ROME taking armes, had like to haue brought all to ruine: had not the warres of the confederates of ITALIE bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and sedition for that time. In this maruellous great warre which fell out verie dangerous, by sundry misfortunes and great losses to the ROMAINES, Marius did no notable exploite: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike discipline hath need of a strong, lustie, and able body. For Sylla to the contrarie, hauing done notable seruice, and obtained many profitable victories, wan the fame and estimation among the ROMAINES, of a noble souldier, and worthie Captaine: and among the enemies themselues, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the sonne of Conon had done: who, when his aduersaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deeds vnto the fauour of fortune, and did paint fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and snared in nets whilest he slept, he tooke it in very ill part, and was maruellous angrie with them that did it, saying, that they robbed him of the glorie that iustly belonged vnto him. Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole discourse of his doings in his voyage, he sayd vnto them: My Lords of ATHENS, fortune hath had no part in all this which I haue told vnto you. Hereupon the gods it should seeme were so angrie with this fooliish ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwards did any worthie thing, but all went vtterly against the haire with him: vntill at the length he came to be so hated of the people, that in the end they banished him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not onely patiently abide their words, that sayd, he was a happy man, and singularly beloued of fortune: but also increasing this opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the gods, did attribute the honour of his doings vnto fortune, either for a vaine glorie, or for that he had in fancie, that the gods did prosper him in all his doings. For he wrote himselfe in his commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hotly according to the sudden occasion offered, did better prosper with him, then those which by good aduice he had determined of. Furthermore, when he sayd that he was better borne vnto fortune, then to the warres: it seemeth that he confessed all his prosperitie came rather by fortune, then by his worthinesse. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly ſubmit himſelfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vpon her: conſidering that he did attribute it to the ſpeciall grace and fauour of the gods, that he neuer diſagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignity and authority as himſelfe was. For where it was thought he would haue bene a great hinderer of his doings, he found him very courteous & gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reaſon of the ſociety of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucullus, he counſelled him to thinke nothing more certaine and aſſured, then that which the gods ſhould reueale vnto him, and commaund him in his nights dreame. He writeth alſo that when he was ſent with an army vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth ſuddenly opened about LAVERNA, out of the which immediatly came a maruellous bright flame of fire that aſcended vp to the element. The wiſe men being asked their opinions about the ſame, made anſwer, that a very honeſt man, and alſo a maruellous faire man of complexion taking ſoueraigne authority in his hands, ſhould pacifie all tumults and ſeditions which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla ſayd it was himſelfe whom the gods meant, becauſe that amongſt other things he had that ſingular gift of beauty, that his haire was yellow as gold: and he was not aſhamed to name himſelfe an honeſt man, after he had wonne ſo many notable great victories. Thus haue we ſufficiently ſpoken of the truſt he had in the fauour of the gods. And furthermore, he ſeemed to be very contrary in his maners, and vnlike to himſelfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he gaue as much more alſo in another. Some he preferred without cauſe: and others he put downe without reaſon. He would be very gentle vnto them of whom he would haue ought: and vnto thoſe that ſought of him, he would ſtand much vpon his honour, and looke for great reuerence. Whereby men could hardly diſcerne his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vſed in puniſhing of them that had offended him: ſomtimes he hanged vp men for very ſmall and light cauſes: ſome other times againe to the contrary, he patiently abode the moſt grieuous offences in the world, and lightly pardoned and forgaue ſuch faults as were in no wiſe to be forgiuen: and afterwards againe would puniſh right ſmal crimes, with murthers, effuſion of bloud, & confiſcation of goods. This iudgement may be giuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a reuenging mind: yet notwithſtanding he qualified that naturall bitterneſſe with reaſon, giuing place to neceſſity, and his benefit. For in this warre of the confederates, his ſouldiers ſlue Albinus one of his Lieutenants, beating him to death with ſtaues and ſtones, being a man of good quality, and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he paſſed ouer with ſilence, vſing no maner of puniſhment, and turned it to a boaſt in the end, ſaying that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any peece of ſeruice that was to be done, and that he made them amend their faults by worthy ſeruice. And furthermore, he did not regard them that did reproue him: but hauing determined with himſelfe to deſtroy Marius, and to procure that he might be choſen Generall in the warres againſt king Mithridates, becauſe that this warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cauſe he flattered and curried fauor with his ſouldiers that ſerued vnder him. At his returne to ROME from theſe warres of the confederates, he was choſen Conſull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty yeares old, and maried with Cæcilia a noble Ladie, and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe biſhop of ROME, for which mariage the comon people ſang ſongs and ballads vp and downe ROME againſt him: and many of the noble men enuied him for it, thinking him vnworthy of ſo noble a Ladie, whom they thought worthy to be Conſull, as Titus Liuius ſaith. Now ſhe was not his only wife, for he had a yong wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After he had maried Ælia, then a third called Cælia, whom he put away becauſe ſhe brought him no children. But notwithſtanding ſhe went honourably away from him, with very good words of her, beſides many other goodly rich gifts he gaue her: howbeit ſhortly after he maried Metella, which made the world ſuſpect that Cælia was put away for her naughtineſſe. Howſoeuer it was, Sylla did euer honour and loue Metella: in ſo much as the people of ROME afterwards making ſute, that they that were baniſhed for Marius faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refuſed by Sylla, they cried out with open voice for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtaine their requeſt. And it ſeemeth alſo that when he had taken the city of ATHENS, he dealt more cruelly with them, becauſe that ſome of them had ſcoffed at Metella from the wals: howbeit that was afterwards. So Sylla making his reckoning at that time that the Conſulſhip was a ſmall matter, in compariſon of that which he looked for in the time to come: was maruellous maruellous desirous to go against Mithridates. But therein Marius also, of a mad furious ambition and couetousnesse of glory stood against him, and sued to go that iourny in like maner, being subiect to those passions, which neuer wax old, as we may daily see by experiẽce. For being now a heauy man, sickly of body, and broken in seruice abroad in the wars, from the which he came but newly home, and brused moreouer with age: did notwithstanding yet aspire to haue the charge of the wars so farre off beyond the seas. Wherefore to obtaine his purpose, whilest Sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to giue order for certaine things that were to be done, he remaining in the citie, did practise this pestilent mortall sedition, which alone did more hurt vnto the citie of Rome, then all the enemies that Rome euer had: the which the gods themselues had foreshewed by many signes and tokens. For fire tooke of it selfe in the staues of the ensignes, which they had much ado to quench. Three rauens brought their young ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the sight of many people, and afterwards caried the garbage they left of them into their neasts. Rats also hauing gnawne some iewels of gold in a church, the sextens setting a trap for them, a rat was taken full of young, and kendled fiue yong rats in the trap, of the which she eat vp three. But more yet, on a faire bright day when there was no cloud seene in the element at all, men heard such a sharpe sound of a trumpet, that they were almost all out of their wits, for feare of so great a noise. Whereupon the wisemen and soothsayers of Thvscan being asked their opinions, answered: that this so straunge and wonderfull signe did foreshew the chaunge of the world, and the departure out of this into another life: for they hold opinion, that there should be eight worlds, all contrary one vnto another, in manners and fashions of life: vnto euery one of the which, sayd they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance: but that they should all end their course within the space of the reuolution of the great yeare: and that when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there shall appeare such straunge signes on the earth, or in the element. So that such as haue studied that science, do certainly know, as soone as men be borne, which are meere contrary vnto the first in their liues and maners, and which are either more or lesse acceptable vnto the gods, then those which liued in former age. For they say, that amongst great changes and alterations which are done in those places from one age vnto another, the science of diuination, and foretelling of things to come doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaseth God to send most certaine and manifest signes, to know and foretell things to come. And in contrariwise also in another age it groweth to contempt, and looseth her reputation, for that it is very rash, and faileth to meete with the most part of her predictions, because she hath but obscure meanes, and all her instruments defaced, to know what should come. And these be the fables which the wisest soothsayers of Thvscan reported abroad, and they specially who seemed to haue some singular speculation aboue others. But as the Senate were talking with the soothsayers of these wonders, being assembled together within the temple of the goddesse Bellona, a sparrow came flying into the church in sight of them all, and caried a grashopper in her bill, and parted it in the middest, and left one part within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wisemen and interpreters of such wonders, sayd, that they doubted a commotion and rising of the country men against the commons of the city, because the cõmon people of the city do cry out continually like grashoppers, and the husbandmen do keepe themselues vpon their lands in the country. Thus Marius grew great and very familiar with Sulpitius, one of the Tribunes of the people, who in all kinds of wickednesse and mischiefe that a man can reckon, would giue place to no liuing creature: so that a man need not to seeke or demaund any where for a worse then he, but the question is rather wherein he himselfe was not the worst of all others. For he was full repleat with all kinds of cruelty, auarice, and rashnesse, and that so extremely, as he cared not what villany and wickednesse he openly committed, so that the same might turne to his profit. For he had set vp a table in the open market place, where he sold freedome, making slaues and strangers denizons of Rome for their money: and for that purpose he entertained a gard of three thousand about him, besides a band of yong gentlemen of the order of knights that attended alwaies vpon his person ready at his commandement, whom he called the gard against the Senate. And furthermore, himselfe hauing passed a law by the voyce of the people, that no Senatour should borrow nor owe aboue two thousand Drachmas: it was found that at the houre of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beast, being left by Marius amongst the people, turned all things topsie turuey, by force of armes and maine ſtrength. He made alſo many wicked lawes to paſſe by voice of the people, and amongſt others, that one ſpecially, whereby he gaue Marius commiſſion to make warres againſt king Mithridates. For which extreme oppreſſions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Conſuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to heare publike cauſes, and ceaſſed the common courſe of law and iuſtice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiornement of the law, in an open aſſembly in the market place, before the temple of Caſtor and Pollux: Sulpitius the Tribune came vpon them with his ſouldiers, and ſlue many people, and among others, the Conſull Pompeius owne ſonne, and the father himſelfe being Conſull, had much ado to ſaue his life by flying. And Sylla the other Conſull, was alſo purſued euen into Marius houſe, where he was compelled to promiſe before his departure, preſently to go and reuoke the adiornement of the law which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius hauing depriued Pompeius of his Conſulſhip, did not depoſe Sylla, but onely tooke from him the charge he had giuen him to make warres againſt Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marius. And ſending Colonels to the citie of Nola to receiue the armie that lay there, and to bring them vnto Marius, Sylla preuented them, and fled to the campe before them, and told the ſouldiers all what had paſt, as it was indeed: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and ſlue Marius Colonels with ſtones. Marius on the other ſide put all Syllaes friends to death at Rome, and tooke the ſpoile of their goods and houſes: ſo was there nothing elſe but flying from the campe to Rome, and from Rome to the campe againe. The Senate were in manner beſide themſelues, not being able to gouerne as they would, but driuen to obey Marius and Sulpitius commaundements. Who being aduertiſed that Sylla was comming towards Rome, ſent ſtraight two Prætors vnto him, Brutus and Seruilius, to commaund him as from the Senate, to approch no nearer. Theſe two Pretors ſpake a litle too boldly vnto Sylla: whereupon the ſouldiers fell to a mutinie, in ſuch ſort, that they ſtood indifferent whether to kill them preſently in the field, or no: howbeit they brake their axes and bundels of rod, which were caried before them, and tooke their purple robes wherwith they were apparelled as magiſtrates, from thē, and ſent them home thus ſhamefully handled and intreated. Vpon their returne now to Rome, their ſad ſilence onely, and themſelues ſo ſtripped beſides of all their markes and tokens of Prætoriall dignitie, made all men then to iudge that they brought no other newes, but ſuch as were the worſt that poſſibly could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie this ſedition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers began to make himſelfe ſtrong by force: and Sylla with his companion Quintus Pompeius, departed in the meane time from the city Nola, and brought ſix entier legions on with him, who deſired no other thing but to make haſt to march to Rome ward. Howbeit Sylla ſtood in doubt with himſelfe what to do, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Vntill ſuch time as his ſoothſayer Poſthumius hauing conſidered the ſignes and tokens of the ſacrifices, which Sylla had made vpon this determination, gaue him both his hands, and bad him bind them hard, and ſhut him vp faſt, vntill the day of battell ſhould be paſt: ſaying, that he was contented to ſuffer death, if he had not good ſucceſſe, and that out of hand, to his great honour. And it is ſayd alſo, that the ſame night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame the goddeſſe Bellona, whom the Romaines do greatly honour, following therein the Cappadocians: and I know not whether it be the Moone, Minerua, or Enyo the goddeſſe of battels. So he thought, that ſhe comming to him did put lightning into his hand, commaunding him that he ſhould lighten vpon his enemies, naming them one after another by their proper names: and that they being ſtriken with his lightning, fell downe dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This viſion incouraged Sylla very much, and hauing reported the ſame to Pompeius, his fellow Conſull and companion, the next morning he marched with his army to Rome. When he was at Picines, there came other Ambaſſadours vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to Rome in this heate and furie, declaring therewithall that the Senate would graunt him all things that ſhould be meete and reaſonable. When Sylla had heard the meſſage, he anſwered them, that he would campe there: and ſo commaunded the marſhals to deuide the ſquadrons according to their maner. The Ambaſſadours beleeuing that he would ſo haue done indeed, returned againe to Rome: howbeit their backes were no ſooner turned, but Sylla ſtraight ſent Lucius Baſillus, and Caius Mummius before to ſeaze one of the gates of Rome, and the wals which were on the ſide of mount Eſquilin, and he himſelfe alſo in perſon with all poſſible ſpeed marched after them. Baſillus entred Rome, and wanne the gate by

by force. But the common people vnarmed, got them vp ſtraight to the top of their houſes, and with tiles and ſtones ſtayed and kept him, not onely for entring any further: but alſo draue him backe againe, euen to the verie wals of the city. In this hurly burly came Sylla himſelfe to Rome, who ſeeing apparantly in what ſtate things ſtood, cryed out to his men, and bad them ſet fire on the houſes: and himſelfe taking a torch light in his hand, ſhewed them the way what they ſhould do, appointing his archers and darters to hurle and beſtow their darts and other fierie inſtruments, to the tops of the houſes. Herein he was too much ouercome with vnreaſonable choler, paſſion, and deſire of reuenge: for ſeeking onely to plague his enemies, he tooke no regard to friends, to parents or confederates, neither had he yet any manner of remorſe or pity: ſuch and ſo fierie was his anger then, that he put no kind of difference betweene thoſe that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all. By this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by ſound of trumpet, that he would make free all the ſlaues that would come to his part. But forthwith came his enemies, ſet vpon him, and preſt him ſo neare, that he was conſtrained vtterly to flie and forſake the citie. Then Sylla aſſembling the Senate, cauſed Marius, and certaine others, together with Sulpitius Tribune of the people, to be condemned to death. Sulpitius was betrayed by a ſlaue of his owne, whom Sylla made made free according to his promiſe paſt by publike edict: but when he had made him free, he cauſed him to be throwne downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian. And not contented with this, he promiſed by proclamation a great ſum of money to him that would kill Marius: a very ingrate and vnthankfull part, conſidering that Marius not many dayes before hauing Sylla in his owne houſe, in his hands and cuſtodie, deliuered him from peril, and ſet him in ſafety. Which if at that time he had not done, but had ſuffered Sulpitius to haue ſlaine him, himſelfe had bene ſoueraine Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might haue ruled all things at his owne will and pleaſure. But Sylla ſhortly after vpon the like aduantage, vſed no ſuch manner of requitall or gratuitie towards him, which bred a ſecret miſliking amongſt the Senate: howbeit the common people made open ſhew of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reiecting one Nonius his nephew, and one Seruius, who vpon confidence of his fauour, preſented themſelues to ſue for certaine offices. And beſides the ſhame of this refuſall, to ſpite him the more, they choſe others in their ſteades, whoſe honour and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely miſlike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wiſely diſſembling the matter, ſeemed to be verie glad, ſaying that by his meanes the people of Rome enioyed a full and perfect libertie, that in ſuch caſes of election they might freely do what themſelues liſted. And to mitigate ſomewhat the peoples ill will towards him, he determined to chuſe Lucius Cinna Conſull, who was of a contrarie faction to him: hauing firſt bound him by ſolemne oath and curſe to fauour his doings and whole proceedings. Whereupon Cinna went vp to the Capitoll, and there holding a ſtone in his hand, did ſolemnely ſweare and promiſe, that he would be Syllaes faithfull friend: beſeeching the gods if he did the contrarie, that he might be throwne out of Rome, euen as he threw that ſtone out of his hand: and with thoſe words, threw it to the ground before many people. But notwithſtanding all theſe curſes, Cinna was no ſooner entred into his Conſulſhip, but preſently he began to change and alter all. For amongſt other things, he would needs haue Sylla accuſed: and procured Verginius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuſer. But Sylla left him with his Iudges, and went to make warres againſt Mithridates. And it is ſayd, that about the time that Sylla tooke ſhip, and departed out of Italie: there fortuned many tokens and warnings of the gods vnto king Mithridates, who was at that preſent in the citie of Pergamvs, as amongſt others, that the Pergamenians to honour Mithridates withall, hauing made an image of victorie, carying a garland of triumph in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: ſo ſoone as ſhe was readie to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the ground in the middeſt of the Theater, and burſt all to peeces. Whereby all the people that were preſent, were ſtricken with a maruellous feare, and Mithridates himſelfe began to miſlike this euill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately then he looked for. For he had taken Asia from the Romaines, and Bithynia and Cappadocia, from the kings which he had driuen out: and at that time remained in the citie of Pergamvs, to deuide the riches and great territories among his friends. As touching his ſonnes, the eldeſt gouerned the realme Pontvs, and of Bosphorvs, which he inherited from his predeceſſours, euen vnto the deserts beyond the marishes of Mœotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great armie in conquering of THRACIA, and MACEDON. His Captaines and Lieutenants moreouer, did many notable conquests in diuerse places, with a great power: amongst the which, Archelaus being Lord and maister of all the sea, for the great number of ships he had, conquered the Iles CYCLADES, and all those beyond the head of MALEA, and specially amongst others the Ile of EVBOEA. And beginning at the city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GRECE to rebell, euen vnto THESSALIE, sauing that he receiued some losse by the city of CHÆRONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenants of Sentius gouernour of MACEDON (a man of great wisedome and valiantnesse) came against him, and stayed him for going any further, ouerrunning the whole countrey of BOEOTIA like a furious raging riuer. And setting vpon Archelaus by the citie of CHÆRONEA, ouerthrew him in three seuerall battels: repulsed, and enforced him to take the seas againe. But as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commaundement to giue place vnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and commission in that behalfe giuen him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the countrey of BOEOTIA, and returned towards his Generall Sentius, notwithstanding his affaires prospered better then he could haue wished, and that all GRECE were very willing to reuolt, for the reputation of his wisedome and goodnesse. Howbeit the things that we before haue spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those parts. Sylla now vpon his arriuall, recouered immediatly all the other cities of GRECE: who being aduertised of his comming, sent presently to pray him to come to their aide, the citie of ATHENS onely excepted, which was compelled by the tyrant Aristion, to take part with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his power went thither, besieged the hauen of PIRÆA round, causing it to be battered and assaulted on euerie side, with all sorts of engines and instruments of batterie: whereas if he could haue had patience but a litle longer, he might haue had the high towne by famine, without putting himselfe in any manner of daunger, the same being brought to such extreame dearth and scarsity of all kind of victuals. But the haste that he made to returne againe to ROME, for feare of the new chaunge which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that sort with great daunger, many battels, and infinite charge: considering also, that besides all other prouision and furniture, he had twenty thousand mules and mulets labouring daily to furnish his engines of battery. And when all other wood failed him, because his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, some breaking of themselues by reason of their waight, others consumed with fire throwne from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better stored and furnished, then any other parke of pleasure in all the suburbes of the city, and felled downe all the wood of the parke Lycæum. And standing in need of a great summe of money to entertaine this warre withall, he dealt also with the holiest temples of all GRECE, causing them to bring him from the temples of EPIDAVRVM and OLYMPVS, all the richest and most precious iewels they had. He wrote moreouer vnto the councell of the AMPHICTYONS holden in the citie of DELPHES, to bring him the readie money they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safetie with him, then if it still remained there: promising besides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to vse it, he would restore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphis PHOCIAN, one of his very friends and familiars, and commaunded him to wey all that he tooke. So Caphis went vnto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, in presence of the councell of the AMPHICTYONS he wept, that the teares ranne downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to do such an acte against his will. And when some that were present, told Caphis that they heard the sound of Apolloes Citherne in the temple: whether he beleeued it was so indeed, or because he would put this superstitious feare into Syllaes head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, sent him word, that he maruelled he could not consider, that singing and playing on the Citherne, were tokens rather of ioy then of anger, and therefore that he should not faile to proceed farther, and bring him those things which he commaunded, for that (sayd he) Apollo did giue them him. Now for the other iewels of the temple of Apollo, the common people knew not that they were sent vnto Sylla: but the siluer tunne, which onely was that that remained of the offerings of the kings, the AMPHICTYONS were faine to breake that in peeces, because it was so great and massie, that the beasts of draught could could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other ancient Romaine captains, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus Æmilius: of the which, the one hauing driuen king Antiochus out of Greece, and the reſt alſo hauing ouerthrowne the kings of Macedon, they neuer once touched the gold and ſiluer of the temples of Greece: but contrarily ſent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honour and reuerence. But as to them, they were all captaines lawfully choſen and ſent to their charges: their ſouldiers well trained, and obedient at commandement, voide of rebellion, or any manner of mutinie. And for themſelues, were kings in greatneſſe of courage and magnanimitie of mind: but in expence of their perſons, very ſpare and ſcant, without any lauiſh, but needfull and neceſſarie, proportioned by reaſon, and thinking more ſhame to flatter their ſouldiers, then feare their enemies. Now the captaines contrarily in Syllaes time, ſought not their preferment in the common wealth by vertue, but by force, and hauing greater warres one with another, then with ſtrangers their enemies, were compelled to flatter their ſouldiers whom they ſhould commaund, and to buy their paines and ſeruice, feeding them ſtill with large and great expences, to pleaſe and content them. Wherein they did not conſider, that they brought their country into bondage, and made themſelues ſlaues of the vileſt people of the world, whileſt that in the meane time they ſough to commaund by all meanes poſſible thoſe, which in many reſpects were farre better then themſelues. And this was the cauſe that both draue Marius out of Rome, and made him alſo to returne againe againſt Sylla. This ſelfe ſame cauſe made Cinna to kill Octauius, and Fimbria to ſlay Flaccus: of which euils Sylla was the very firſt and onely author, ſpending out of all reaſon, and giuing the ſouldiers largely that ſerued vnder him, to win their goodwils the more, and thereby alſo to allure them. By reaſon whereof, Sylla had need of mountaines of money, and ſpecially at the ſiege where he was: both to make ſtrangers traytors, and beſides, to furniſh and ſatisfie his owne diſſolute ſouldiers: for he had ſuch an earneſt deſire to take the city of Athens, that he could not poſſibly be diſſwaded from it. And either it was of a certaine vaine ambition he had to fight againſt the ancient reputation of that citie, being then but a ſhadow to that it had bene: or elſe of a very anger, for the mockes and gibes which the tyrant Ariſtion gaue in his ſpeeches from the wals, againſt him and Metella, to ſpite him the more withall. This tyrant Ariſtion was full of all crueltie and wickedneſſe, hauing taken vp all the worſt qualities and greateſt imperfections of king Mithridates, and heaped them wholly together in himſelfe: by reaſon whereof the poore city of Athens which had eſcaped from ſo many warres, tyrannies, and ciuill diſſentions vntill that preſent time, was by him, as by an vncurable diſeaſe, brought vnto all extremity: for a buſhell of wheat was worth a thouſand Drachmas, and men were driuen for famine to eate feuerfew that grew about the caſtle: and they cauſed old ſhooes and old oyle pots to be ſodden, to deliuer ſome ſauor vnto that they did eate, whileſt the tyrant himſelfe did nothing all day long but cram in meate, and drinke dronke, daunce, maske, ſcoffe, and flout at the enemies, ſuffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane ſeaſon to go out for lacke of oile. And when the Nun of the ſame temple ſent vnto him for a quarter of a buſhell of wheate, he ſent her a quarter of a buſhell of pepper. And when the counſellors of the city, the prieſts and religious came to the caſtell, holding vp their hands, and beſeeching him to take ſome pity of the citie, and fall to compoſition with Sylla: he made them to be driuen away & ſcattered with ſlings. In the end, very late, and yet with great ado, he ſent two or three of his quaffing companions vnto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demand of compoſition for the towne, but began to praiſe and magnifie the deeds of Theſeus, of Eumolpus, and of the Athenians againſt the Medes. Whereupon Sylla made them this anſwer: My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rhetoricke: for the Romaines ſent me not hither to learne nor to ſtudy, but to ouercome & conquer thoſe that are rebelled againſt them. In the meane time there were certaine ſpies in the city that heard old men talking together in a place call Ceramicus, blaming the tyrant becauſe he kept no better watch on that ſide of the wall that was directly ouer againſt the Heptachalcon, which was the onely place where the enemies might eaſilieſt get vp vpon the wals. Thoſe ſpies went ſtraight vnto Sylla, and told him what they had heard the old men ſay. Sylla tracted no time, but came to the place in the night to ſee it: and perceiuing that it was to be taken, ſet the matter ſtraight abroach. And himſelfe writes in his commentaries, that the firſt man that ſcaled the wals, was Marcus Teius: who finding a ſouldier readie to reſiſt him, gaue him ſuch a ſore blow with his ſword vpon his headpeece, that his ſword brake in two, and yet notwithſtanding that he ſaw himſelfe naked and disarmed of a sword, did not for all that giue backe, but stood still to it, and kept the place so long till through him the city was taken, and all vpon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the wall to be pulled downe betweene the hauen of Piræa, and the holy hauen: and hauing before made the breach very plaine, entred into the city about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a maruellous noise with a number of hornes, and sounding of trumpets, and all his armie with him in order of battell, crying, to the sacke, to the sacke: kill, kill. For he had giuen them the towne in spoile, and to put all to the sword. The souldiers therefore ran through the streetes with their swords drawne, making an vncredible slaughter: so that to this day they be not acknowne, nor do not declare what number of persons were slaine, but to shew the greatnesse of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seene where the bloud ranne. For besides them that were slaine through all the city, the bloud of them onely that were slaine in the market steed, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Dipylon: and some say also, that it ranne by the gates into the suburbes of the citie. But if the multitude of the people that were slaine in this sort were great, much more (or so manie at the least) it is sayd were those that slue themselues, for the sorow and compassion they had to see their countrey in such pitifull state, supposing certainely that their citie was now come to vtter ruine and destruction. This opinion made the noblest men of the citie to despaire of their owne safety, and feared to liue any longer, because they thought they should find no mercie, nor moderation of crueltie in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the requests of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from Athens, and fell at Syllaes feete vpon their knees: and partly also at the requests of the Romaine Senatours that were in his campe, who prayed him to pardon the bodie of the citie, and the rather for that he had alreadie quenched the thirst of his rauening mind sufficiently well: after that he had somewhat sayd in praise of the ancient Athenians, he concluded in the end, to giue the greater number vnto the smaller, and the liuing to the dead. Sylla writeth himselfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the city of Athens on the verie selfe day of the calends of March, which commeth to agree with the first day of the moneth that we call Anthesterion, on the which day by chaunce many things are done at Athens in memorie of Noes floud, and of the vniuersall destruction of the whole world, that was in old time by rage of waters, falling out euen in that verie moneth. When the citie was thus taken, the tyrant Aristion fled into the castle, where he was besieged by Curio, whom Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last, constrained thereunto for lacke of water, he yeelded. The castell was no sooner giuen vp, but immediatly by gods prouidence, the weather miraculously altered. For the selfe same day, and the very selfe instant that Curio caried the tyraunt Aristion out of the castell, the element being verie faire and cleare, the cloudes suddenly gathered together, and there fell such a maruellous glut of raine, that all the castell was full of water. Shortly after also, Sylla hauing gotten the hauen of Piræa, burnt the greatest part of the buildings: amongst others was the arsenall and armorie, which Philo in old time had caused to be built, being of a strange and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of King Mithridates, comming from Thracia and Macedon, with a hundreth thousand footemen, ten thousand horsemen, and foure score and ten thousand carts of warre all armed with sythes: sent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at anker in the hauen of Mvnychia, and not willing to leaue the sea, nor come to fight with the Romaines, but seeking rather to draw these warres out in length, and to cut off all victuals from his enemies. Sylla vnderstanding this drift better then himselfe, departed out of the countrey of Attica (a verie barren soile, and indeed not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into Boeotia: wherein most men thought he committed great errour to leaue Attica, which is a very hard countrey for horsemen, and to go into Boeotia, a plaine champion: and so much the rather, because he knew well inough that the chiefest strength of the barbarous people consisted in their horsemen, and their armed cartes with sythes. But to auoide famine, and lacke of victuals as we haue sayd, he was compelled to seeke battell. Furthermore, he had another cause also that made him affrayd, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortensius a famous Captaine, and verie valiant also, who brought him aide out of Thessalie, and the barbarous people lay in waite for him in his way, in the straight of Thermopyles. And these were the causes that made Sylla take his way into Boeotia. But in the meane time, Caphis that was our country man, deceiuing the barbarous barbarous people, guided Hortenſius another way by mount Parnaſſus, and brought him vnder the citie of THITHORA, which was not then ſo great a citie as now at this preſent it is, but was a caſtle only, ſituated vpon the point of a rocke, hewne all about: whither the PHOCIANS in old time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retired themſelues for their ſafetie. Hortenſius lodged there, and there did alſo both defend and repulſe his enemies, ſo long as day-light laſted: and when the night came on, got downe through very hard ſtonie waies, vnto the citie of PATRONIDE, where he ioyned with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his power. Thus being ioyned together, they camped vpon a hill that ſtandeth about the middeſt of the plaine of Elatea: the ſoile was very good, and well repleniſhed with great ſtore of trees and water at the foote of the ſame. The hill is called Philobæotus, the nature and ſituation whereof, Sylla doth maruellouſly commend. When they were camped, they ſeemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies; and no more were they indeede, for they had not aboue fifteene hundred horſe, and leſſe then fifteene thouſand footmen. Whereupon the other Captaines their enemies, againſt Archelaus mind, brought out their bands into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horſemen, with carts, with ſhields and targets, ſo that the aire was euen cut aſunder as it were with the violence of the noiſe and cries of ſo many ſundry nations, which all together did put themſelues in battell ray. The ſumptuouſneſſe of their furniture moreouer, was not altogether ſuperfluous and vnprofitable, but ſerued greatly to feare the beholders. For the gliſtering of their harneſſe, ſo richly trimmed and ſet foorth with gold and ſiluer, the colours of their arming coates vpon their curaces, after the faſhion of the MEDES and SCYTHIANS, mingled with the bright gliſtering ſteele and ſhining copper, gaue ſuch a ſhew as they went and remoued too and fro, that made a light as cleare as if all had bene on a very fire, a fearefull thing to looke vpon. Inſomuch as the ROMAINES durſt not ſo much as once go out of the trenches of their campe, nor Sylla with all his perſwaſion could take away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore (and becauſe alſo he would not compell them to go foorth in this feare) he was driuen not to ſtir, but cloſe to abide, (though it grieued him greatly) to ſee the barbarous people ſo proudly and villainouſly laugh him and his men to ſcorne. Howbeit the diſdaine and ſcoffing of his enemies, ſtood him to great good purpoſe afterwards: for they making now no account of him, kept ſmall watch and ward, ſtrayed vp and downe diſorderly beſides, though otherwiſe they were not very obedient vnto their captaines, being many commanders, and few good followers: by reaſon wherof, a ſmall number kept in the campe, and all the reſt of the great multitude entiſed with the gaine they made by ſpoiling and ſacking of townes thereabouts, diſperſed themſelues many daies iourny from their campe. For it is ſaid, that at that very time they deſtroyed the city of PANOPÆIA, ſacked the citie of LEBADIA, and ſpoiled the temple without commandement or licence of any of all their captaines to do it. In the meane while, Sylla ſeeing ſo many cities and townes ſpoiled and deſtroyed, tooke it both grieuouſly, and alſo angrily: howbeit he ſuffered not his men to lye idle, but kept them in labour, to turne the courſe of the riuer of Cephiſus, & to caſt great trenches, not ſuffering any man to take eaſe or reſt, but contrarily with great ſeuerity puniſhed ſuch as went faintly and lazily to worke, to the end that being wearied with the paine they tooke after ſo many works, they would rather proue to hazard battell, as it fell out indeed. For the third day after they had begun thus to labour, as Sylla paſſed by them, they cryed out vnto him to leade them againſt their enemies. But his anſwer was vnto them againe: That thoſe were but cries of men wearied rather with labor then deſirous to fight. Notwithſtanding, if it be ſo indeed, and that you haue ſo good a will to fight as you make ſhew of: then I will, ſaid he, that you arme your ſelues preſently, and get you to yonder place, ſhewing them therewithall where the caſtle of the PARAPOTAMIANS ſtood in old time, which then (the citie being deſtroyed) was no more but the top of a ſtonie mountaine cut all about, and ſeuered from the mount of Edylium by the breadth of the riuer of Aſſus that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the ſame mountaine falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, and both theſe riuers running in one, carying a ſwift ſtreame, do make the knap of the ſaid hill very ſtrong of ſituation to lodge a camp vpon. And therefore Sylla ſeeing the ſouldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their copper targets to take vp that place to lodge in: to preuent them, and to get it before them (as indeed he did) he marched thither in all haſt poſſible, and got it euen with the earneſt goodwill of all his ſouldiers. Archelaus being ſo repulſed from thence, turned his way towards the city of CHORONEA. Whereupon certaine of the CHORONEANS that were in Syllaes campe, beſought him that he would not forſake their citie, and leaue it to their enemy. Sylla deſiring to gratifie them therein, ſent Gabinius one of his Colonels with a legion, and therewithall gaue the CHOERONEANS leaue to go thither, who did what they could poſſible to get into the citie before Gabinius: but that they could not, ſuch was the diligence and honeſty of the man, as he ſeemed more deſirous of their ſafetie, then they were themſelues. Neuertheleſſe, Iubas doth not call the Colonell that was ſent thither Gabinius, but Hircius. And thus was our citie of CHOERONEA preſerued from the daunger it ſtood in at that time. In the meane time came very good newes to the ROMAINES, both of oracles and propheſies, which promiſed them victory from the temple of LEBADIA, and the caue of Trophonius: of which propheeies, thoſe countrey men make great mention. But Sylla in his tenth booke of his commentaries writeth, that Quintus Titius, a man of quality and name amongſt them that traffiicked into the country of GREECE, came vnto him after he had won the battell of CHOERONEA, to tell him that Trophonius gaue him to vnderſtand, that ſhortly after he ſhould haue a ſecond battell, and that he ſhold yet againe haue another victory in the ſame place. After him another man of war called Saluenius, told him alſo what ſucceſſe he ſhould haue in the wars of ITALY, ſaying, that he knew it by reuelation: & both theſe men agreed in the manner of the reuelation. For they ſaid, that they had ſeene a god, in maieſty, beauty and greatnes, like vnto the image of Iupiter Olympias. Sylla hauing paſſed the riuer of Aſſus, went to lodge at the foot of mount Edylium, hard by Archelaus, who had placed & fortified his campe betweene the two mountains of Acontium & of Edylium, ioyning to the city of the ASSIANS. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his owne name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had changed his lodging, he left Muræna in his campe with a legion, and two cohorts, to keepe the enemies ſtill occupied that were in great trouble, & he himſelf in the mean time went & ſacrificed by the riuer of Cephiſus. His ſacrifice being ended, he marched towards the city of CHOERONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinius, & to know the mountain alſo called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knap of a mountaine very ſteepe and ſharpe of all ſides, with a narrow point like a pine apple, by reaſon wherof we do call it Orthopagum. At the foot of the ſame runneth the riuer called Morion, and there is alſo the temple of Apollo ſurnamed Thurias: & they ſay that this ſurname of Thurias was giuen vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Chæron, the founder and builder of the city of CHOERONEA. Other thinke that the cow which was giuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that place: which hath euer ſince kept the name, for that the PHOENICIANS calla cow, Thor. Now whē Sylla came nere vnto CHOERONEA, the Colonell Gabinius whom he had ſent thither with a garriſon to defend the ſame, went to meet him with his men very well armed, wearing a laurell garland: & Sylla after he had ſaluted him and his ſouldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their dutie in fighting. And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHOERONEA to him, one his name was Omoloichus, and the other Anaxidamus, who promiſed him to driue the enemies from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but giue them ſome ſmall nūber of ſouldiers. For there was a litle path way, which the barbarous people miſtruſted not, beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muſes, by the which they might eaſily go to the top of this mountaine Thurium: ſo that following that path, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, and they might eaſily kill them with ſtones, or at the leaſt they ſhould driue them maugre their heads downe into the valley. Gabinius aſſuring Sylla that they were both very valiant men, and ſuch as he might boldly truſt vnto: Sylla gaue them men, and commanded them to execute their enterpriſe: and he himſelfe in the meane ſeaſon went and ſet his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horſemen on the wings, placed himſelfe in the right wing, appointing the left vnto Muræna. Galba and Hortenſius his Lieutenants, were placed in the taile with certaine bands of the reregard, which they kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies ſhould not encloſe them behind: becauſe they perceiued a farre off that the enemies put foorth a great number of horſemen and footmen light armed in the wings, to the end that the points of their battell might the more eaſily bow and enlarge themſelues, to compaſſe in the ROMAINES on the backe ſide. Now in the meane time, theſe two CHOERONEANS whom Sylla had ſent vnder Hircius their Captaine, hauing compaſſed about the mountaine Thurium, before the enemies were aware of them, ſodainly came to ſhew themſelues vpon the top of the mountaine, which did ſo feare the barbarous people, that they beganne immediatly to flie, one of them for the moſt part killing another. There was no reſiſtance, but flying downe the

the mountaine, fell vpon the points of their owne partisans and pikes, and one of them thrusting in anothers necke, tumbled headlong downe the mountaine together, hauing their enemies besides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and strake them behind where they lay open vnto them: so as there were slaine a three thousand of them about this mountaine Thurium. And as for them that sought to saue themselues by flight, Muræna that was already set in battell ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and slue them downeright. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the battell of their footmen, put the most part of them quite out of order, and maruellously troubled their Captaines before they could set them againe in order: which was one of the chiefest causes of their ouerthrow. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vpon them in this trouble and disorder, and had quickly won the ground that was betweene both armies, wherby he tooke away the force of all their armed carts with sythes, which are then of greatest force, when they haue the longest course, to giue them a swift and violent stroke in their chase: whereas when their course is but short, the blow is so much the weaker and of lesse strength, euen as arrowes are, that a far off enter not deepe into the thing they be shot at: as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their first carts set foorth so faintly, and came on with so feeble a force, that the ROMAINES sent them backe, and easily repulsed them, with great slaughter and clapping of hands one to another, as they commonly vse in the ordinarie games of horse-running at ROME. When they had thus repulsed the carts, the battell of Syllaes footmen began to charge the barbarous people, who basing their pikes stood close one to another, becausse they would not be broken: and the ROMAINS on the other side bestowed first their darts among them, and then sodainly drew out their swords in the heat they were in, and put aside the enemies pikes, wherby they might come nearer to their bodies. There were fifteene thousand slaues in the front of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Mithridates Lieutenant had made free by open proclamation, and had deuided them by bands amongst the other footmen. By occasion whereof there was a ROMAINE Centurion spake pleasantly at that time, saying, that he neuer saw slaues before haue liberty to speake and do like free men, but only at Saturnes feasts. Neuertheless, they against the nature of slaues, were very valiant to abide the shocke, and the ROMAINE footmen could not so readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them giue backe, becausse they stood very close one to another, and their rancks were of such a length besides: vntill such time as the ROMAINES that were behind the first rankes, did so pelt them with their slings, hurling stones, bestowing their darts and arrowes vpon them, that in the end they compelled them all to turne their backes and flie amaine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his armie, supposing to enclose the ROMAINES behind, Hortensius straight waies caussed the bands he had with him to run and charge vpon the flankes: which Archelaus perceiuing, made the horsemen he had about him, turne their faces forthwith, which were in number aboue two thousand: insomuch as Hortensius being set vpon with all his troupe, was compelled to retire by litle and litle towards the mountaine, perceiuing himselfe farre from the battell of his footmen, and enuironed round about with his enemies. Sylla seeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and hauing not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensius. But Archelaus coniecturing by the dust which the horses raised, what the matter was: left Hortensius there, and with speed returned againe towards the right wing of his enemies, from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnfurnished of a sufficient Captaine to commaund them. Taxilles on the other side, caussed his copper targets also to march against Muræna: so as the noise they made on both sides, caussed the mountaines to ring againe, wherwithall Sylla stayed, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he resolued to returne to the place from whence he came, and sent Hortensius with foure ensignes to aide Murena: and himselfe with the fifth in great speed went towards the right wing of his armie, the which was now already bickering, and ioyned with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was come with his aide, they did easily distresse them: and after they had broken their array, they chased them flying for life to the riuer, and vnto the mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithstanding forgat not Murænа, but went againe to his reliefe: and finding that he on his side had also put the enemies to flight, followed with him the chase of thē that fled. There was a maruellous slaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, and many of them supposing to haue recouered their campe, were slaine by the way: so as of all that infinit multitude of fighting men, there escaped only ten thousand, who saued themſelues by flying vnto the citie of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his part writeth, that he could make reckening of no more but fourteene of his ſouldiers only that were ſlaine, whereof there came two againe to him the ſame night. Wherefore in the markes of triumph which he ſet vp for tokens of that victorie, he cauſed to be written on the toppe thereof, Mars, Victory, and Venus: ſignifying thereby, that he had ouercome in theſe warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall diſcipline. Theſe marks of triumph were ſet vp for the battell which he wan in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he ſet vp another alſo in the top of mount Thurium, where the barbarous people were ſet vpon behind: and there is written in Greeke letters: That the valiant deedes of Omoloichus and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victorie. Sylla for the ioy of this great wonne battell, cauſed muſitians to play in the citie of THEBES, where he builded a ſtage for al the muſitians neare vnto the fountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GRECIANS were appointed iudges of that muſicke, whom he cauſed to be ſent for out of other cities, becauſe he mortally hated the THEBANS: in ſomuch as he tooke from them halfe their lands, which he conſecrated vnto Apollo Pythias, and Iupiter Olympias, appointing that of the reuenue thereof, they ſhould redeliuer and pay backe the mony which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this hauing intelligence that Flaccus, one of his enemies, was choſen Conſull at ROME, and had paſſed the ſea Ionium with an armie, vnder pretext to make war againſt king Mithridates, but indeede to make war with himſelfe: tooke his iourney towards THESSALY to meet him. But when he was in the citie of MELITEA, there came newes to him out of all parts, that there was a new and ſecond army of the kings arriued, no leſſe then the firſt, the which ſpoiled and deſtroyed all the country which he had left behind him. For Dorylaus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenants, was arriued in the citie of CHALCIDE with a great fleet of ſhips, hauing brought thither with him foureſcore thouſand fighting men, the beſt trained, the beſt armed and appointed ſouldiers that were in all his kingdome of PONTVS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that country at commandement, and ſought to fight with Sylla, notwithſtanding that Archelaus alledged many reaſons to diſſwade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in euery place, that ſo many thouſands of ſouldiers could not haue bene caſt away in the firſt battell, without ſome notable treaſon. Wherupon Sylla returned with all poſſible ſpeed, and made Dorylaus know before many daies paſſed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wiſe man, and knew well enough the worthines and valiant courage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaus hauing had but a litle proofe only in certaine light skirmiſhes which he made againſt Sylla, about TILPHOSSION in THESSALY: himſelfe was the firſt that could ſay then, it was not for them to hazard battel, but rather to draw out the wars in length, and ſupplant the ROMAINES with charge and expence. And yet notwithſtanding, the commoditie of the great large plaine that lyeth all about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encouragement to Archelaus, who iudged it a very fit place to giue battell in, ſpecially becauſe he was the ſtronger of horſmen in the field. For of all the plaines that are within the country of BOEOTIA, the greateſt & largeſt of thē, is the plaine neare to the city of ORCHOMENE, which is altogether without trees, & runneth out in length vnto the mariſhes where the riuer of Melas diſperſeth it ſelfe abroad. The head of the ſame riuer is not far from the city of ORCHOMENE, and that riuer only of all other riuers in GRECE from the very head whence it cometh, is nauigable: and hath beſides another ſingular property, that it riſeth & ſwelleth euen in the longeſt ſommer daies, as the riuer of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the ſelf ſame plants and trees, ſauing that they beare no fruit, neither are they ſo great as thoſe of ÆGYPT. This riuer hath no long courſe, becauſe that the moſt part of the water runneth into lakes and mariſhes, couered with brambles and briers, and there is but a very litle part of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephiſus, in the place where the reeds grow that they make good flutes withall. When they were camped one neare to another, Archelaus lay quietly & ſtirred not: but Sylla preſently caſt great trenches frō one ſide to another, to ſtop the way againſt their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, & haue driuen the ROMAINS into the mariſhes. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, ſo ſoone as their captains had giuen them liberty, diſcharged with ſuch a fury that they did not onely ſcatter them that wrought in Syllaes trenches, but put the moſt part of their guard alſo that ſtood in battell ray to defend them, in a maruellous feare, who alſo began to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted ſtraight from his horſe, and taking an enſigne in his hand, ran ran through the middest of his men that fled, vntill he came to his enemies, and crying out, said vnto them: O my ROMAINE souldiers, mine honor commandeth me to dye here, and therefore when any man asketh you where you forsooke your Captaine, remember that you answer, It was at ORCHOMENE. They were so ashamed at these words, that he made them turne: besides that, there came two cohorts vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue such a hote charge vpon their enemies, that they fled foorthwith vpon it. That done, Sylla retired with his men, and made them dine: and thereupon by and by set them againe to the trenches to enclose his enemies campe, who then came out in better order then they did before. There was Diogenes, Archelaus wiues sonne slaine, fighting valiantly before them all in the right wing of their battell. And the bow-men being presled so neare by the ROMAINES, that their bowes would do no good: tooke their arrowes in their hands in stead of swords, and strake their enemies with them to force them to giue backe, vntill such time as at the last they were all driuen into their campe, where they passed that night in great sorrow, as well for the losse of them that were slaine, as also for the number of those that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againe towards the campe of his enemies, went on stil continuing his trenches: and certaine of them being come out to skirmish with them, he set vpon them so lustily, that at the first charge he put them to flight. That brought such a feare to all the whole campe of the enemies, that not a man durst abide any longer: so as Sylla valiantly following on his victorie, shuffled in among them as they fled, and in the end tooke all together. Straight way all the marishes were filled with bloud, and the lake full of dead bodies: so that vntill this present day they find there in that place many bowes of the barbarous people, morians, peeces of tasses, and swords drowned in the mud of the marishes, notwithstanding that it is wel-neare two hundred yeares ago since this battell was stricken. And thus much for the wars about the cities of CHOERONEA, and ORCHOMENE. Now the wars being past in this sort in GREECE, Cinna and Carbo dealt very cruelly and vnnaturally at ROME with the noble men and greatest persons: by reason whereof, many flying their tyranny, went to Syllaes campe, as vnto the hauen of their health and fulnesse of felicitie, so that in short time Sylla had an assembly of a ROMAINE Senate about him. Metella her selfe, his wife, hauing stolen away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his houses in the citie and country both, were all burnt and destroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go and helpe them that yet remained at ROME. Sylla vpon hearing of their newes fell in great perplexitie. For on the one side, it grieued him to see his country so miserably afflicted: and on the other side, he knew not well how he might go, leauing so great an enterprise as that warre was, and specially against a king of such might and power as Mithridates shewed himselfe to be. And being in these dumpes, there came one Archelaus a merchant to him, borne in the city of DELIVM, who brought him a secret message from the other Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenant: the which pleased Sylla so well, that he desired that Archelaus and himselfe might meet and talke together. So at the length they met by the sea side, neare vnto the city of DELIVM, where there is a temple of Apollo. Archelaus began to enter the talke with him, declaring vnto Sylla, that he would wish him to leaue the conquest of ASIA, and of the realm of PONT, and to returne into his country to the ciuill wars at ROME: and in so doing, the king would furnish him, not only with as much money, but with as many ships and men, as he himselfe would desire. Sylla vpon this motion told him againe, that he would wish him to forsake Mithridates seruice, and to make himselfe king, offering to proclaime him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES, so that he would deliuer him all his nauie which then he had in his hands. Archelaus seemed much to abhorre to heare him speake of treason. But Sylla going on with his tale, replyed againe vnto him: why Archelaus, said he, thou that art a CAPPADOCIAN, and seruant to a barbarous king, or his friend at the least: hast thou so good a heart with thee, that for all the benefites I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit an ill act? And art thou indeed so bold to speake to me of treason, which am the ROMAINES Lieutenant generall, and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the battell of CHOERONEA diddest saue thy selfe by flying, with a small number left thee of sixe score thousand fighting men, which thou before hadst in thy campe: and that hid thy selfe two daies together in the marishes of ORCHOMENE, leauing the fields of BOEOTIA with such heapes of dead bodies, that no man could passe for them? After this reply, Archelaus altered his speech, and falling downe at Syllaes feet, humbly besought him to end this war, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla answered, that he was very well contented

withall. And therupon peace was concluded betweene them vnder conditions: that Mithridates ſhould depart from Asia the leſſe, and from Paphlagonia, that he ſhould reſtore Bithynia vnto Nicomedes, and Cappadocia vnto Ariobarzanes, that he ſhold pay 2000 talents to the Romains, and giue them threeſcore and ten gallies, with all their furniture. And vpon this, Sylla would alſo aſſure him the reſt of his realme: and would cauſe him to be proclaimed a friend of the Romaines. Theſe articles being paſt by agreement betwixt them, Sylla taking his iourney through Theſſaly and Macedon into the country of Helleſpont, caried Archelaus with him, whom he honourably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerouſly ſicke of a diſeaſe in the city of Lariſſa, he ſtayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefeſt Captaines and companions. And this was the cauſe that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of Choeronea, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly won it, but by treaſon. And againe, Archelaus was the more ſuſpected, becauſe Sylla redeliuered Mithridates all his ſeruants and friends which he had priſoners, ſauing the tyrant Ariſtion that kept Athens, whom he poyſoned, becauſe he was Archelaus enemie: but ſpecially for the lands Sylla gaue vnto this Cappadocian. For he gaue him ten thouſand Iugera, (or acres of land) within the Ile of Euboea, and gaue him moreouer the title of a friend of the Romaines for euer. But Sylla denyeth all theſe things in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambaſſadors came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their maiſter did ratifie and accept all the articles of peace, ſauing that he only prayed him he would not take the country of Paphlagonia from him: and as for the gallies, he would not ſo much as once ſay he would promiſe them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly anſwered them again: Then Mithridates, as ye ſay, meaneth to keepe Paphlagonia ſtill, and refuſeth to giue the ſhips I demanded: where I looked that he would haue humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand onely, with the which he put ſo many Romaine citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me another tale, if I come once into Aſia: but now at Pergamus, he ſpeaketh his pleaſure of this warre which he hath not ſeene. The Ambaſſadours being afraid of his words, replyed not againe. Whereupon Archelaus ſpake, and beſought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreatie, in the end he obtained of Sylla to ſend him vnto Mithridates: promiſing that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles and conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himſelfe with his owne hands. Vpon this promiſe Sylla ſent him away, and in the meane while entred with his army into the country of Medica: and after he had deſtroyed the moſt part thereof, returned backe againe into Macedon, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, found him neare vnto the city of Philippes, bringing him newes that all ſhould be well, howbeit that his maiſter Mithridates prayed him he might ſpeake with him in any caſe. Now the matter that made Mithridates ſo earneſt to ſpeake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who hauing ſlaine Flaccus the Conſull, being of the contrarie faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenants alſo, went himſelfe againſt him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, choſe rather to make himſelfe Syllaes friend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the countrey of Troade, in the city of Dardane, Mithridates being accompanied with a fleet of two hundred ſaile of ſhips with oares at ſea, with twenty thouſand footmen, ſixe thouſand horſe, and a number of armed carts with ſithes beſides by land, Sylla hauing onely but foure enſignes of footmen, and two hundred horſemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla asked him firſt, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no anſwer. Sylla following on his tale, ſaid vnto him: It is for ſuters to ſpeake firſt, that haue requeſt to make: and for conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare what they will ſay. Then began Mithridates to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the occaſion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinance of the gods that ſo had appointed it, and partly alſo vpon the Romains themſelues. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent prince, and that he knew it now by experience, ſeeing that he lacked no comely words, to cloke his fowle and ſhamefull deedes: but withall he ſharpely reproued him, and draue him to confeſſe the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made anſwer that he did. Then Sylla ſaluted, embraced, and kiſſed him: and calling for the kings Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their friend againe.

In conclusion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla three score and ten gallies, and fiue hundred bow-men, he returned by sea into his realme of PONTVS. But Sylla hearing that his souldiers were angry with this peace made with Mithridates, because they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their most cruell and mortall enemie, (hauing in one selfe day caused a hundred and fiftie thousand ROMAINE citizens to be slaine, that were dispersed abroad in diuers places of ASIA) so to depart, and go his way safe, with the riches and spoiles of the country, which he had bereft them of, and vsed at his pleasure, the space of fortie yeares together: answered them in excuse of himselfe, that he was not able to make wars with Mithridates, and Fimbria both, if once they were ioyned together against him. And so Sylla departing thence went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the citie of THYATIRA, and lodged himselfe as neare vnto him as he conueniently might. Now whilest he was compassing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbriaes souldiers came out of their campe in their coates without any armour or weapon, to salute Syllaes souldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make vp their trench: which Fimbria seeing, and perceiuing his souldiers minds so chaunged, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whose hands he looked for no mercie, killed himselfe in his owne campe. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole countrey of ASIA the lesse, to pay the summe of twenty thousand talents amongst them, and presently also he vndid many poore houseolders through his insolent souldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garison there. For he ordained that euery houseolder should giue the souldier that lodged in his house, foure Tetradrachmas a day, and should be bound to giue him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him) their supper also: and that euery Captaine should haue fiftie Drachmas a day, a night gowne for the house, and a garment to go abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had giuen this order, he departed from the citie of EPHESVS with all his fleete, and in three dayes sailing arriued in the hauen of Pirꝛa at ATHENS, where he was receiued into the fraternitie of the mysteries, and reserued for himselfe the Librarie of Apellicon Teian: in the which were the most part of Aristotle and Theophrastus workes, not then thought meet to come in euery mans hands. And they say, that this Librarie being brought to ROME, Tyrannion the Grammarian found the meanes to extract a great part of them: and that Andronicus the RHODIAN hauing recouered the originals into his hands, published them, and wrote the summaries which we haue at this present. For the auncient Peripatetick Philosophers were of themselues very wise and learned men, but they had not all Aristotles works, nor Theophrastus amongst them, and yet those few they had, were not by them seene all whole and perfect together: because that the goods of Neleus SCEPSIAN (to whom Theophrastus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and estimation of them. And furthermore Sylla being at ATHENS had such a paine and numnesse in his legs, and was so heauie withall, that Strabo calleth it a spice of the goute, that is to say, a feeling or entring therinto, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occasion he tooke the seas, and went vnto a place called ADIPSVM, where there are naturall hot bathes: and there remained awhile solacing himselfe all the day long with musick, seeing of playes, & entertaining such kind of people. Vpō a day as he was walking by the sea side, certain fisher men made him a present of fish which pleased him maruellous well, and demaunding of them whence they were: they answered him againe, that they were of the citie of ALES. What? of ALES said he: is there any of them yet left aliue? speaking it, because that after the battell of ORCHOMENE when he followed the chase of his enemies, he had taken and destroyed three cities of BOEOTIA all at one selfe time, to wit, ANTHEDON, LARYMNA, and ALES. The poore fisher-men were so amazed with these words, that they stood still, and could not tell what to say. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bade them go their waies a Gods name, and be not afraid, for they brought no small intercessours with them, which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla had giuen them these words, the ALEIANS went home with a merry hart, to gather themselues together againe in their city. Sylla so passing through THESSALIE and MACEDON, came to the sea side, intending to go frō the city of DYRRACHIVM vnto BRVNDVSIVM, with 120 saile. The city of APOLLONIA is hard by DYRRACHIVM, and thereabouts is a parke consecrated vnto the nymphs, where in a faire goodly greene medow in many places there commeth out great bubbles of fire that flame continually: and it is said that there was a Satyre taken sleeping, euen in the very selfe same forme the painters and image-grauers haue set him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all sorts of interpreters what he was, he made no answer that a man could vnderstand: but onely put foorth a sharpe voice like the neying of a horse, or whinnying of a goate. Sylla wondring at it, abhorred him, and made him to be caried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbarked his men to passe the sea, he was afraid that so soone as they were landed in Italy, they would shrinke from him, and euery man go home to his own city. But they sware and promised first of themselues, that they would tarie and keepe together, and by their wils would do no hurt in Italy. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stood in need of money, they offered him of theirs, and euery man to lend him as his ability serued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their goodwill: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valiant souldiers, he went against fifteene generals of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fiftie ensignes of footemen well armed, as he himselfe writeth in his commentaries. But the gods promised him good fortune in his warres, by many sundrie apparant signes. For in a sacrifice he made by Tarentvm, after he was come on land, the liuer of a certaine beast sacrificed, was altogther fashioned after the manner of a crowne or garland of laurell, out of the which did hang two bands or rolles. And a litle before he went into Campania, neare vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuertheless was no matter of truth, but a vision only that appeared, and rising from the earth dispersed it selfe by litle and litle here and there in the aire, and in the end vanished quite away, as clouds which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consull, who brought two great armies against him, were ouerthrowne by him, before he had set his men in battell, or had appointed any man in his place where he should fight: and this proceeded only vpon the courage and life of his souldiers, whose good will to serue against them was such, as following this victory, he compelled the Consull Norbanus after he had slaine sixe thousand of his men, to take the citie of Capva for his refuge. This noble exploit, (as himselfe reported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he saith furthermore, that in the city of Sylvivm, there was a slaue of one Pontius a citizen who being inspired with a propheticall spirit, came to tell him from the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, and cary away the victorie of these wars: howbeit that if he did not hie him the sooner, the Capitoll at Rome should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his words, being the sixteenth day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now Iuly. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllaes captaines) being neare vnto the city of Fidentia with sixteene ensignes onely, against fiftie ensignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serue, because the most part of them were naked and vnarmed, was afraid to hazard the battell: and as he was euen bethinking himselfe what was best to determine thereof, there rose a litle wind out of a goodly meadow that blew a wonderfull sort of flowers vpon the souldiers on euery part of them. These flowers stayed of themselues as they fell, some vpon their targets, and others vpon their morians, without falling to the ground: so that it seemed to their enemies a farre off, as if they had bene garlands of flowers vpon their heads. This made Lucullus souldiers more lusty a great deale then they were before, and with this goodwill they determined to giue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew, slue eighteene thousand of them in the field, & tooke their camp. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates & Tigranes. Neuertheless, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant armies, thought good to vse pollicie with force: and therfore practised with Scipio one of the Consuls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: and thereupon were oft meetings and assemblies of both sides. Now Sylla draue off the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still seeking occasion of delay, to the end that his souldiers which were throughly acquainted with craft & subtilty as well as himselfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipioes souldiers by repaire into his campe: for they coming into Scipioes campe, being very conuersant with them, straight corrupted some of thē with ready money, other with promises, and other with faire flattering words, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practise had continued awhile, Sylla coming neare vnto Scipioes campe with 20. ensignes only: all his men saluted Scipioes souldiers, & they resaluting thē againe, yeelded themselues vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was left post alone in his tent, where he was takē, but they afterwards let him go. So Sylla with his 20 ensignes, like to the fowlers, that by their stales draw other birds into into their nets, hauing gotten forty enſignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo ſaid of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe, and a lion both: but that the foxe did him more hurt and miſchiefe then the lion. After this, Marius the younger hauing foureſcore and fiue enſignes in his campe neare vnto the citie of SIGNIVM, preſented battell vnto Sylla: who hauing very good deſire to fight, and ſpecially on that day, becauſe the night before he had ſeene this viſion in his dreame, that he thought he ſaw Marius the father (who was deceaſed long before) warning his ſonne that he ſhould come to him. Sylla for this reſpect deſired maruellouſly to fight that day: and thereupon cauſed Dolabella to come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies ſtept betweene him and home, and ſtopped his paſſage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllaes ſouldiers to the contrarie, fought to keepe the way open for him, with ſo great labour and paine, that they were all wearie and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruellous great ſhower of raine vpon them as they were buſie opening the way, that troubled them more then the labor they had in hand. Wherupon the priuat captaines of the bands went to make Sylla vnderſtand it, and to pray him to defer the battell vntill another day: ſhewing him how the ſouldiers wearied with labour, lay down vpon their targets on the ground to take their eaſe. Sylla perceiuing this, was contented withall, though greatly indeed againſt his will. But when he had giuen the ſignall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their campe, Marius the younger commeth on horſebacke marching brauely before all his company, hoping to haue ſurpriſed his enemies in diſorder, and by that meanes to haue ouerthrowne them eaſily. But far otherwiſe did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his foreſaid dreame: for his men falling in a rage withall, left their worke in the trench where they wrought, ſtucke their darts vpon the banke, ran vpon their enemies with their ſwords drawne, and with a maruellous crie ſet vpon them ſo valiantly, that they were not able to reſiſt their furie, but ſodainly turned their backes and fled, where there was a great and notable ſlaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the citie of PRÆNESTE, where he found the gates ſhut: but they threw him downe a rope from the wall, which he tyed about his middle, and ſo was triced vp by it. Yet ſome writers ſay, and Feneſtella among other, that Marius neuer ſaw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and very ſleepie, he lay vnder ſome tree in the ſhadow to reſt a litle, after he had giuen the ſignall and word of the battell, and ſlept ſo ſoundly, that he could ſcant awake with the noiſe and flying of his men. Sylla himſelfe writeth, that he loſt at this battell but three and twentie men, ſlue twentie thouſand of his enemies, and tooke eight thouſand priſoners. His Lieutenants alſo had the like good ſucceſſe in other places, Pompeius, Craſſus, Metellus, and Seruilius: which without any loſſe of their men, or but with a very ſmall, ouerthrew many great mightie armies of their enemies. Inſomuch as Carbo, the head and chiefe of all the contrarie faction, and he that moſt maintained it, fled one night out of his campe, and went beyond the ſeas into AFRICKE. The laſt battell that Sylla had, was againſt Theleſinus SAMNYTE, who comming like a freſh champion to ſet vpon him, when he was alreadie wearied, and had fought many battels, had almoſt ſlaine him euen at ROME gates. For Theleſinus hauing gathered together a great number of ſouldiers with one Lamponius LVCANIAN, marched with all ſpeed towards the city of PRÆNESTE, to deliuer Marius the younger that was beſieged there. But vnderſtanding that Sylla on the one ſide, came in great haſt alſo to meete him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other ſide, and perceiuing moreouer that the way was ſo ſhut vp, that he could neither go forward nor backeward, being a valiant ſouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fields, moſt daungerouſly ventured to go ſtraight to ROME. And ſo ſtale away by night with all his whole power, and marching to ROME ward, had almoſt taken it at his firſt comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept: but he ſtayed happily tenne furlongs from the gate Collina, bragging with himſelfe, and beleeuing that he ſhould do wonders, for that he had mocked ſo many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came diuers young Noblemen and Gentlemen out of the citie to skirmiſh with Theleſinus: who ſlue a great number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young Gentleman of a noble houſe, and very honeſt. Whereupon (as you may eaſily imagine) the citie trembled for feare, and ſpecially the women, who fell a ſhrecking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whome Sylla had ſent) came firſt with ſeuen hundred horſe vpon the ſpurre, and ſtaying but a litle to coole and giue them breath, bridled ſtraight againe, and went to ſet vpon

the enemies thereby to ſtay them. Soone after him came Sylla alſo, who commaunded his men that came firſt, quickly to eate ſomewhat, and that done, put them ſtraight in battell ray: notwithſtanding that Dolabella and Torquatus perſwaded him to the contrarie, and beſought him not to put his ſouldiers wearied with their iourney, to ſo great and manifeſt a danger, and the rather, becauſe they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNITES and LVCANS, who were both warlike nations and good ſouldiers, and thoſe beſides that moſt deadly hated the ROMAINES. But for all that, Sylla ſent them backe, and commanded his trumpets to ſound the alarme, being almoſt within foure houres of night: and this battell was ſharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Craſſus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very ſore diſtreſſed, and ſtood in great perill. Sylla hearing therof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white courſer that was both ſwift and very ſtrong. Syllaes danger The enemies knew him, and there were two that lifted vp their armes to throw their darts at him whom he ſaw not: but his page gaue his horſe ſuch a laſh with his whippe, that he made him ſo to gird forward, as the very points of the darts came hard by the horſe tayle, and ſtucke faſt in the ground. Some ſay that Sylla had a litle golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the citie of DELPHES, and in time of warres ware it alwaies in his boſome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kiſſing it, ſaid: O Apollo Pythias, haſt thou ſo highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, ſo fortunate hitherto through ſo many famous victories, and wilt thou now with ſhame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his owne naturall citie among his country men? And ſo crying out to Apollo for helpe, thruſt into the preſſe among his men, intreating ſome, threatning others, and laying vpon the reſt to ſtay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his army was Sylla fled. broken and ouerthrown by his enemies: and himſelfe amongſt them that fled, was compelled to recouer his campe with ſpeed, hauing loſt many of his friends and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens ſlaine and troden vnder feet (both with horſe and men) that came onely to ſee the battell fought: ſo that they within the citie thought themſelues verily vndone. Lucretius Offella furthermore (he that beſieged Marius in the city of PRÆNESTE) had almoſt raiſed his ſiege, vpon the words of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wiſhed him to remoue with all ſpeed poſſible, for Sylla was ſlaine, and Theleſinus had taken ROME. Now about midnight came certaine ſouldiers from Craſſus to Syllaes campe, and asked for meate for Craſſus ſupper, and his mens, who hauing chaſed his flying enemies whom he had ouerthrowne, vnto the city of ANTEMNA (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla vnderſtanding that, and being aduertiſed that the moſt part of his enemies were ouerthrowne at this battell, went himſelfe the next morning betimes vnto ANTEMNA, where 3 thouſand of his enemies ſent to know if he would receiue them to mercy, if they yeelded themſelues vnto him. His anſwer was, that he would pardon their liues, ſo as they would do ſome miſchiefe to their fellowes before they came to him. Theſe three thouſand hereupon truſting to his promiſe, fell vpon their companions: and for the moſt part one of them killed another. Notwithſtanding Sylla hauing gathered all thoſe together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thouſand, as the reſt, amounting in all to the number of ſixe thouſand, within the ſhew-place where they vſed to run their horſes: whileſt he himſelfe held a councell in the temple of the goddeſſe Bellona, and was making his oration there, he had appointed certaine to ſet vpon thoſe 6000, and put them to the ſword euery man. Great and terrible were the cries of ſuch a number of men ſlaine in ſo ſmal a roome, as may eaſily be coniectured: inſomuch as the Senators ſitting in councell heard them very eaſily, and maruelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oratiõ which he had begun with a ſet ſteadie countenance, without changing of colour, willed them only to hearken what he ſaid, and not to trouble themſelues with any thing done abroad: for they were but certaine offenders and lewd perſons that were puniſhed by his commandement. This was enough to ſhew the ſimpleſt ROMAINE in ROME, that they had but only chaunged the tyrant, and not the tyranny. Now for Marius, that had bene euer of a churliſh and ſeuere nature, euen from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall ſtubburnes. Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modeſt and ciuill in all his proſperity, & gaue great good hope that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauour nobility well, and yet loue notwithſtanding the benefit of the people. And being moreouer a man in his youth giuen all to pleaſure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, and weep for tender hart: in that he became after ſo cruell and bloudie, the great alteration gaue manifeſt cauſe to condemne the increaſe of honour and authority, as the only meanes wherby mens maners continue not such as they were at the first, but still do chaunge and vary, making some fooles, others vaine and phantasticall, and others extreame cruell and vnnaturall. But whether that alteration of nature came by chaunging his state and condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to shew it selfe, when the way of liberty was laid open: this matter is to be decided in some other Treatise. So it came to passe, that Sylla fell to shedding of bloud, and filled all Rome with infinite and vnspeakeable murthers: for diuers were killed for priuate quarrels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who suffered his friends and those about him to worke their wicked wils: vntill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was so bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should know that all the mischiefes were finished, the which they daily saw. For, said he, we will not intreat you to pardon life, where you haue threatned death: but onely to put them out of doubt whom you haue determined to saue. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resolued whom he would saue. Metellus replyed, Then tell vs, quoth he, who they are that shall die. Sylla aunswered he would. Howbeit some say it was not Metellus, but Ausidius one of his flatterers, that spake this last word vnto him. Wherefore Sylla immediatly without making any of the magistrates priuie, caused fourescore mens names to be set vp vpon posts, whom he would put to death. Euery man being offended withall, the next day following he set vp 220 mens names more: and likewise the third day as many more. Hereupon, making an oration to the people, he told them openly that he had appointed all them to die, that he could cal to remembrance: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should dye by daies, as he did call them to mind. Whosoeuer saued an outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindnesse, he himselfe was condemned to dye: not excepting them that had receiued their brothers, their sonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the reward of euery homicide and murtherer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talents: though it were a slaue that had killed his maister, or the sonne that had slaine the father. But the most wicked and vniust act of all was, that he depriued the sonnes, and sonnes sonnes of them whom he had killed, of all credite and good name, and besides that, had taken all their goods as confiscate. And this was not onely done in Rome, but also in all the cities of Italie throughout: and there was no temple of any god whatsoeuer, no altar in any bodies house, no libertie of hospitall, nor fathers house, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the husbands were slaine in their wiues armes, and the children on their mothers laps: and yet they which were slaine for priuate hatred and malice, were nothing in respect of those that were murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed them might well say, his goodly great house made that man dye, his goodly faire garden the other: and his hote bathes another. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thing, and least looked that these euils should light vpon him, and that onely pitied those which he saw so miserably murthered: went one day into the market place, and reading the bill set vp of the outlawes names, found his owne name amongst the rest, and cryed out aloude: Alas the day that euer I was borne, my house of Alba maketh me be to put to death. He went not farre from the market place, but met with one that killed him presently. In the meane time, Marius the yonger seeing he could by no means escape if he were taken, slue himselfe. And Sylla comming to Præneste, did first execute them by one & by one, keeping a certaine form of iustice in putting them to death: but afterwards as if he had no longer leysure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a place together, to the number of twelue thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword euery man, sauing his host only, vnto whom he said, that he shewed him specially fauor to saue his life. But his host answered him stoutly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for his life, seeing he had slaine all the rest of his countrimen: and so thrusting in amongst the citizens, was willingly slaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very straunge, who had slaine his owne brother before the ciuill war was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his desire. Catiline thereupon to shew his thankfulnesse for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently and slue Marcus Marius, who was of the contrarie faction: and brought him his head for a present before all the people, in the midst of the market place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went and washed his hands all bloudied in the hallowed font of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murthers committed, yet were there other things also that

grieued the people maruellously. For he proclaimed himselfe Dictator, which office had not bin of sixescore yeares before in vse, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, giuing him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goods: to destroy cities, and to build vp new as he listed: to take away kingdomes, and to giue them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly sold the goods confiscate, by the crier, sitting so proudly and stately in his chaire of state, that it grieued the people more to see those goods packt vp by them to whom he gaue and disposed them, then to see them taken from those that had forfeited them. For sometimes he would giue a whole country, or the whole reuenues of certaine cities, vnto women for their beauty, or vnto pleasant iesters, minstrels, or wicked slaues made free: and vnto some, he would giue other mens wiues by force, and make them to be maried against their wils. For he desiring (howsoeuer it hapned) to make alliance with Pompey the Great, commanded him to put away his wife he had maried: and taking Æmylia (the daughter of Æmylius Scaurus, and of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to mary her great with child as she was by Glabrio: but she died in childbed in Pompeyes house. Lucretius Offella also that had brought Marius the younger to that distresse at the city of PRÆNESTE, suing to be Consull, Sylla commaunded him to cease his sute: but he notwithstanding that expresse commandement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauoured his cause: whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slue Offella before all the people, himselfe sitting in a chaire of estate in the temple of Castor and Pollux, and seeing from aboue the murther done. The people that were about Offella, laid hold of the murtherer straight, and brought him before Sylla: but Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him go, becausse he commanded them to do it. Furthermore as touching his triumph, it was a sumptuous sight to behold, for the rarenes of the riches, & princely spoiles which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the sight, to see the banished ROMAINS, who were the chiefest noble men of all the city of ROME, following his chariot triumphant wearing garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their father, and sauiour: becausse that by his meanes they returned to their countrey, and recouered their goods, wiues & children. In the end of his triumph, he made an oration in open assembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not only declare vnto thē (according to the custome) what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successe, as of his valiant deeds besides: and to conclude his oration, told them that by reason of the great fauour fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to say, happy, or fortunate. And he himselfe when he wrote vnto the GRECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them, surnamed himselfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloued and fauoured of Venus. His tokens of triumph which are yet in our country, haue this superscription: Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a son and a daughter: he named his son Faustus, signifying fortunate, and his daughter Fausta: becausse the ROMAINS call Faustum that, which falleth out prosperously & happily. To be short, he trusted so much vnto his good fortune and doings, that notwithstanding he had killed and put so many men to death, and had made so great a change and innouation in the cōmonwealth, yet of himselfe he left off his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Consuls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a priuate man among the citizens, offering himselfe to euery man that would aske him account of his doings past. It happened that a stout and rash enemy of his was chosen Consull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any deuotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie Pompey, who gaue countenance & fauor vnto him. Sylla seeing Pompey come merry homewards from the election, & ioyfull that he had obtained his friends sute frō all other suters: tooke him aside, and told him: Indeed thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my friend, for thou hast done a goodly act, to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest asse in all ROME, before Catulus the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou hadst not need to sleepe: for thou hast strengthened an enemie, that will be thine owne destruction. And Sylla proued a true prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all crueltie immediatly after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla consecrating the dismes of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding sumptuous feastes vnto the ROMAINES, the prouision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that euery day they threw a great deale of meate into the riuer, and they drank wine of fortie yeares old and aboue.

During

During these feasts which continued many dayes, his wife Metella sicked, and died, and in her sickenesse the Priests and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neare her, nor suffer his house to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was diuorced from her in her sickenesse, and caused her to be caried into another house, whilest she liued. And thus did Sylla curiously obserue the superstition and ordinance of the Soothsayers: but yet he brake the law which he made himselfe, touching the order of funerals, sparing no cost at Metellaes buriall. So did he also breake another order himselfe had made, touching the reformation of bankets: comforting his sorow with ordinary feasts, full of all vanitie and lasciuiousnesse. Within a few moneths after, he had fencers games at the sharpe: and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnseuered, men and women sitting together, it fortuned that there was a faire Ladie, and of a noble house, that sate hard by Sylla, called Valeria: she was the daughter of Messala, and sister of Hortensius the Orator, that had bene diuorced not long before from her husband. This Ladie passing by Sylla behind him, did softly put her hand on his shoulder, and tooke a haire from off his gowne, and so went on to her place, and sate her downe. Sylla maruelling at this familiaritie, looked earnestly vpon her: It is nothing my Lord (quoth she) but that I desire with others to be partaker a litle of your happinesse. Her words misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them: for he sent straight to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had liued. But after many slie lookes betweene them, they turned their faces one to another vpon euerie occasion, with prety smiling countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise and contract mariage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as wise, as honest, and as vertuous a Ladie as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla marie her, was neither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a young boy: which commonly shew forth the filthiest passions of the mind, to be so caried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this faire young Ladie in his house, he left not the companie of women minstrels and tumblers, and to haue pleasant iesters and musitions about him, with whom he would lye wallowling and drinking all the day long, vpon litle couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were in greatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roscius a maker of common playes, Sorax a prince of scoffers, and one Metrobius a singing man, whom he was in loue withall while he liued, and yet did not dissemble his loue, though he was past age to be beloued. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the originall cause whereof had light foundation at the first. For he liued a great time before he perceiued that he had an impostume in his bodie, the which by processe of time came to corrupt his flesh in such sort, that it turned all to lice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him continually night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that multiplied still vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate it selfe, but was presently filled with swarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to wash and cleanse himselfe of them, but all would not serue: for the changing of his flesh into this putriture wan it straight againe, that there was no cleansing, nor shifting of him, that could keepe such a number of lice from him. Some say, that in old time (amongst the most auncientest men, whereof there is any memorie) Acastus the sonne of Pelias, died of the lowsie euill: and long time after also, the Poet Alcman, and Pherecides the diuine: and so did Callisthenes Olynthian in prison, and Mutius a wise lawyer. And if we shall make mention of those that are famous, although it be not in any good matter: we find that a bond man called Eunus, he that was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in Sicilia, being taken and caried to Rome, died also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla did not only foresee his death, but he wrote something of it also: for he made an end of writing the two and twentieth booke of his commentaries, two dayes before he died. In that booke he saith, that the wise men of Chaldea had told him long before, that after he had liued honourably, he should end his dayes in the flower of all his prosperitie. And there he saith also, that his sonne (who departed a litle before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his sleepe, apparelled in an ill fauoured gowne, and that comming vnto him, he prayed him he would go with him vnto Metella his mother, thencefoorth to liue in peace and rest with her. But for all his disease, he would not giue ouer to deale in matters of state. For ten dayes before his death, he pacified a ſedition and tumult riſen among the inhabitants of the city of PVTEOLANVM (in Italian called POZZOLO) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinances, whereby they ſhould gouerne themſelues. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the common wealth, deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he ſent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there cauſed his men to compaſſe him about, and commaunded them to ſtrangle him in his ſight. The paſſion of his anger was ſo vehement againſt him, that by the extreame ſtraining of himſelfe, he brake the impoſtume in his bodie, ſo as there guſhed out a wonderfull deale of bloud: by reaſon whereof his ſtrength failing him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and ſo died, leauing the two litle children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Poſthumia, becauſe the ROMAINES call thoſe children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Poſthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Conſull Lepidus to let that his bodie ſhould not be honourably buried, as they were accuſtomed to bury noblemen and men of qualitie. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, becauſe he had giuen him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other friends: yet he made ſome for loue, ſome by intreatie, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corpes into ROME, gaue both ſafety and honour vnto the performance of his funerals. And it is ſayd alſo, that the ROMAINE Ladies, amongſt other things, beſtowed ſuch a quantitie of perfumes and odoriferous matter towards the ſame: that beſides thoſe which were brought in two hundred and ten great baskets, they made a great image to the likeneſſe of Sylla himſelfe, and another of a ſergeant carying the axes before him, all of excellent incenſe and ſynamon. When the day of the funerals came, fearing leaſt it would raine in the forenoone, all the element being ſo cloudie, they deferred to cary foorth the body to be burnt, vntill paſt three of the clocke in the after noone. And then roſe there ſuch a ſudden boiſterous wind, that it ſet all the ſtacke of wood ſtraight on fire, that the bodie was burnt at a trice, and the fire going out, fell a great ſhower of raine that held on till night: ſo that it ſeemed good fortune following him euen to his end, did alſo helpe his obſequies after his death. His tombe is to be ſeene in the field of Mars: and they ſay that he himſelfe made his owne Epitaph that is written vpon it, which was: that no man did euer paſſe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing miſchiefe to his enemies.

THE COMPARISON OF Sylla with Lyſander.

NOW that we haue at large alſo ſet forth the life of the Romaine, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both alike, and both of them grew to be great men, riſing of themſelues through their owne vertue: but this onely is proper to Lyſander, that all the offices and dignities which he attained vnto in the common wealth, were layd vpon him through the peoples goodwils and conſents: for he compelled them to nothing, neither vſurped he any extraordinarie authoritie vpon them, contrary to law: for, as the common ſaying is:

Where partialitie, and diſcord once do raigne:
There wicked men are moſt eſteem'd, and rule with greateſt gaine.

As at that time in Rome, the people being corrupted, and the ſtate of gouernement vtterly ſubuerted and brought to naught: to day there roſe vp one tyrant, to morow another. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vſurped and ruled all, when ſuch fellowes as Glaucia and Saturninus, did both baniſh and driue out of Rome ſuch men as Metellus was: and where alſo in open aſſembly they ſlue the Conſuls ſons in the market place, and where force of armes was bought and ſold for gold and ſiluer, with the which the ſouldiers were corrupted: and where they made new lawes with fire and ſword, and forced men to obey the ſame. Yet I ſpeake not this in reproach of him that in ſuch troubleſome times found meanes to make himſelfe the greateſt man: but to ſhew that I meaſure not his honeſtie by the dignitie he grew vnto in ſo vnfortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from Sparta (at what time it flouriſhed moſt, and was the beſt gouerned common weale) he in all great cauſes, and in moſt honourable offices, was reputed for the beſt of all beſts, and the chiefe of all chiefes: whereof it came to paſſe, that the one did often reſigne vp his authoritie to his citizens, which they had giuen him, who alſo reſtored it to him againe many and ſundry times, for the honour of his vertue did alwayes remaine, and made him iuſtly accounted for the worthieſt man: where the other being once onely choſen Generall of an armie, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hoſtilitie, making himſelfe by force, ſometime Conſull, ſometime vice Conſull, and ſometime Dictator, but alwayes continued a tyrant. Indeed Lyſander attempted to change and alter the ſtate of gouernement in his countrey, howbeit it was with greater lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he ſought it by reaſon, and good perſwaſion, not by the ſword: neither would he make a change of the whole at one ſelfe time as Sylla did, but ſought only to reforme the election of kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtleſſe ſeemed very iuſt: that he which was the beſt amongſt good men, ſhould be choſen king of that citie, which was the chiefe ouer all Greece, not for her nobilitie, but for her vertue onely.

The chiefe perſon is not alwaies the honeſtſt.

For like as a good hunter doth not seeke for the whelpe of a good dog, but for the good dog himselfe: nor a wise man of armes also, the colt that commeth of a good horse, but the good horse himselfe. Euen so, he that taketh vpon him to stablish a ciuill gouernement, committeth a foule fault, if he looke of whom his Prince should be borne, and not what the Prince himselfe should be, considering that the LACEDÆMONIANS themselues haue depriued diuerse of their kings from their crowne and realme, because they were not princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is it alwayes ill of it selfe: but vertue is honored for her selfe alone, and not because she is placed with nobilitie. Now for the wrongs and iniuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleasure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Lysander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars: and the most part of them whom he put to death, was to establish the tyrannicall power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla sought for spite to take away his army from Pompey, and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which himselfe had giuen him, and caused Lucretius Offella to be slaine openly in his owne sight, because he sought to be Consull, for recompence of the good seruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, causing his owne friends to be slaine in such sort, he made euery man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behauiours touching couetousnesse and pleasure doth shew, that the intent of the one was the desire of a good Prince, and the other that of a tyrant. For we do not find that Lysander, for all his great princely authority, did euer vse any insolency or lasciuiousnesse in his deeds, but alwayes auoided as much as a man might, the reproach of this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroad: he led such a true LACONIAN life, straightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull lusts, neither for pouerty when he was yong, nor yet for age, when it came vpon him. But whilest he gaue lawes to the ROMAINES touching matrimoniall honestie and chastity, himselfe in the meane time did nothing but follow loue, and commit adulteries, as Saluſt writeth. By meanes whereof he so much impouerished ROME, and left it so voide of gold and siluer, that for readie mony he sold absolute freedome vnto the cities their confederates, yet was it his daily study to confiscate & take for forfeit, the richest and most wealthiest houses in all the whole city of ROME. But all this spoile and hauocke was nothing in comparison of that which he daily cast away vpon his iesters and flatterers. What sparing, or measure may we thinke he kept in his gifts and priuate bankets, when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME being present, to see him sell the goods which he had caused to be confiscate) he made one of his friends and familiars, to truſſe vp a great deale of houshold stuffe, for a very litle price? and when any other had out-bidden his price, and that the crier had cried it out aloud: then was he angry, and sayd: My friends, I haue great wrong done me here, not to suffer me sell the spoile I haue gotten at mine owne pleasure, and dispose it as I list my selfe. Where Lysander contrarily sent to the commonwealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very presents that were giuen to himselfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For, peraduenture he did more hurt to SPARTA, bringing thither that gold and siluer, then Sylla did to ROME, in wasting and consuming that he consumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely, for proofe and declaration, that Lysander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their city, which neuer any other but themselues did. For Sylla being a riotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithstanding to good order and gouernment: and Lysander contrarily filled his city with vice, yet not infected withall himselfe. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the law he commanded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worse then he was himselfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to desire those things, which he aboue all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and ciuil gouernement. Now for matters of warre and battels fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lysander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lysander wan onely but two battels by sea, besides the taking of the city of ATHENS: which (though I graunt him) being rightly considered, was no great exploit of war, howbeit it was a noble act, considering the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in BOEOTIA, hard by the city of ALIARTE: a man might say peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinkes also there was a fault in him, for that he staied not for king Pauſanias aide (the which came from PLATÆES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and because he went in a gaire, in fury, and in a vaine ambition to run his head against a wall: so that men of all sorts making a desperate sally out of ALIARTE vpon him, slue him there to no purpose. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of of LEVCTRES, resisting his enemies that distressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keepe his men from flying, and to giue them assured victorie, receiued his deedly wound: for all these men died like noble kings, and valiant captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast himselfe away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the ancient SPARTANS did like wise men, to auoide the fight with wals. For the noblest and valianteſt man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slaine, not onely by the first souldier that commeth, but by euery seely woman or child. As they say that the worthie Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrary againe, the victories that Sylla wan in set battels, and the thousands of enemies which he slue, are not easily to be numbred, besides also that he tooke the city of ROME twise: and the hauen of ATHENS, not by famine as Lysander did, but by force, after he had by many great battels driuen Archelaus out of firme land into the maine sea. It is to be considered also, against what captaines they made warres. For me thinkes it was but a pastime, as a man might say, for Lysander to fight with Antiochus, a pylot of Alcibiades, or to surprise and deceiue Philocles, a common Orator at ATHENS:

Whose busie tongue, much worse then two edg'd sword did seeme:
Which pratled still, and honestly did neuer once esteeme.

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchsafe to compare with his horse-keeper, nor Marius with one of his sergeants or mace-bearers. But to leaue aside the particular names of all other Princes, Lords, Consuls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernours that made warres with Sylla: what ROMAINE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king liuing was there of such power as king Mithridates? And of Generals and Lieutenants of armies in all ITALY, were there any euer more valiant, then Lamponius & Thelesinus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and slue the two last? But the greatest matter of all that we haue spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lysander did all his noble acts, with the aide of his whole country: where Sylla to the contrary did his (being banished from his country) by his enemies. And at the selfe same time that they draue Syllaes wife out of ROME, that they ouerthrew his houses, and slue his friends also in ROME: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thousands of fighting men in BOEOTIA, and ventured his person in manifold dangers, so that in the end he conquered them all, to the honour and benefit of his country. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer stoupe to king Mithridates, for any particular alliance he offered him, neither yeeld vnto him for any aide of men, or mony, to war against his enemies: but (a thing most chiefly to be noted aboue the rest) he would not vouchsafe to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hand only, before he had spoken it with his owne mouth, & faithfully promised, that he would forgo ASIA, deliuer him his galleys, and giue vp the realmes of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA vnto their naturall kings. This me thinkes was the goodliest act that euer Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimity, to haue preferred the benefit of the cõmonwealth in that sort, before his priuate commodity. For therein he was like vnto a good greyhound, that first pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him fast till he haue ouerthrowne him: and then afterwards followeth the pursute of his owne priuate quarrell. And lastly, me thinkes it is easily iudged, what difference there was betweene their two natures, in that they did both towards the city of ATHENS. For Sylla hauing taken it, after the citizens had made fierce wars with him for the increase of king Mithridates greatnesse: yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lysander to the contrarie, seeing such a mighty state and Empire as that ouerthrowne from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the liberty of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before: and established there very cruell and wicked tyrants. And therefore in mine opinion, we shall not much swarue from the troth, if we giue this iudgement: that Sylla did the greater acts, and Lysander committed the fewer faults. And that we giue to the one the honour of a continent and modest man: and the other, the commendation of a valiant and skilfull souldier.

Sylla fought with men of greatest power and ouercame them.

THE LIFE OF Cimon.

Peripoltas and his posteritie.

Peripoltas the Soothsayer, he that brought King Opheltas out of THESSALY into the country of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time florished in that country, the more part of the which were euer resident in the city of CHÆRONEA, becausе it was the first city that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expulsed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally giuen to the warres: who were so forward and aduenturous in all dangers thereof (in the inuasions of the MEDES into GREECE, and in the battels of the GAVLES) that they were slaine all of them, but onely Damon (a litle child left fatherlesse and motherlesse) surnamed Peripoltas that escaped, who for goodly personage and noble courage excelled all the lusty youths of his time, though otherwise he was very rude, and of a seuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growne of full age, a ROMAINE Captaine of an ensigne of footemen (lying in garrison for the winter season in the city of CHÆRONEA) fell in great loue with Damon: and becausе he could not reape the fruits of his dishoneſt loue by no intreaty nor gifts, there appeared vehement presumptions that by force he went about to abuse him, for that CHÆRONEA at that time (being my naturall citie where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) litle regarded. Damon mistrusting the Captaines villany, and detesting his abhominable desire, watched him a shrewd turne, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, becausе he might the more secretly compasse his enterprise) to be a counsell with him, and take his part against the Captaine. Now there were sixteene of them in consort together, that one night blacked their faces all with soote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the breake of day set vpon this ROMAINE Captaine, that was making sacrifice in the market place, and slue him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the city, which was straight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereupon they called a councell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to suffer paines of death: hoping thereby to haue cleared their innocency for the fact done to the ROMAINES. But the selfe same night, as all the magistrates and officers of the city were at supper together in the towne-house, according to their custome: Damon and his followers stale vpon them suddenly, slue them all, and fled againe vpon it. It chanced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being sent on some iourny, passed by the city of CHÆRONEA with his army: and because this murther was but newly done, he staied there a few dayes to examine the troth and originall thereof: and found that the commons of the city were in no fault, but that they themselues also had receiued hurt: whereupon he tooke the souldiers of the ROMAINES that remained of the garrison, and caried them away with him. In the meane time, Damon destroyed all the country thereabout, and still houered neare to the city, insomuch as the inhabitants of the same were driuen in the end to send vnto him, and by gentle words and fauorable decrees handled him so, that they inticed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongst them, they chose him Gymnasiarchus, to say, a master of exercises of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his stoue or hot-house, starke naked as he was, they slue him by treason. And because that there appeared spirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard gronings and sighings as our fathers told vs, they caused the doore of the hot-house to be walled vp: yet for all that, there are visions seene, & terrible voices and cries heard in that selfe place vnto this present time, as the neighbours dwelling by do testifie. Now they that were descended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the country of PHOCIDES, neare vnto the city of STIRIS, who do onely of all other both keepe the language & maners of the ÆTOLIANS) are called ASBOLOMENI, signifying blacke, and besmeared wit soote: because that Damon and his fellowes did blacke their faces with soote, when they slue the ROMAINE captaine. But the ORCHOMENIANS being neare neighbours vnto the CHÆRONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hired an informer of ROME, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole city (as if it had bin one priuate person alone) for the murther of the ROMAINES, whom Damon and his companions had slaine. The inditement was drawne, and the case pleaded before the gouernour of MACEDON, for that the ROMAINES did send no gouernors at that time into GREECE: and the counsellors that pleaded for the city of CHÆRONEA, relied vpon the testimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themselues to his report, who knew the troth and how it was. Thereupon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of answer aduertised the very troth: so was our city cleared of the accusation, which otherwise stood in danger of vtter destruction. The inhabitants of the city of CHÆRONEA, for that they had escaped the danger by testimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honour him withall, they set vp his image in stone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be liuing at this present, though many yeares be gone & passed since, do notwithstanding reckon our selues partakers of his forepassed benefit. And because we are perswaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens manners and conditions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that representeth any mans person or shape only: we will comprehend his life and doings according to the troth, in this volume of noble mens liues, where we do compare and sort them one with another. It shall be sufficient for vs therefore, that we shew our selues thankfull for his benefit: and we thinke, that he himselfe would mislike, for reward of his true testimony, to be requited with a fauorable lie told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a passing faire face drawne, and liuely counterfeited, and that hath an excellent good grace withall, yet some maner of blemish or imperfection in it, we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curiously to shew it, because the one would deforme the counterfeit, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euen so, because it is a hard thing (or to say better, peraduenture impossible) to describe a man, whose life should altogether be innocent, and perfect: we must first studie to write his vertues at large, and thereby seeke perfectly to represent the troth, euen as the life it selfe. But where by chance we find certaine faults and errours in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the mind, by necessity of the time or state of the common wealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednesse proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we shall not need too curiously to expresse in our historie, but rather to passe them lightly ouer, of reuerent shame to the meere frailtie of mans nature, which cannot bring forth a man of such vertue and perfection, but there is euer some imperfection in him. And therefore, considering with my selfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it best to compare him with Cimon, because they haue bene both valiant souldiers against their enemies, hauing both done notable exploits in warres against the barbarous people: and moreouer, they haue both bene courteous and mercifull vnto their citizens, and were both the only men that pacified the ciuill wars and diſſention in their countrey, and both the one and the other of them wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer GRECIAN captaine before Cimon, nor ROMAINE captaine before Lucullus, that had made wars ſo farre off from their country leauing apart the deeds of Bacchus & of Hercules, and the acts alſo of Perſeus againſt the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS: and the deeds of Iaſon alſo, if there remaine any monument extant ſince that time, worthy of credit in theſe our dayes. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together: that they neuer ended their warres, they only ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouercame them altogether. Againe, we may note in them a great reſemblance of nature, for their honeſty, curteſie and humanity, which they ſhewed vnto ſtrangers in their countrey: and for the magnificence and ſumptuouſneſſe of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we do leaue out ſome other ſimilitudes betweene them: howbeit in the diſcourſe of their liues they will eaſily appeare. Cimon was the ſonne of Miltiades and of Hegeſipyle, a THRACIAN woman borne, and the daughter of king Olorus, as we find written in certaine poeticall verſes which Melanthius and Archelaus haue written of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the hiſtoriograper himſelfe, who was of kin alſo vnto Cimon, was called in like maner Olorus, ſhewing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his anceſtours, and did alſo poſſeſſe mines of gold in the country of THRACIA. It is ſayd moreouer, that he died in a certaine place called the ditchy forreſt, where he was ſlaine: howbeit that his aſhes and bones were caried into the countrey of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongſt the tombes of them of the houſe and family of Cimon, neare vnto the tombe of Cimons owne ſiſter called Elpinice. Notwithſtanding, Thucydides was of the village of ALIMVS, and Miltiades of the village of LACIA. This Miltiades Cimons father, being condemned by the ſtate to pay the ſumme of fiftie talents, was for non payment caſt into priſon, and there died: and left Cimon and his ſiſter Elpinice aliue, both orphanes, and verie yong. Now, Cimon in his firſt yong yeares had a very ill name and report in the city, being counted a riotous young man, and a great drinker, following his grandfather Cimons faſhions vp and downe, as he had alſo his name: ſauing that his grandfather for his beaſtlineſſe was ſurnamed Coalemos, as much to ſay, as foole. Steſimbrotus THASIAN, who was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon neuer learned muſicke, nor any other of the liberall ſciences, accuſtomably taught to young noble mens ſons of GRECE, and that he had no ſharpe wit, nor good grace of ſpeaking, a vertue proper vnto children borne in the country of ATTICA: howbeit that he was of a noble mind, and plaine, without diſſimulation, ſo that he rather liued PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was euen ſuch as the Poet Euripides deſcribed Hercules to be:

> A ſimple man he was, and could not well diſguiſe:
> As honeſt eke in things of weight, as wit could well deuiſe.

This ſerued fitly to be applied vnto Steſimbrotus words written of him: but notwithſtanding, in his firſt young yeares he was ſuſpected of incontinencie with his ſiſter, who indeed otherwiſe had no very good name. For ſhe was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies priſoners vpon the wals of the gallery, called the Pleſianaction, and now Pœcile: (to ſay, ſet out and beautified with diuerſe pictures) he drew (as they ſay) Laodices face vpon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for moneys ſake, but gaue his labour franckly to the common wealth, as all the hiſtoriographers that wrote in that time do witneſſe: and as the Poet Melanthius alſo reciteth in theſe verſes:

Elpinice Cimons ſiſter, vnchaſt.

Polygnotus the painter.

> At his owne proper charge, great coſt he hath beſtowed,
> In decking vp our temples here with gilded roofes embowed,
> For honour of the gods. And in our tongue likewiſe,
> He hath adorn'd the common place, with many a fine deuiſe:
> Painting and ſetting forth, in ſtately ſhew to ſee,
> The images of demy-gods that here amongſt vs be.

Yet ſome ſay that Elpinice did not ſecretly company with her brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull maried wife, becauſe ſhe could not for her pouertie haue a husband of like nobility and parentage to her ſelfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richeſt men of the city, did afterwards fall in fanſie with her, and deſired to marie her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fiftie talents, wherein he ſtood condemned a debter to the ſtate, Elpinice being poore, had regard to match according to her ſtate and calling.

ſtate, ſo that he might haue her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vpon that condition maried his ſiſter Elpinice vnto Callias. This notwithſtanding, it is certaine that Cimon was ſomewhat amorous, and giuen to loue women. For Melantheus the Poet in certaine of his elegies, maketh mention for his pleaſure of one Aſteria borne at SALAMINA, and of another called Mneſtra, as if Cimon had bene in loue with them. But vndoubtedly, he loued his lawfull wife Iſodice maruellous well, the daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles ſonne, and tooke her death very grieuouſly, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were written vnto him, to comfort him in his ſorow. Panætius the Philoſopher is of opinion, that Archelaus the Phiſition wrote thoſe elegies: and ſure it is not vnlikely, conſidering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimons nature and conditions deſerued great commendation. For his valiantneſſe he gaue not place vnto Miltiades, and for his wiſedome and iudgement, he was not inferiour vnto Themiſtocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a iuſter and honeſter man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the beſt of either of both in the diſcipline of warres, and for the valiantneſſe of a noble captaine: and he did much excell them both in properties of a good gouernour, and in the adminiſtration of the affaires of a city, when he was but a yong man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themiſtocles at the comming in of the MEDES counſelled the people of ATHENS to go out of the city, to leaue their lands and countrey, and to ſhip into galleys, and fight with the barbarous people by ſea in the ſtraight of SALAMINA: as euery man was wondering at his bold and vertuous counſell, Cimon was the firſt man that went with a life and iolity through the ſtreete Ceramicus, vnto the caſtell, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carying a bit of a bridle in his hand to conſecrate vnto the goddeſſe Minerua, ſignifying thereby, that the city had no need of horſemen at that time, but of mariners and ſeamen. And after he had giuen vp his offering, he tooke one of the targets that hung vpon the wall of the temple, and hauing made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the hauen, and was the firſt that made the moſt part of the citizens to take a good hart to them, and couragiouſly to leaue the land, and take the ſea. Beſides all this, he was a man of a goodly ſtature, as Ion the Poet teſtifieth, and had a faire curled haire and thicke, and fought ſo valiantly at the day of the battell, that he wan immediatly great reputation, with the loue and good will of euerie man. So that many were ſtill about him to encourage him to be liuely and valiant, and to thinke thenceforth to do ſome acts worthie of the glorie that his father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwards, ſo ſoone as he began to deale in matters of ſtate, the people were maruellous glad of him, and were wearied with Themiſtocles: by meanes whereof Cimon was preſently aduanced and preferred to the chiefeſt offices of honour in the citie, being verie well thought on of the common people, becauſe of his ſoft and plaine nature. Moreouer, Ariſtides alſo did greatly further his aduancement, becauſe he ſaw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vſe him as a counterpoiſe to controle Themiſtocles craft and ſtoutneſſe. Wherefore after the MEDES were fled out of GREECE, Cimon being ſent for by the ATHENIANS for their generall by ſea, when the citie of ATHENS had then no maner of rule nor commandement, but followed king Pauſanias and the LACEDÆMONIANS: he euer kept his countreymen and citizens in maruellous good order in all the voyages he made, and they were readier to do good ſeruice, then any other nation in the whole armie whatſoeuer. And when king Pauſanias had practiſed with the barbarous people to betray GREECE, had written alſo to the king of of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time dealt very cruelly and ſtraightly with the confederates of his countrey, and committed many inſolent parts by reaſon of the great authoritie he had, and through his fooliſh pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwiſe, gently entertained them whom Pauſanias iniured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his courteous manner, the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing no eye to his doings, he ſtale away the rule and commandement of all GREECE from them, and brought the ATHENIANS to be ſole Lords of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his ſweete tongue, and gracious manner of vſing all men. For the moſt part of the confederates being no longer able to away with Pauſanias pride and crueltie, came willingly and ſubmitted themſelues vnder the protection of Cimon and Ariſtides: who did not only receiue them, but wrote alſo to the councell of the Ephores at LACEDÆMON, that they ſhould call Pauſanias home, for that he diſhonoured SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and warres. And for proofe hereof, they ſay that king Pauſanias being on a time in the citie of BYZANCE, ſent for Cleonice, a young maiden of a noble houſe, to take his pleaſure of her.

Cimons perſonage commended.

Cimon generall for the Athenians by ſea.

King Pauſanias through his inſolency and pride, loſt the Lacedæmonians all their rule of Greece.

Her parents durſt not keepe her from him, by reaſon of his cruelty, but ſuffered him to cary her away. The young gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Pauſanias chamber to take away the lights, and thinking in the darke to come to Pauſanias bed that was aſleepe, groping for the bed as ſoftly as ſhe could to make no noiſe, ſhe vnfortunately hit againſt the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made ſuch a noiſe, that it waked him on the ſudden, and thought ſtraight therewithall that ſome of his enemies had bene come traiterouſly to kill him, wherupon he tooke his dagger lying vnder his beds head, and ſo ſtabbed it in the young virgine, that ſhe died immediatly vpon it. Howbeit ſhe neuer let Pauſanias take reſt after that, becauſe her ſpirit came euery night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine haue ſlept, and ſpake this angrily to him in verſe, as followeth:

Pauſanias killed the yong Byzantine virgine.

Keepe thou thy ſelfe vpright, and iuſtice ſee thou feare,
For wo and ſhame be vnto him, that iuſtice downe doth beare.

This vile fact of his did ſo ſtirre vp all the confederates harts againſt him, that they came to beſiege him in BIZANTIVM vnder the conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithſtanding he eſcaped, and ſecretly ſaued himſelfe. And becauſe that this maidens ſpirit would neuer let him reſt, but vexed him continually, he fled vnto the city of HERACLEA, where there was a temple that coniured dead ſpirits, & there was the ſpirit of Cleonice coniured to pray her to be contented. So ſhe appeared vnto him, and told him that he ſhould be deliuered of all his troubles ſo ſoone as he came to SPARTA: ſignifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he ſhould ſuffer there. Diuerſe writers do thus report it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GRECIANS, which were come to him to take his part: was aduertiſed that certaine great men of PERSIA, and allied to the king himſelfe, who kept the city of EIONE, vpon the riuer of Strymon in the countrey of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. Vpon which intelligence he tooke the ſea with his armie, and went thither, where at his firſt comming he vanquiſhed and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: and hauing ouerthrowne them, draue all the reſt into the city of EIONE. That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other ſide of the riuer of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of EIONE: and hauing driuen them to forſake the country, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himſelfe. Whereupon he held them that were beſieged at EIONE ſo ſtraightly from victuals, that Butes the king of PERSIAES Lieutenant, diſpairing of the ſtate of the city, ſet fire on the ſame, and burnt himſelfe, his friends, and all the goods in it. By reaſon whereof, the ſpoile taken in that city was but ſmall, becauſe the barbarous people burnt all the beſt things in it with themſelues: howbeit he conquered the countrey thereabouts, and gaue it to the ATHENIANS to inhabit, being a very pleaſant and fertile ſoile. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS ſuffered him to conſecrate and ſet vp openly three Hermes of ſtone (which are foure ſquare pillars) vpon the tops of the which they ſet vp heads of Mercury: vpon the firſt of the three pillars, this inſcription is grauen.

Butes burneth himſelfe, citie, and friends, for feare of Cimon.

Statues of Mercurie.

The people truly were, of courage ſtout and fierce,
Who hauing ſhut the Medes faſt vp (as ſtories do rehearſe)
Within the walled towne, of Eione that tide,
Which on the ſtreame of Strymon ſtands, they made them there abide
The force of famines pinch, and therewith made them feele
The dint of warre ſo many a time, with truſtie tooles of ſteele:
Till in the end, deſpaire ſo pierced in their thought,
As there they did deſtroy themſelues, and ſo were brought to nought.

Vpon the ſecond there is ſuch another:

The citizens which dwell in Athens ſtately towne,
Haue here ſet vp theſe monuments, and pictures of renowne,
To honor ſo the facts, and celebrate the fame,
Their valiant chiftaines did atchieue, in many a martiall game:
That ſuch as after come, when they thereby perceiue,
How men of ſeruice for their deeds, did rich rewards receiue,
Encouraged may be, ſuch men for to reſemble,
In valiant acts and dreadfull deeds, which makes their foes to tremble.

And vpon the third another:

When Meneſtheus did leade forth of this citie here,
An armie to the Troyane warres, (by Homer doth appeare)
He was aboue the reſt, that out of Græcia went,
A valiant knight, a worthie wight, a Captaine excellent,
To take in hand the charge, an armie for to guide:
And eke to range them orderly, in battell to abide.
That praiſe of proweſſe then (o graue Atheniens)
Is now no newes to fill the eares of theſe your citizens,
Since through the world ſo wide, the fame and worthy priſe,
For martiall feates, to you of yore hath iudged bene alwaies.

Now though Cimons name be not compriſed in theſe inſcriptions, yet they thought that this was a ſingular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themiſtocles had euer the like. For when Miltiades requeſted the people one day that they would licence him to weare a garland of oliue boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, that ſtanding vp in open aſſembly ſpake againſt him, & ſayd a thing that maruellouſly pleaſed the people, though indeed it was an vnthankful recompence for the good ſeruice he had done to the commonwealth. When you haue Miltiades (ſayd he) ouercome the barbarous people alone in battell, then aske to be honoured alone alſo. But how was it then, that Cimons ſeruice was ſo acceptable to the ATHENIANS? It was in mine opinion, becauſe they had with other captaines fought to defend themſelues and their country only: and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, they had aſſaulted and driuen their enemies home to their owne doores, where they conquered the cities of EION & of AMPHIPOLIS, which afterwards they did inhabit with their owne citizens, and wan there alſo the Ile of SCYROS, which Cimon tooke vpon this occaſion. The DOLOPIANS did inhabite it, who were idle people, and liued without labour or tillage, and had bene rouers on the ſea of a wonderful long time, vſing piracy altogether to maintaine themſelues withal: ſo that in the end they ſpared not ſo much as the marchants and paſſengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine THESSALIANS that went thither to trafficke. And when they had taken their goods from thē, yet would they caſt thē in priſon beſides. Howbeit the priſoners found meanes to eſcape, & after they had ſaued themſelues, repaired to the parliament of the AMPHICTYONS, which is a generall councell of all the ſtates and people of GREECE. The AMPHICTYONS vnderſtanding the matter, condemned the citie of the SCYRIANS to pay a great ſum of money. The citizens refuſed to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, and bad them that robbed the merchants and had the goods in their hands, pay it if they would. And therefore, becauſe there was no other likelihood, but that the theeues thēſelues ſhould be driuen to anſwer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed him to come with his army and they would deliuer their citie into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon hauing conquered this Iland, draue out the DOLOPIANS thence, and rid the ſea ÆGEVM of all pirates thereby. That done, remēbring that the ancient Theſeus, the ſon of Ægeus, flying from ATHENS came into that Iland of SCYROS, where king Lycomedes ſuſpecting his comming had traiterouſly ſlaine him: Cimon was maruellous carefull to ſeeke out his tombe, becauſe the ATHENIANS had an Oracle & prophecy, that commanded them to bring his aſhes and bones backe againe to ATHENS, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the inhabitants of the Iland would neuer before cōfeſſe where it was, nor ſuffer any man to ſeeke it out, till he at the laſt with much ado found the tombe, put his bones aboord the Admirall galley ſumptuouſly decked and ſet forth, and ſo brought him againe into his countrey, foure hundred yeares after Theſeus death. For this, the people thanked him maruellouſly, and thereby he wan exceedingly the ATHENIANS good wils: and in memorie of him they celebrated the iudgement of the tragicall playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a yong man had played his firſt tragedy, Aphepſion the preſident perceiuing there was great ſtrife and contention amongſt the lookers on, would not draw them by lots that ſhould be Iudges of this play, to giue the victorie vnto that Poet that had beſt deſerued: but when Cimon and the other captaines were come into the Theater to ſee the ſame (after they had made their accuſtomed oblations vnto the god, in honour of whom theſe playes were celebrated) he ſtayed and made them to miniſter an oath vnto ten (which were of euery tribe of the people one) and the oath being giuen, he cauſed them to ſit as Iudges to giue ſentence, which of the Poets ſhould cary away the priſe. This made all the Poets striue and contend who best should do, for the honour of the Iudges: but Sophocles by their sentence bare away the victorie. But Æschilus (as they say) was so angry and grieued withall, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, and went for spite into SICILIA, where he died, and was buried neere vnto the citie of GELA. Ion writeth that he being but a young boy, newly come from CHIO vnto ATHENS, supped one night with Cimon at Laomedons house, and that after supper when they had giuen the gods thankes, Cimon was intreated by the company to sing. And he did sing with so good a grace, that euery man praised him that heard him, and sayd he was more curteous then Themistocles farre: who being in like company, and requested also to play vpon the cithern, answered them, he was neuer taught to sing nor play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich & mightie citie. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to another, as it falleth out commonly in speech, they entred in talke of Cimons doings: and hauing rehearsed the chiefest of them, he himselfe told one, which was the notablest and wisest part of all the rest that euer he played. For the ATHENIANS and their confederates together, hauing taken a great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIVM, the confederates to honour him withall, gaue him the preheminence to diuide the spoile amongst them. Whereupon he made the diuision, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by themselues, and layd the spoiles and their apparell by themselues. The confederates found this distribution very vnequall: but neuertheless Cimon gaue them the choise to chuse which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS should be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counsell rather to take the spoiles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS themselues, and so they did: for they tooke the spoile of the prisoners goods and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Whereupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common soldiers to be but an ill deuider of spoile, because that the confederates caried away great store of chaines, carkanets, and bracelets of gold, and goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN fashion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labour. But shortly after, the parents and friends of these prisoners, came out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed euery man of them at a great ransome: so that Cimon gathered such a masse of readie money together by their ransome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his galleys with the same for the space of foure moneths after, and left a great summe of money besides in the sparing treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, bestowed the goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous people, more honourably againe, in relieuing his poore decayed citizens: for he brake vp all his hedges and inclosures, and layd them plaine and open, that trauellers passing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much fruite thereof as they would, without any manner of danger. And furthermore, he kept a continuall table in his house, not furnished with many dishes, but with meate sufficient for many persons, and where his poore countreymen were daily refreshed, that would come vnto that ordinary: so as they needed not otherwise care to labour for their liuing, but might be the readier, and haue the more leisure to serue the commonwealth. Yet Aristotle the Philosopher writeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore townes men only in the village of LACIA, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwayes certaine young men waiting on him of his houshold seruants well apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the citie, any old citizen poorely arrayed, he made one of these yong men strip himselfe, & change apparell with the old man: and that was very well thought of, and they all honoured him for it. Moreouer, these young men caried euer good store of money about them: and when they met with any honest poore citizen in the market place, or elsewhere, knowing his pouerty, they secretly gaue him mony in his hand, and sayd neuer a word. Which the Poet selfe Cratinus seemeth to speake of, in a comedie of his intituled the Archiloches.

Furthermore, Gorgias Leontine ſaid, that Cimon got goods to vſe them, and that he vſed them to be honoured by them. And Critias that was one of the thirty tyrants of ATHENS, he wiſheth and deſireth of the gods in his Elegies: How Cimon vſed his goods

And noble heart of Cimon, he who ſpared none expence:

The name of Lichas SPARTAN, hath bene famous amongſt the GRECIANS: and yet we know no other cauſe why, ſauing that he vſed to feaſt ſtrangers that came to LACEDÆMON on their feſtiuall day, to ſee the ſports and exerciſes of the young men dauncing naked in the citie. But the magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceede the auncient liberalitie, courteſie, and hoſpitalitie of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the firſt men that taught the GRECIANS throughout all GRECE, how they ſhould ſow corne, and gather it to maintaine themſelues withall, and alſo ſhewed them the vſe of wels, and how they ſhould light and keepe fire. But Cimon making an hoſpitall of his owne houſe, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permitting ſtrangers that trauelled by his grounds to gather ſuch fruites there, as the time and ſeaſon of the yeare yeelded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world, the goods to be common amongſt them, as the Poets ſay they were in the old time of Saturnes raigne. And now, where ſome accuſed this honeſt liberalitie of Cimon, obiecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and to winne their good wils by that meanes: the maner of life he led, accompanying his liberalitie, did vtterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer took part with the nobilitie, and liued after the LACEDÆMONIANS maner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies againſt Themiſtocles, who without all compaſſe of reaſon increaſed the authoritie and power of the people: and for this cauſe he ioyned with Ariſtides, and was againſt Ephialtes, who would for the peoples ſake haue put downe and aboliſhed Areopagus court. And where all other gouernours in his time were extortioners and bribe-takers, (Ariſtides and Ephialtes onely excepted) he to the contrary led an vncorrupt life in adminiſtratiõ of iuſtice, and euer had cleane hands, whatſoeuer he ſpake or did for the ſtate and commonwealth, and would therefore neuer take money of any man liuing. And for proofe hereof, we find it written, that a noble man of PERSIA called Reſaces, being a traitour to his maiſter the king of PERSIA, fled on a time vnto ATHENS: where being continually baited and wearied, with the common accuſations of theſe talebearers & pickthanks, that accuſed him to the people, he repaired at the length vnto Cimon, and brought him home to his owne doore two bowles, the one full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of ſiluer, which be peeces of mony ſo called, becauſe that the name of Darius was written vpon them. Cimon ſeeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather chuſe, to haue him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous nobleman aunſwered him, that he had rather haue him his friend. Then ſaid Cimon to him again, away with thy gold and ſiluer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy friend, that gold and ſiluer ſhall euer be at my commandement, to take and diſpoſe it as I haue need. About that time began the confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the wars againſt the barbarous people, deſiring thencefoorth to liue quietly, and to haue leyſure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke alſo, cõſidering that they had driuen their enemies out of their country, and that now they did thẽ no more hurt: by reaſon wherof they payed the mony they were ſeſſed at, but they would furniſh no moe men nor ſhips as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and proſecuted law againſt them that failed paiment, condemning them in great fines, and that ſo cruelly, that they made the ſeigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIANS hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrarie courſe to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take money and void ſhips of them that would not, or could not ſerue in their perſons, being very glad to ſuffer them to become ſlouthfull mongrels in their houſes, by too much reſt, and to tranſpoſe themſelues from good ſouldiers which they had bene, to labourers, merchants, and farmers, altogether altered from armes and warres, through the beaſtly ſlouthful deſire they had to liue pleaſantly at home. And contrarily, cauſing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after another to ſerue in gallies, he ſo acquainted thẽ with continual pains in his voiages, that he made thẽ in ſhort ſpace become lords & maiſters ouer them that gaue thẽ pay & entertainment. For they began by litle & litle to flatter and feare the ATHENIANS, whom they ſaw trained continually in the warres, euer bearing armour, and carying their weapons in their hands, becomming expert ſouldiers at their charge, by reaſon of the pay they gaue them: ſo that in the end, they became ſubiects and contributaries as it were vnto them, where before they were their friends and companions. So as there neuer was GRECIAN Captaine that bridled more the crueltie and power of that mighty PERSIAN king, then Cimon did: for after he had driuen him out of all GRECE, he left him not ſo, but following him foot-hote, as we commonly ſay, before the barbarous people could take breath, or giue wiſe and direct order for their doings, he made ſo great ſpeed, that he tooke ſome of their cities from them by force, and other ſome by practiſe, cauſing them to rebell againſt the king, and turne to the GRECIANS ſide: inſomuch as there was not a man of warre left for the king of PERSIA in all ASIA, from the country of IONIA, directly downe to PAMPHYLIA. And furthermore, being aduertiſed that the kings Captaines were vpon the coaſt of PAMPHYLIA with a great armie by ſea, becauſe he would feare them in ſuch ſort, that they ſhould not dare any more to ſhew themſelues vpon the ſea, on this ſide of the Iles of the CHELIDONIANS: he departed from the Ile of GNIDOS, and from the city of TRIOPIVM, with two hundred gallies, the which at the firſt had bene excellently well made and deuiſed by Themiſtocles, as well for ſwift ſailing, as for eaſie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carie the greater number of men of warre in battell, to aſſault the enemies. And ſo went firſt againſt the PHASELITES (who were GRECIANS borne, and yet notwithſtanding would neither take the GRECIANS part, nor receiue their army into their hauens) landed there, deſtroyed all the country, and then came and camped with his army hard at their wals. But the men of CHIO being auncient friends of the PHASELITES, and in Cimons army at that iourney, did ſomewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertiſement to them of the citie of their doings, by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and ſhot ouer the wals. So as in the end they procured their peace with condition, that the PHASELITES ſhould pay ten talents for a fine: and furthermore ſhould alſo follow the army of the GRECIANS, and from thenceforth fight with them, and for them, againſt the barbarous people. Now Ephorus ſaith, that the PERSIAN captaine that had charge of the army by ſea, was called Tithrauſtes, and the Captaine of the army by land, Pherendates. But Calliſthenes writeth, that Ariomandes the ſon of Gobrias, was the kings Lieutenant, hauing chiefe authoritie ouer the whole armie that lay at anker before the riuer of Eurymedon, and had no deſire to fight, becauſe they looked for a new ſupply of foureſcore ſaile of the PHOENICIANS, that ſhould come to them from CYPRVS. But Cimon contrarily, ſought to fight before theſe gallies of the PHOENICIANS came to ioyne with them, and put his gallies in order of battell, determining to giue a charge and compell them to fight, would they, or would they not: which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew nearer into the mouth of the riuer Eurymedon, becauſe they ſhold not compaſſe them in behind, nor force them to come to battel againſt their wils. Which notwithſtanding when they ſaw the ATHENIANS come to ſet vpon them where they lay, they made out againſt them a fleete of ſixe hundred ſaile, as Phanodemus declareth: or as Ephorus writeth, three hundred and fiftie ſaile onely. But they did nothing worthie of ſo great a power, at the leaſt touching the fight by ſea, but turned their prores ſtraight to the riuer: where ſuch as could recouer the mouth thereof in time ſaued themſelues, flying to their armie by land, which was not farre from that place ſet alſo in order of battell. But the reſt that were taken tardie by the way, they were ſlaine, and their gallies ſunke or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great number of them: for many were ſaued, as it is likely, and many alſo were ſplitted to peeces, and yet the ATHENIANS tooke two hundred of them priſoners. In the meane ſeaſon, their armie by land came nearer to the ſea ſide: which Cimon perceiuing, ſtood in ſome doubt whether he ſhould land his men or not, becauſe it ſeemed a hard and daungerous thing vnto him, to land in ſpite of his enemies: and to put forth the GRECIANS alreadie wearied with the firſt battell againſt the barbarous people, who were altogether whole, freſh, and luſtie, and withall many in number againſt one. Neuertheles, perceiuing that his men truſted in their force, beſides the courage which the firſt victory gaue them, and that they deſired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he put them on land while they were hote yet with the firſt battell. And ſo with great furie and loud cries they ran immediatly againſt the barbarous people, who ſtood ſtill and ſtirred not, and receiued their firſt charge very valiantly: by reaſon wherof, the battell grew ſharpe and bloudy, inſomuch as there were ſlaine all the greateſt perſonages and

and men of best account of all the ATHENIANS armie. But the other fought it out so valiantly, that in the end they wanne the field, and with maruellous difficultie made the barbarous people flie, whereof they slue a great number in the place, and tooke the rest prisoners with all their tents and pauilions, which were full of all sorts of riches. Thus Cimon like a valiant champion of the holy games, hauing in one selfe day wonne two victories, and hauing excelled the battell by sea also which the GRECIANS had wonne within the channell of SALAMINA, with that which he wanne then vpon the land: and the battell which the GRECIANS wanne by land before the citie of PLATÆES, with that which he wanne the day before on the sea: yet he was not contented with all this. For after two so famous victories obtained, he would once againe fight for the honour of the tokens of triumph: and being aduertised that the fourescore saile of the PHOENICIANS (comming too late to be present at the first battell by sea) were arriued at the head of Hydra, he sailed thither with all possible speed. Now the Captaines of this fleete, knew no certaintie of the ouerthrow of their chiefest armie, but stood in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was ouerthrowne in that sort: and therefore were they so much the more affraid, when they descried a farre off the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they lost all their shippes, and the greatest part of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. This victorie against the PERSIANS did so daunt and plucke downe the pride and loftie mind of the barbarous PERSIAN king, as he made that condition of peace so much spoken of in auncient histories, in the which he promised and sware, that his armies thencefoorth should come no nearer to the GRECIAN sea, then the carriere of a horse, and that he would saile no farther forward then the Isles CHELIDONIANS, and CYANEANS, with any galleys or other ships of warre. Howbeit the historiographer Callisthenes writeth, that it was no part of any article comprised within the condition of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of this so great an ouerthrow: and that afterwards he kept so farre from the GRECIAN sea, that Pericles with fiftie saile, and Ephialtes with thirtie onely, did saile beyond the Isles CHELIDONIÆ, and no barbarous fleete euer came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongst the common actes of ATHENS, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found written at large, as a thing that was true indeede. And it is said, that for this occasion the ATHENIANS built an altar of peace, and that they did Callias great honour, for that he was sent Ambassador vnto the king of PERSIA to take his oath for confirmation of this peace. So when all these spoiles of the enemies were sold to them that would giue most, there was such store of gold and siluer in the sparing coffers of their treasurie, that there was enough to serue their turne for any seruice they would employ it to, and besides that, they had sufficient to build vp the side of the wall of the castle which looketh towards the South, this voyage and great spoile did so enrich them. And it is said moreouer, that the building of the long wals that ioyne to the citie with the hauen, which they call the legs, was built and finished afterwards: howbeit the first foundations therof were built with the mony Cimon gaue towards it, for that the worke met with moorish & waterie places, by meane whereof they were driuen to fill vp the marishes with force of flints and great logs, which they threw vnto the bottome. It was he also that first did beautifie and set forth the city of ATHENS, with places of liberall exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much esteemed. For he caused plane trees to be set in the market place: and the Academie which before was very drie and naked, he made it now a pleasant groue, and full of goodly springs which he brought into it, and made fine couered arbors to walke in, and goodly long smooth alleys to runne a good course in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certain PERSIANS dwelling in CHERRONESVS (to say a demy Ile of the country of THRASIA) wold not be gotten out, but sent to the people of high THRASIA, to pray their aide to defend themselues against Cimon: of whom they made but litle account, because he was departed from ATHENS with a very few ships, who set vpon them onely with foure gallies, and tooke thirteene of theirs. And so hauing driuen the PERSIANS out of CHERRONESVS, and subdued the THRASIANS, he conquered all the countrey of CHERRONESVS, from THRASIA vnto his owne countrey. And departing from thence, went against thē of the Ile of THASOS, that had rebelled against the ATHENIANS: and hauing ouercome them in battell by sea, he wan three and thirty of their ships, and besides that tooke their city by siege, and wanne the mines of gold lying beyond the same to the ATHENIANS, with all the lands that belonged vnto them. This conquest made his way open into MACEDON, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the best part thereof at that preſent time. But becauſe he let it alone, and followed not that oportunitie, he was ſuſpected to haue taken money, and to haue bene bribed by preſents of king Alexander: whereupon his ſecret enemies laid their heads together, and accuſed him. But Cimon to cleare himſelfe before the Iudges of this accuſation, ſaid vnto them: I haue practiſed friendſhip neither with the IONIANS, nor yet with the THESSALIANS, both which are very rich and wealthie people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as ſome other haue done, to receiue both honor and profite by them. But indeed I am a friend to the LACEDÆMONIANS, for I confeſſe I loue them, and deſire to follow their ſobrietie and temperance of life, the which I preferre and eſteeme aboue any riches or treaſure: although I am very glad notwithſtanding to enrich our ſtate and common wealth with the ſpoiles of our enemies. Steſimbrotus reporteth this accuſation, and ſaith: that his ſiſter Elpinicé went to Pericles houſe, (who was the ſharpeſt and ſtraighteſt accuſer of his) to pray him not to deale ſo extreamely with her brother: and that Pericles laughing on her, ſaid, alas, thou art too old, Elpinicè, thou, now to ouercome theſe matters. Yet for all that, when Cimons cauſe came to hearing, he was a more gentle aduerſarie, then any other of his accuſers, and roſe vp but once to ſpeake againſt him, and that for maners ſake onely: ſo that Cimon thereby eſcaped, and was cleared of this accuſation. And furthermore, ſo long as he was preſent in ATHENS, he alwaies kept the ſeditious people in obedience, who would euer croſſe and thwart the authoritie of the nobilitie, becauſe they would haue all the ſway and rule in their owne hands. But when Cimon was ſent abroad any whither to the warres, then the common people hauing no body to gainſay them, turned and altered the gouernement of the city topſie turuey, and confounded all the auncient lawes and cuſtomes which they had obſerued of long time, and that by the procurement and ſetting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of cauſes in manner from the court of * Areopagus, and put all authoritie of matters iudiciall into the hands of the people, and brought the ſtate of the city into a pure Democratia, to ſay, a common weale ruled by the ſole and abſolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauoured the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding the authority of the Senate and councell ſo ſhamefully defaced and troden vnder foote, was maruellouſly offended withall, and ſought to reſtore the auncient ſtate of iudgement againe as it was before, and ſet vp the gouernement of the nobilitie (called Optimatia) that was eſtabliſhed in the time of Cliſthenes. But then began his enemies againe with open mouth to crie out vpon him, reuiuing the old former naughtie rumour that ran of him before, that he kept his owne ſiſter: and furthermore accuſing him, that he did fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS. And amongſt other things there ranne in the peoples mouths the verſes of the poet Eupolis, which were made againſt Cimon:

No wicked man he was, but very negligent,
And therewithall to wine much more, then vnto mony bent.
He ſtale ſometimes away, at Sparta for to ſleepe:

And if it be ſo, that being thus negligent and giuen to wine, he haue gotten ſo many cities, and won ſuch ſundry great battels: it is out of doubt then, that if he had bene ſober and carefull, there had neuer bene before him nor ſince any GRECIAN captaine, that had paſſed him in glorie of the warres. Indeed it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS: for of two twins which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named the one of them Lacedæmonius, and the other Eleus, as Steſimbrotus writeth, ſaying, that for that cauſe Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers ſtocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer writeth, that both thoſe two, and another third called Theſſalus, were borne of Iſodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the ſonne of Megacles. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that Cimons credit grew the greater, by the fauour and countenance which the LACEDÆMONIANS gaue him, who had hated Themiſtocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a young man, did beare more ſway in ATHENS then he: which the ATHENIANS perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning: becauſe the goodwill of the LACEDÆMONIANS towards him, did bring them great commodity. For when the ATHENIANS began to grow of great power, and to practiſe ſecretly, that the confederates of the GRECIANS ſhould forſake the LACEDÆMONIANS to ioyne with them: the LACEDÆMONIANS were not angry withall, for the honor and loue they bare vnto Cimon, who did alone in manner manage all the affaires of GREECE at that time, becauſe he was very curteous vnto the confederates, and alſo alſo thankfull vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. But afterwards when the ATHENIANS were aloft and of great power, and that they ſaw Cimon ſtucke not for a litle matter with the LACEDÆMONIANS, but loued them more then they would haue had him: they began then to enuie him, becauſe in all his matters he had to do, he euer highly praiſed and extolled the LACEDÆMONIANS before them. But ſpecially, when he would reproue them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perſwade them to do any thing: the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſaid he, I warrant ye do not ſo. That, as Steſimbrotus ſaith, made him maruellouſly to be maliced of the people. But the chiefeſt thing they accuſed him of, and that moſt did hurt him, fell out vpon this occaſion. The fourth yeare of the raigne of Archidamus, the ſonne of Zeuxidamus king of SPARTA, there fortuned the wonderfulleſt and moſt fearefull earthquake in the city of LACEDÆMON, and thereabouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the country opened, and fell as into a bottomleſſe pit. The mountaine Taygetum ſhooke ſo terribly, that points of rockes fell downe from it. All the citie was laid on the ground and ouerthrowne, fiue houſes onely excepted, the reſt being wholly deſtroyed. And it is ſaid alſo, that a litle before this earthquake came, the young men of that citie were playing with the young boyes exerciſing themſelues ſtarke naked vnder a great gallerie couered ouer: and as they were ſporting together, there ſtarted vp a hare hard by them. The young men ſpying her, ranne after the hare ſtarke naked and oyled as they were with great laughter. They were no ſooner gone thence, but the top of the gallerie fell downe vpon the boyes that were left, and ſquaſhed them all to death. And in memorie of the ſame, the tombe where they were afterwards buried, is called vnto this day Siſmatias, as much to ſay, as the tombe of thoſe which the earthquake had ſlaine. But king Archidamus foreſeeing ſtraight vpon the ſodaine the daunger that was to come, by that he ſaw preſent, perceiuing his citizens buſie in ſauing their houſhold ſtuffe, and that they were running out of their houſes: made the trumpetters to ſound a hote alarme vpon it, as if their enemies had come ſtealingly vpon them to take the citie, to the end that all the inhabitants ſhould preſently repaire vnto him (ſetting all buſineſſe apart) with armour and weapon. That ſodaine alarme doubtleſſe ſaued the citie of SPARTA at that time: for the ILOTÆ, which are their ſlaues and bondmen in the country of LACONIA, and the country clownes of litle villages thereabouts, came running armed out of all parts, to ſpoile and rob them vpon the ſodaine that were eſcaped from this earthquake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then beganne afterwards to make open warres vpon them, when they had drawne certaine of their neighbours vnto their confederacie, and ſpecially the MESSENIANS, who made hote warres vpon the SPARTANS. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent Periclidas vnto ATHENS to demaund aide: of whom Ariſtophanes the Poet in mockage, ſaid:

A maruellous great earthquake in Lacedæmon. Taygetum mons.

Archidamus ſodaine pollicy ſaued the city. Ilotæ ſlaues and bondmen to the Lacedæmonians.

VVith viſage pale and wanne he on the altar ſate,
In skarlet gowne requiring aide, to ſuccour their eſtate.

Againſt whom Ephialtes alſo ſpake very much, proteſting that they ſhould not aide nor relieue a citie that was an enemie vnto ATHENS, but rather ſuffer it to fall to the ground, and to ſpurne the pride & arrogancie of SPARTA vnder their feet. But Cimon (as Critias ſaith) being more carefull for the benefite of SPARTA, then for the enlarging and increaſing of his country, brought it to paſſe by his perſwaſion, that the ATHENIANS ſent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore Ion rehearſeth the very ſelfe words that Cimon ſpake to moue the people to graunt his requeſt. For he beſought them that they would not ſuffer GREECE to halt, as if LACEDÆMON had bene one of her feete, and ATHENS the other: nor to ſuffer their citie to loſe another citie their friend, and ſubiect to the yoke and defence of GREECE. Hauing therefore obtained aide, to leade vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, he went with his armie through the CORINTHIANS countrey: wherewith Lachartus a Captaine of CORINTH was maruellouſly offended, ſaying: that he ſhould not haue entred into their countrey with an armie, before he had asked licence of them of the citie. For, ſaid he, when one knocketh at a mans doore or gate, yet he commeth not in, before the maiſter of the houſe commaundeth him. But ye CORINTHIANS (ſaid Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the CLEONÆIANS, nor of the MEGARIANS, to come in, but haue broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinking that all ſhould be open vnto them that are the ſtronger. Thus did Cimon ſtoutly anſwer the CORINTHIAN captaine againe, becauſe it ſtood him vpon, and ſo went on with his army through the country of CORINTH. Afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS ſent againe vnto the ATHENIANS, to require aide againſt the MESSINIANS and the ILOTES, (which are their ſlaues) who had wonne the citie of ITHOME. But when the ATHENIANS were come, the LACEDÆMONIANS were afraid of the great power they had brought, and of their boldneſſe beſides: wherefore they ſent them backe againe, and would not employ them of all other their confederates that came to their ſuccour, becauſe they knew them to be men very tickle, deſiring chaunge and alterations. The ATHENIANS returned home, miſliking much that they were ſent backe againe, inſomuch as euer after they hated them that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing. And for the LACEDÆMONIANS ſake therefore, taking a ſmall occaſion of offence againſt Cimon, they baniſhed him out of their countrie for ten yeares: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were baniſhed with the Oſtraciſmon baniſhment. Now within the terme of theſe ten yeares, the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuned to vndertake the deliuerie of the citie of DELPHES, from the ſeruitude and bondage of the PHOCIANS, and to put them from the cuſtodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the ſaid city. Wherefore to obtaine their deſire and purpoſe, they came to plant their campe neare vnto the city of TANAGRE in PHOCIDE, where the ATHENIANS went to fight with them. Cimon vnderſtanding this, although he was in exile, came to the ATHENIANS campe armed, with intent to do his dutie to fight with his countrymen againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, and ſo went into the bands of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was himſelfe. But his owne country enemies cried out againſt him, and ſaid, that he was come to none other end, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwards bring them to the citie ſelfe of ATHENS. Whereupon the great councell of the fiue hundred men were afraide, and ſent to the Captaines to commaund them they ſhould not receiue him into the battell: ſo that Cimon was compelled to depart the campe. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus ANAPHLYSTIAN, and his other friends that were ſuſpected as himſelfe was to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings: that they ſhould do their beſt endeuour to fight valiantly againſt their enemies, to the intent their good ſeruice at that battell might purge their innocencie towards their countrymen: and ſo they did. For the ATHENIANS keeping the ſouldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were an hundred in all, they ſet them apart by themſelues in a ſquadron, who fought it ſo valiantly and deſperately, that they were ſlaine euery man of them in the field, leauing the ATHENIANS maruellous ſory for them, and repenting when that they had ſo vniuſtly miſtruſted them as traitors to their country. Wherfore they kept their malice long againſt Cimon, partly as I am perſwaded, becauſe they called his former good ſeruice to mind which he had done to their country aforetime, and partly alſo, becauſe the neceſſitie of the time ſo required it. For the ATHENIANS hauing loſt a great battell before TANAGRE, looked for no other about the ſpring of the yeare, but that the PELOPONNESIANS would inuade them with a great power: wherefore they reuoked Cimons baniſhment by decree, whereof Pericles ſelfe was the onely author and procurer. So ciuill and temperate were mens mnnities at that time, regarding the common benefite of their publike ſtate and weale: and ſo much did their ambition (being the moſt vehement paſſion of all other, and that moſt troubleth mens minds) giue place, and yeeld to the neceſſities and affaires of the common weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to ATHENS, he ſhraight pacified the warre, and reconciled both cities together. And when he ſaw that the ATHENIANS could not liue in peace, but would be doing ſtill, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for lucres ſake: to preuent them that they ſhould not fall out with any of the GRECIANS, nor by ſcouring and coaſting vp and downe the country of PELOPONNESVS, and the Iles of GRECE, with ſo great a nauie, ſhould moue occaſion of ciuill warres amongſt the GREGIANS, or of complaints vnto their confederates againſt them: he rigged and armed out two hundred gallies to go againe to make warre in CYPRVS, and in ÆGYPT, becauſe he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the warres of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the ſpoiles of thoſe their naturall borne enemies. But when all things were in readineſſe to depart, and the army preſt to ſhip and ſaile away: Cimon dreaming in the night had this viſion. It ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw a bitch angrie with him, and barking earneſtly at him, and that in the middeſt of her barking, ſhe ſpake with a mans voyce, and ſaid vnto him:

Cimon baniſhed for ten yeares.

This

This vision being very hard to interpret, Astyphilus borne in the citie of POSIDONIA, a man expert in such coniectures, and Cimons familiar friend, told him that this vision did betoken his death, expounding it in this sort. The dogge commonly is an enemie to him he barketh at. Againe, nothing gladdeth our enemie more, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voyce with the barking of a bitch, signifieth nothing else, but an enemie of the MEDES: because the armie of the MEDES is mingled with the barbarous people and the GRECIANS together. Besides this vision, as he did sacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Priest opening the beast after it was sacrificed, about the bloud that fell to the ground, there assembled a swarme of Ants, which caried the congealed bloud off from the ground by litle and litle, and laid it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the last spyed it by chaunce, and as he was looking on them to marke what they did, the minister of the sacrifice brought the beasts liuer that was sacrificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this they iudged for a very ill token. Notwithstanding, hauing all things readie for preparation of this iourney, so as he could not well go backe, he launched into the sea, and hoisted saile, and sending threescore of his gallies into ÆGYPT, sayled with the rest vpon the coast of PAMPHYLIA: where he wan a battell by sea of the king of PERSIA, ouercomming the gallies of the PHOENICIANS and the CILICIANS, and cõquered all the cities therabouts, making the way very opẽ to enter into ÆGYPT. For he had no small thoughts in his mind, but reached to high enterprises, & determined vtterly to destroy the whole Empire of the mightie king of PERSIA, and specially for that he vnderstood Themistocles was in maruellous credite and reputation amongst the barbarous people, because he had promised the king of PERSIA to leade his armie for him, and to do him notable seruice whensoeuer he should haue occasion to warre with the GRECIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cause that made Themistocles poison himselfe, because he despaired that he could not performe that seruice against GRECE which he had promised: assuring himselfe that it was no easie matter to vanquish Cimons courage and good fortune, who lay at that time with his armie all alongst the Ile of CYPRVS, promising himselfe great matters at that instant. But in the meane season, Cimon sent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iupiter Ammon, to aske him some secret question: for no man euer knew neither thẽ nor since, for what cause he had sent them thither, neither did they also bring backe any answer. For they were no sooner come thither, but the oracle commaunded them straight to returne: saying vnto them, that Cimon was then comming to him. So Cimons men receiuing this answer, left the oracle, and tooke their iourney backe to the seawards. Now when they were come againe to the GRECIANS campe, which at that present lay in ÆGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this world: and reckening the daies since his death, with the instant of their answer receiued from the oracle, that Cimon was then comming vnto him: they knew straight that darkly he had signified his death vnto them: and that, at that very time he was with the gods. He dyed at the siege of the citie of CITIVM in CYPRVS, as some report, or else of a hurt he receiued at a skirmish, as other hold opinion. When he dyed, he commannded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their countrey againe, and in no case to publish his death: which commaundement was so wisely and cunningly handled, that they all came home safe, and not an enemie, nor any of their confederates that once vnderstood any thing of it. So was the armie of the GRECIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though himselfe was dead, the space of thirty daies, as Phanodemus writeth. But after his death, there was no GRECIAN Captaine that did any notable thing worthie of fame against the barbarous people, because the Oratours and gouernours of the chiefest cities of GRECE stirred them vp one against another, and there was no man that would once steppe in as a mediatour to make peace betweene them. And thus the GRECIANS now did one destroy and spoile another by ciuill warre amongst themselues: which happily gaue the king of PERSIA leysure and time to restore himselfe againe, and contrarily was cause of such vtter ruine and destruction of the whole power and force of GRECE, as no tonng can well expresse. Indeede a long time after, king Agesilaus came with an armie of the GRECIANS into ASIA, and beganne a small warre against the Lieutenants of the king of PERSIAES gouernours of the lower countreys of ASIA: but before he could do any notable exploit, he was called home againe by occasion of new troubles and ciuill wars rising among the GRECIANS, and compelled to returne into his countrey, leauing the treasurers of the king of PERSIA, raising of subsidues and taxes vpon the cities of the GRECIANS in ASIA, although they were confede-

The tombes which they call vnto this preſent day Cimonia, do witneſſe that his aſhes and bones were brought vnto ATHENS. Neuertheleſſe, they of the citie of CITIVM do honour a certaine tombe, which they ſay is Cimons tombe: becauſe that in a great dearth and barrenneſſe of the earth, they had an oracle that commaunded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Oratour Nauſicrates writeth it, but to honour and reuerence him as a god. Such was the life of this GRECIAN Captaine.

The end of Cimons life.

THE LIFE OF Lucius Lucullus.

AS for Lucullus, his grandfather was a Conſull, and ſo was Metellus (ſurnamed Numidicus, becauſe of his conqueſt of NVMIDIA) his vncle by the mothers ſide. His father notwithſtanding was conuict of fellonie, for robbing the treaſure of the ſtate whileſt he was officer: and Cæcilia his mother was reported to haue led an vnchaſt life. But for Lucullus ſelfe, before he bare office, or rule in matters of ſtate, the firſt thing he touched and tooke in hand for the cauſe of his countrey, was the accuſation of Seruilius the ſoothſayer (who before had accuſed his father) for that he alſo had dealt falſely in his office, and deceiued the commonwealth. And this the ROMAINES thought very well handled of him, inſomuch as a pretie while after there was no other talke in ROME but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valiant act done by him. For otherwiſe, though priuatly they had no iuſt occaſion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuſe the wicked, and it pleaſed them as much to ſee the young men put law-breakers in ſute, as to ſee a notable good courſe of a dogge at a hare. Howbeit there followed ſuch ſtirre and banding vpon this ſute, that ſome were very ſore hurt, and other ſlaine in the market place: but in fine, Seruilius was cleared and quite diſmiſſed. Lucullus was very eloquent, well ſpoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latine tongue: in ſomuch as Sylla dedicated vnto him the Commentaries of all his doings which himſelfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole hiſtorie thereof, and couch it more eloquently together in writing. For he had not onely a readie toung to vtter that he would ſpeake, and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be ſeene to do, hauing matters of ſute or open audience.

But afterwards also when ye take them out of their common practise and pleadings:

Then are they grauell straight, withouten grace or skill:

For Lucullus had studied humanitie from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberall sciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refresh his wit (after great troubles) he fell to the studie of Philosophie, which quickened the contemplatiue part of his soule, and mortified, or at the least betimes bridled the ambitious and actiue part, specially after the dissention betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is said: that when he was a yong man, he layed a great wager with Hortensius the Oratour, and Sisenna the historiographer (in ieast as it were at the first, but afterwards it fell to good earnest) that he would write the breuiary of the MARSIAN warres in verse or prose, in the Latine or Greeke toung, which soeuer fell to his lot: and I thinke his hap was to do it in prose in the Greeke toung, because we find a litle Greeke storie extant of the warres of the ROMAINES against the MARSIANS. He dearely loued his brother M. Lucullus, as appeared by many manifest proofes: but the chiefest and most noted proofe among the ROMAINES was this. Himselfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet for all that would neuer sue to beare office in the commonwealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwaies till he should be chosen, and let his owne time passe ouer. This great curtesie to his brother so wanne the peoples hearts, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Ædilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his sake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIAN swars, wherin he did many wise and valiant deedes. The cause notwithstanding that moued Sylla to make choice of him, was rather for his constancie, and good courteous nature, then for any other respect. For when Sylla had once won him, he euer after employed him continually in his most waightie causes: as in a commission specially, he gaue him to coine mony. For indeed part of the money that Sylla spent in the warres against king Mithridates, was coyned by Lucullus cõmandement within the countrey of PELOPONNESVS: whereupon they were called Lucullian peeces, and were currant a long time amongst the souldiers, to buy such things as they stood in neede of, and neuer refused by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS the stronger by land, but the weaker by sea, so as his enemies cut off his victuals from him: sent Lucullus into ÆGYPT and LYBIA to bring him such ships as he found in those parts. It was in the deepe of winter, and yet he spared not to saile with three brigantines of GRECE, and as many galliots of the RHODIANS, putting himselfe not onely to the danger of the sea in so long a voyage, but of his enemies in like maner: who knowing themselues to be the stronger, went sailing euery where with a great nauie. But for all these dangers, he first arriued in the Ile of CRETA, and wan their good wils. From thence went to the citie of CYRENE, where he found the inhabitants turmoyled with ciuill wars, and continuall oppressions of tyrants: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them lawes to establish gouernment amongst them, putting them in remẽbrance of Platoes words spoken to their auncestors in old time, in the spirit of a prophecie. For when they prayed Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them some forme of gouernment for their commonwealth, he made them answer: It was a hard thing to giue lawes to so rich and fortunate people as they were. For to say truly, as nothing is harder to be ruled, thẽ a rich man: so contrarily, nothing readier to receiue councell and gouernment, then a man in aduersitie. This lesson framed the CYRENIANS at that time to be more ciuill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coasted towards ÆGYPT, where he lost the more part of his shippes by pyrates: but for his owne person, scaping their hands, he was very honorably receiued in the citie of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kings armie came to meete him at sea, gallantly trimmed and appointed: as they were wont to welcome home the king when he returned from any voyage by sea: and king Ptolomie himselfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honourable entertainment as he possible could. For amongst other honours that he did him, he lodged him in his Court, and defrayed his ordinarie diet, where neuer straunge Captaine was lodged before: and did not onely spend the ordinarie allowance in feasting of him which he vsed vnto others, but commaunded foure times as much prouision more to be made as he had before. Notwithstanding, Lucullus tooke no more then was reasonable for his person: nor yet would he receiue any maner of gift, although the king had sent him presents to the value of foureſcore talents. And which more is, would not ſo much as go ſee the citie of MEMPHIS, nor any other of the famous monuments and wonderfull ſights in ÆGYPT, ſaying: that it was for a man that trauelled vp and downe for his pleaſure, and had leyſure withall, to ſee ſuch things, but not for him that had left his Captaine in the field, at the ſiege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptolomie would in no caſe fall in friendſhip with Sylla, fearing leaſt he ſhould thereby put himſelfe into warres: but gaue him men and ſhips to bring him into CYPRVS. And as he was readie to imbarke, the king bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich Emerald ſet in gold, which Lucullus at the firſt refuſed, vntill the king ſhewed him his picture grauen in it: and then he accepted the gift, fearing leſt the vtter refuſall might cauſe the king thinke he went away diſcontented, and ſhould perhaps therefore lay an ambuſh by ſea for him. Thus hauing gotten a certaine number of ſhips together of the port townes thereabouts, ouer and beſides ſuch as the pyrates and ſea-rouers had hidden, being part of their ſpoiles, and beſtowed with their receitors, went on with them into CYPRVS, where he vnderſtood that his enemies lay cloſe in certaine creekes vnder the foreland, watching to boord him as he ſailed by. Whereupon he vnrigged and beſtowed his ſhips in docks, and ſent word to all the port townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him victuals and other neceſſarie munition to be in readineſſe againſt the Spring. But in the meane while, when he ſaw time conuenient, he put his whole fleete againe to the ſea with all poſſible ſpeede, went himſelfe away, and in the day time caried a lowe ſaile, but in the night packt on all the cloath he could for life: ſo that by this craftie fetch, he wanne RHODES, and loſt not one ſhip. The RHODIANS they alſo furniſhed him with ſhips: and beſides them, he ſo perſwaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitants of the Ile of CO, that they forſooke king Mithridates, and went to make warres with him againſt them of the Ile of SAMOS. But Lucullus himſelf alone draue king Mithridates men out of CHIO, reſtored the COLOPHONIANS againe to liberty, and tooke Epigonus the tyrant priſoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forſake the citie of PERGAMVS, and to retire to the citie PITANE, within the which Fimbria kept him beſieged very ſtraightly by land. Wherefore Mithridates hauing the ſea open vpon him, ſent for his force and nauie out of all parts, not daring to hazard battell againſt Fimbria, who was very valiant, of a venturous nature, and at that time moreouer was himſelfe a conquerour. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates meant, and hauing no power by ſea of his owne, ſent ſtraight to Lucullus to requeſt him to come with his nauie into thoſe parts to his aide, for the ouercomming of this king, the greateſt and moſt cruell enemie that euer the ROMAINE people had. Becauſe that ſo notable a prey, which they followed with ſuch danger and trouble, ſhould not eſcape the ROMAINES, while they had him in their hands, and was come himſelfe within their daunger: and that therefore he ſhould ſo much the more hearken vnto it, becauſe that if it fortuned Mithridates to be taken, no man ſhould win more honour and glory by his taking, then he that had ſtopped his paſſage, and laid hands on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby ſhould the praiſe of this noble victorie runne in equalitie betweene them both: the one that had driuen him from land, and the other that had ſtopped his paſſage by ſea. And furthermore, that the ROMAINES would nothing regard all the famous battels and victories of Sylla in GREECE, which he had wonne before the cities of CHOERONEA and ORCHOMENE: in compariſon of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbriaes meſſage ſent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelihood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would haue beleeued him at that time (and haue gone thither with his ſhips to ſtop the hauens mouth of the citie, in the which Mithridates was beſieged, conſidering alſo that he was ſo neare at hand) this warre had taken end there, and the world beſides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But whether Lucullus preferred the conſideration and reſpect he had vnto Sylla, whoſe Lieutenant he was, before all other due regard of priuate or common benefite: or that he deteſted and abhorred Fimbria as a curſed perſon, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his hands in the bloud of his Captaine: or elſe, that it was through the ſecret prouidence and permiſſion of the gods, that he ſpared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reſerued as a worthie enemie, againſt whom he might afterwards ſhew his valure. Howſoeuer it was, it ſo fell out that he hearkened not vnto Fimbriaes meſſage, but gaue Mithridates time and leyſure to flie, and finally to ſcorne all Fimbriaes force and power. But Lucullus ſelfe alone afterwards

afterwards ouercame the kings army by sea, once neare vnto the head of Lectum, which is on the coast of TROADE: and another time neare vnto the Ile of TENEDOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenant by sea, lay in waite for him with a farre greater number of shippes then he had. And yet so soone as Lucullus had descried him, he sailed before all his nauie being Admirall, in a galley of RHODES, at fiue owers to a banke, whereof one Demagoras was maister, a man well affected to the seruice of the ROMAINES, and very skilfull in battell by sea. And when Neoptolemus on the other side rowed against him with great force, commanding his pylot that he should so order his galley, that he might stemme him right in the prow: Demagorus fearing the full meeting of the kings galley which was very strong and heauie, and furthermore well armed with points and spurres of brasse before, durst not encounter her with his prowe, but nimbly made his galley to wind about, and turned his poupe towards him. Whereby the galley being low at the end, receiued the blowe without hurt, considering that they hit vpon the dead works, and those parts which are alwaies aboue water. In the meane time Lucullus other ships were come, who commaunding his maister to turne the beakehead of his galley forward, did many famous actes: so that he made his enemies flie, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to seeke out Sylla euen as he was readie to passe ouer the seas, about CHERRONESVS: holpe him to waft his armie, and so passed him ouer with safetie. Afterwards when peace was concluded, and that king Mithridates was come into his realme and countries againe, which lye vpon the sea Maior, Sylla condemned the prouince of ASIA to pay the summe of twentie thousand talents for a fine, by reason of their rebellion. And for leauying of this fine, he left Lucullus there with commission to coine money: which was a great comfort and hearts ease vnto the cities of ASIA, considering the extremitie that Sylla had vsed towards them. For in so grieuous and odious a commission vnto them all, as that was: Lucullus did not onely behaue himselfe vprightly and iustly, but also very fauourably and courteously. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were openly in armes against him, he was very willing they should know their fault, and that for satisfaction of the offence they had committed taking Marius part, they should suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continue in their naughtinesse, he went against them, & hauing ouercome them in battell, compelled them to keepe within their wals, and layd siege vnto their city, where he vsed this pollicie with them. At noone daies he lanched into the sea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and sailed towards the citie of ELEA: howbeit in the night time secretly returned backe, and making no noise, layd an ambush neare vnto the citie. The MITYLENIANS mistrusting nothing, went out the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watch or ward, to spoile the campe of the ROMAINES, supposing euery man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming sodainly vpon them, tooke a great number prisoners, slue about fiue hundred such as resisted, and wanne sixe thousand slaues, with an infinite quantitie of other spoile. Now did the gods happily preserue Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miseries and troubles which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIE suffer, euen then when he was occupied in the wars of ASIA: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credit and fauour with Sylla, as any of his friends about him. For as we haue said before, he dedicated his Commentaries vnto him, for the goodwill he bare him, and by his last will and testament appointed him tutor vnto his son, leauing Pompey out: which seemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwards betweene them, because they were both young men, and vehemently desirous of honour. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Consull with Marcus Cotta, about the three score Olympiade: and then they began to reuiue the matter again, that it was very needfull to make wars against Mithridates, and specially Marcus Cotta, who gaue out that it was not ended, but only slept for a while. Wherfore, when the Consuls came to draw lots what prouinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was maruellous sory that the prouince of GAVLE, lying betweene the Alpes and ITALY, fell to his lot: because he thought in no country wherein any great exploits were to be done: & againe, the glory of Pompey grieued him greatly, whose honor daily increased by the famous battels he wan in SPAINE. So that it was most certaine, that so soone as Pompey had ended the wars there, they would haue chosen him generall in the wars against Mithridates. Wherfore, when Pompey sent to ROME in earnest maner, to require money to make pay to his souldiers, writing to the Senate, that if they did not send him money the sooner, he would leaue both Sertorius and SPAINE behind him, and bring his army backe into ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to haue it quickly ſent him, fearing leaſt he ſhould returne into ITALIE vpon any occaſion, while he was Conſull. For he thought that if he returned againe to ROME with ſo great an armie, he would eaſily do what him luſt: and the rather, becauſe that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the ſway and rule at ROME, becauſe he ſpake and did all that pleaſed the common people, being a vicious liuer, and diſſolutely giuen, for which cauſe Lucullus hated him. But there was another common Oratour among the people called Lucius Quintius, and he would haue had all Syllaes doings reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole ſtate of the commonwealth, and to turmoile the citie of ROME againe with ciuill diſſention, which then liued quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall apart to perſwade him, and openly reproued him with ſuch words, that he was diſſwaded from his euil purpoſe, and by reaſon ruled his raſh ambition, handling it both wiſely and as cunningly as he could poſſible (for the ſafetie of the commonwealth) becauſe it was the beginning of a diſeaſe, from whence infinite troubles were like to growe. While theſe things were thus in hand, newes came that Octauius the Gouernour of CILICIA was dead. Straight wherupon many put forward themſelues to ſue for this charge, and to court Cethegus, as the only man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus he made no great reckening of the gouernment of CILICIA in reſpect of the country, but becauſe CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it, and perſwading himſelfe that if he could obtaine the gouernment thereof, they would giue none other (but himſelfe) the authoritie to make wars with Mithridates: he determined to procure all the meanes he could, that none ſhould haue it but himſelfe. And hauing proued ſundry waies, was compelled in the end againſt his owne nature, to practiſe a meane neither comely nor honeſt, and yet the readieſt way he could poſſibly deuiſe to obtaine his deſire. There was a woman in ROME at that time called Præcia, very famous for her paſſing beautie, and alſo for her pleaſant grace in talke and diſcourſe, howbeit otherwiſe vnchaſt after curtiſan maner. But becauſe ſhe employed the credit and fauor of them that frequented her company, to the benefit and ſeruice of the commonwealth, and of them that loued her: ſhe wanne the report (beſides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauour and further any good enterpriſe, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after ſhe had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the commonwealth at his pleaſure) and brought him to be ſo farre in fancie with her, that he could not be out of her ſight: then had ſhe all the whole power and authoritie of ROME in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Præcia would will him to. Thus Lucullus ſought to come in fauour with her, ſending her many preſents, and vſing all other curteſies he could offer vnto her: beſides that it ſeemed a great reward for ſo proud and ambitious a woman as ſhe, to be ſued vnto by ſuch a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes came to haue Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all aſſemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA: who after it was once granted him, had then no need of the help neither of Præcia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholly of themſelues with one conſent did grant him the charge to make warre with Mithridates, becauſe he knew better how to ouercome him, then any other Captaine, and becauſe that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAINE, and Metellus alſo growne too old, both which two were the only men that could deſeruedly haue contended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Conſull, made ſuch ſute to the Senate, that they ſent him alſo with an armie by ſea, to keepe the coaſts of PROPONTIDE, and to defend the country of BITHYNIA. Thus Lucullus hauing this commiſſion, went into ASIA with one legion onely, the which he leuied anew at ROME: and when he was come thither, he tooke the reſt of the ſtrength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through couetouſneſſe and delicacy of the country. For amongſt others, were the bands which they called the Fimbrian bands, men giuen ouer to ſelfe-will, and very ill to be ruled by martiall diſcipline, becauſe they had liued a long time at their owne libertie, without all obedience to any man. They were thoſe ſelfe ſouldiers that together with Fimbria ſlue their generall Flaccus, Conſul of the ROMAINE people, and that afterwards betrayed Fimbria him ſelfe, and forſooke him, leauing him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitours, and wicked people, howbeit otherwiſe very valiant, well trained, and painefull ſouldiers. Notwithſtanding, Lucullus in ſhort time bridled their boldneſſe meetly well, and reformed the others alſo, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of

of a good Captaine and Generall meant, that knew how to commaund: but were vſed to flattering leaders, that commaunded the ſouldiers no more then they themſelues liked of. Now concerning the ſtate of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bold (as theſe flouriſhing Sophiſters commonly are) vndertaking warre againſt the ROMAINES, with a vaine vnprofitable armie, but paſſing freſh and ſumptuous to the eye: after he was once foiled and ouercome, with no leſſe ſhame then loſſe, when he came to make his ſecond warre, he cut off all ſuperfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a conuenient furniture to ſerue for warres at all aſſayes. For he put by the confuſed multitude of ſundrie nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous people in ſo many ſundrie tongues, and clearely baniſht alſo the rich grauen armours with goldſmiths worke, and ſet with precious ſtones, as things that more enriched the enemies that wan them, then gaue ſtrength or courage to thoſe that ware them. And contrariwiſe, cauſed long ſtiffe ſwords to be made after the ROMAINE faſhion, and great heauy ſhields, and brought to the field a maruellous number of horſe, more ready for ſeruice, then rich in furniture. Then he ioyned ſixeſcore thouſand footemen together, appointed and ſet in order like vnto the battell of the ROMAINES, with ſixteene thouſand horſe of ſeruice, beſides thoſe that drew his armed carts with ſithes about, which were in all to the number of a hundred. And beſides all this land preparation, he brought alſo a great number of ſhips and galleys together, which were not decked with goodly golden pauilions, as at the firſt, neither with ſtoues nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiouſly hanged for Ladies and Gentlemomen: but furniſhed full of armour, artillerie, and ſlings, and with money alſo to pay the ſouldiers. With all this armie and preparation, he went firſt to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him verie gladly, and not thoſe onely, but all the other cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miſeries and diſeaſes, by the cruelties of the ROMAINE farmers and vſurers, who raiſing taxes and impoſts vpon them, made them abide vntollerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the Harpyæ, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reaſonable by the perſwaſions he vſed vnto them, and qualified a litle the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being buſie about theſe matters, Marcus Cotta the other Conſull (and his companion) ſuppoſing that the abſence of Lucullus was a fit occaſion offered him to do notable ſeruice, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes brought him from ſundrie places, that Lucullus was with his armie in PHRYGIA, and comming towards him: yet notwithſtanding, imagining that he had the honour of triumph aſſured alreadie in his hands, and becauſe Lucullus ſhould be no partaker of it, he aduanced forwards to giue battell. But Mithridates ouercame him both by ſea and land: ſo that Cotta by ſea loſt three ſcore of his ſhips with all the men in them, foure thouſand footemen by land, and was after with ſhame ſhut vp and beſieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopeleſſe to eſcape, but by Lucullus onely aide and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were verie earneſt with him to leaue Cotta, and to go further, aſſuring him that he ſhould find the Realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: ſo that he might eaſily be Lord of the whole. And theſe were the words of the ſouldiers that ſpited Cotta, becauſe his fooliſh raſhneſſe and fond imagination had not onely brought thoſe men to the ſhambles to be ſlaine and caſt away, whom he had the leading of: but had let them alſo, that they could not ouercome him, and end this warre without blowes, for that they were driuen to go to his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an oration vnto them, anſwered, that he had rather ſaue the life of one ROMAINE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when Archelaus (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenant in BOEOTIA in the firſt warres againſt Sylla, and now in the ſecond warre tooke part with the ROMAINES) aſſured him that ſo ſoone as they ſaw him in the Realme of PONTVS, they would all riſe againſt Mithridates, and yeeld themſelues vnto him: Lucullus aunſwered him thus, that he would not ſhew himſelfe more fearfull, then the good hunters which neuer ſuffer the beaſt to recouer his denne. And when he had ſo ſayd, he marched with his armie towards Mithridates, hauing in all his campe thirthie thouſand footemen, and two thouſand fiue hundred horſe. When he came ſo neare vnto his enemies, that he might eaſily at eye diſcerne all their hoſt, he wondered at the great multitude of ſouldiers that were in their campe, and was in mind to giue battell, ſuppoſing

yet that the better way was to prolong time, and draw these warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMAINE captaine, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of souldiers, came forwards, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men also in a readinesse to fight: but euen as both battels were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the sudden, without any shew of chaunge of weather discerned before, and they plainely saw a great flake of fire fall betweene both armies, in forme and shape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten siluer. This celestiall signe put both the armies in such a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroke: and this wonderfull sight fortuned (as they say) in a place of PHRYGIA, called Otryes. Now Lucullus afterwards considering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor prouision so great in the world, that could suffice to victuall so many thousands of people as Mithridates had in his campe any long time together, hauing his enemies campe so lying before them: willed that one of the prisoners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabbin, then what corne he had left in their cabbin. And when the prisoner had answered to all his demands, he returned him to prison, and sent for another: then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their corne, and other proportion of victuals they had, with the number of men the same should maintaine: he found that all would be spent in three or foure dayes at the vttermost. Whereupon he relied on his first determination, to delay time without hazard of battell. So he caused a maruellous deale of wheat to be brought into his campe out of euerie quarter, that the same being throughly victualled, he might easily tary the occasion which his enemies necessitie should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, sought which way he might take the citie of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowne before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had lost three thousand men, and ten of their ships. And because that Lucullus should not vnderstand of his enterprise, Mithridates stale away by night after supper, taking the oportunitie of a darke rainie night, and marched thitherwards with such speed, that he was before the citie of GYZICVS by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddesse Adrastia standeth, which is the goddesse of fatall destinie. Lucullus receiuing intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him straight wayes step by step, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in disorder, lodged his armie in a village called THRACIA, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiously seated also vpon the high wayes, and throughfare of the neighbours thereabouts, by the which they must come of necessitie to victuall Mithridates campe. Wherefore Lucullus wisely foreseeing what would follow, would not keepe his purpose secret from his souldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his campe, called them to counsell, and there making an oration vnto them, told them openly by manifest demonstration of assured hope, that ere many dayes passed, he would giue victorie into their hands, and that without losse of one drop of bloud. In the meane season, Mithridates enuironed the GRECIANS round about by land, hauing deuided his armie into ten campes, and stopped vp the mouth of the arme of the sea, which deuideth the citie from firme land, with his ships from one side to another. Now the CYZICENIANS were valiant men, and determined to abide all extremitie for the ROMAINES sakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe stood in such a place, where they might easily discerne it from the city. But Mithridates souldiers deceiued them, for shewing them the ROMAINES campe that lay aboue hard by them, sayd vnto them: do ye see yonder campe there? They are the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, whom Tigranes hath sent to the aide of Mithridates. These words put the CYZICENIANS in a maruellous feare, seeing such a multitude of enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus sent vnto them, but they would not beleeue him at the first, taking it for a tale, onely to make them to be of good courage, and valiantly abide the furie of the siege: vntill such time as a litle boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had taken him prisoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whom they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they iested to aske that question of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the ROMAINES campe with his finger: then they beleeued it indeed, and were couragious couragious againe. There is a lake neare vnto the city of CYZICVS called Daſcylitide, and it is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greateſt of them, put it in a cart, and ſo caried it to the ſea, and there put as many ſouldiers in her as ſhe could well cary, who by night entred into the city, the skoute of the enemies neuer deſcrying them. This ſmall ſupplie did maruellouſly comfort the beſieged CYZICENIANS: and it ſeemeth that the gods, delighting to ſee their noble courage, would further increaſe and aſſure the ſame, by many manifeſt tokens which they ſent from heauen, and ſpecially by one, which was this. The day of the feaſt of Proſerpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a blacke cow to offer in ſolemne ſacrifice, as their ancient ceremonies required: ſo they made one of paſte, and brought it hard vnto the altar. Now, the cow that was vowed to this ſacrifice, and which they reared vp of purpoſe to ſerue for that day, was feeding amongſt the heard of the city in the fields, on the other ſide of the arme of the ſea. But that day ſhe kept alone from all the reſt of the heard, and ſwam ouer the arme of the ſea, and came into the citie: where ſhe went of her ſelfe vnto the place of the ſacrifice. Furthermore, the goddeſſe Proſerpina her ſelfe appeared vnto Ariſtagorax in his dreame, Secretary of the ſtate and common wealth of the CYZICENIANS, and ſayd vnto him: I am come hither to bring the flute of LYBIA againſt the trumpet of PONT, and therefore tell the citizens from me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the Secretarie had told them this viſion, the CYZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddeſſes words, and could not imagine what they meant. Howbeit at the breake of day there aroſe a great whiſtling wind, that made the ſea billowes riſe very high: and the kings engines of battery which were brought to the walles of the citie to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and deuiſed) began to make ſuch a noiſe, and to breake in peeces by the roughneſſe of the wind, that a man might eaſily iudge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one inſtant, the South wind was become ſo vehement bigge, that in a moment it burſt all theſe engines aſunder, and ſpecially a tower of wood of the height of a hundred cubits, which the wind ſhooke ſo vehemently, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is ſayd furthermore, that in the citie of ILIVM the goddeſſe Minerua appeared vnto diuerſe in their ſleepe, all in a ſweat, and ſhewing part of her vaile torne, as if ſhe had bene newly returned from giuing aide vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of ILIVM haue a pillar yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memorie. Now was Mithridates maruellous ſorie for the breaking and loſſe of his engines, by meanes whereof, the CYZICENIANS had eſcaped the danger of aſſault, and of the ſiege in like manner, vntill he truly vnderſtood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreame dearth to be ſuch, as the ſouldiers were compelled to eate mans fleſh, which (his Captaines abuſing him) had for a time kept ſecret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth indeed, he left off his vaine ambition obſtinately to continue ſiege: knowing well that Lucullus made not wars with threats and brauery, but (as the common prouerbe ſayth) leapt on his belly with both his feete, that is to ſay, he did what he could poſſible to cut off all the victuals from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to aſſault a caſtell that troubled him very neare vnto his campe, Mithridates becauſe he would not looſe that oportunitie, ſent the moſt part of his horſemen to get victuals in BITHYNIA, with all the carts, and beaſts of cariage, and his moſt vnprofitable footemen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the ſelfe ſame night vnto his campe, and the next morning betimes being in the winter ſeaſon, followed them by the tracke with ten enſignes of footemen onely, and all his horſemen. But the ſnow was ſo deepe, the cold ſo terrible ſharpe, and the weather ſo rough, that many of his ſouldiers not being able to abide it, died by the way. For all that, he marched on ſtill, till he ouertooke his enemies about the riuer of Rindacus, where he gaue them ſuch an ouerthrow, that the very women came out of the citie of APOLLONIA, and went to ſteale the victuals they had loden, and to ſtrip the dead, which were a maruellous great number, as a man may iudge in ſuch a caſe: and neuertheleſſe there were taken ſixe thouſand horſe of ſeruice, an infinite number of beaſts for cariage, and fifteene thouſand men beſides, all which ſpoile he brought to his campe, and paſſed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the hiſtoriographer Saluſt, who writing of this matter ſaith, that here was the firſt time that euer the ROMAINES ſaw any camels. Me thinkes it ſtraunge how he ſhould thinke ſo, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the great vnder Scipio, and the others that a litle before had fought againſt Archelaus, neare vnto

the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHÆRONEA, ſhould not haue ſeene camels. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, reſolued with himſelfe immediatly to flie, with all the ſpeed he could poſſibly make: and to entertaine and ſtay Lucullus for a time behind him, he determined to ſend Ariſtonicus his Admirall with his armie by ſea, into the ſea of GRECE. But as Ariſtonicus was ready to hoiſe ſaile, his owne men betrayed him, and deliuered him into the hands of Lucullus, with ten thouſand crownes which he caried with him, to corrupt (if he could) part of the ROMAINES army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by ſea, leauing the reſt of his army by land in the hands of his captaines, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the riuer of Granicus, where he ſet vpon them, & after he had ſlaine twentie thouſand of them, tooke an infinite number priſoners. And they ſay there died in that wars, what ſouldiers, what ſlaues, what lackeis, and other ſtragglers that followed the campe, about the number of three hundred thouſand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the citie of CYZICVS, where after he had ſpent ſome dayes, enioying the glorie due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to viſite the coaſt of HELLESPONT, to get ſhips together, and to prepare an army by ſea. And paſſing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he ſlept in the night, it ſeemed to him he ſaw the goddeſſe appeare before him, which ſayd theſe verſes vnto him:

Herewith he roſe incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, told them the viſion he had in his dreame: and about that verie time alſo there came ſome vnto him from the citie of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene galleys of king Mithridates, hauing fiue oares to euery bancke, that were ſeene in the hauen of the ACHAIANS, and that ſailed towards the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke ſhip ſtraight, went and tooke them euery one: for at his firſt comming he ſlue the captaine called Iſidorus, and went afterwards to the other mariners that lay at anker on the coaſt ſide, who ſeeing him come, drew towards land with their ſhips, in purpoſe to runne them all a ſhore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus ſouldiers, becauſe they could not compaſſe them in behind, and for that alſo the place where they had laied their ſhips was ſuch, as there was no way to force them before, their galleys floting in the ſea as they did, and the others being faſtned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much ado all this notwithſtanding, found meanes in the end to put aſhore certaine of the beſt ſouldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might eaſily land. Theſe ſouldiers went ſtraight and ſet vpon the enemies behind, ſlue ſome of them euen at their firſt comming, and compelled the reſt to cut aſunder the cables that faſtned the galleys to the bankes. But when they thought to flie from land, the galleys bruſed and brake one another: and that worſt of all was, ranne vpon the points and ſpurs of Lucullus galleys: and ſo many of them as ſtood aboue hatches were ſlaine, the reſt taken priſoners: amongſt whom, Marius the ROMAINE captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had ſent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates. He had but one eye, and Lucullus had commaunded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye, becauſe Marius ſhould not die ſo happie a death, as to be ſlaine, but that he ſhould die ſome ſhamefull death, and be condemned by order of law. That done, Lucullus went in perſon with all the ſpeed he could poſſible to follow Mithridates, hoping to find him yet vpon the coaſt of BITHYNIA, where Voconius ſhould haue ſtayed him: for he had ſent this Voconius before with a certaine number of ſhips vnto the citie of NICOMEDIA, to ſtop him from flying. But he taried ſo long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA ſacrificing to the gods of the ſame, and to be receiued into the fraternity of their religion, that he could neuer after come neare Mithridates to ſtop him from flying: hauing alreadie made ſaile with all the whole fleete, and haſting with all poſſible ſpeed to recouer the Realme of PONTVS, before Lucullus could returne from whence he went. But in ſailing thitherwards, he met with ſuch a terrible ſtorme, that caried part of his ſhips ſo away, that they ranne ſtraggling to ſeeke their fortune, and part of them ſplitted and drowned outright: ſo that all the coaſts and riuers thereabouts, for many dayes after, were full of dead bodies and ſhipwrackes caſt aſhore by waues of the ſea. Now for Mithridates owne perſon, he was in a ſhip of great burthen, the which for her greatneſſe could not ſaile neare the ſhore, nor recouer land, ſhe was alſo verie euill to be guided by the pilots in ſo boiſterous a ſtorme: the mariners beſides were put out of all their skill and

knowledge: and the ſhip her ſelfe moreouer tooke in ſuch ſtore of water, and was ſo heauily charged withall, that they durſt no more put her out to the ſea. By reaſon whereof Mithridates was compelled to go aboord a litle pinnaſe of pyrates, and to put himſelfe and his life into their hands, by whoſe helpe in the end (beyond all expectation, but not without great daunger) he got to land, and recouered the citie of HERACLEA in the Realme of PONTVS. Now here is to be noted, that the great brauerie Lucullus ſhewed vnto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauour of the gods. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of theſe warres, to prepare a great nauie of ſhips, and therewithall had giuen order alſo for three thouſand talents: Lucullus ſtayed them by letters, that they ſhould not do it, writing brauely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be ſtrong inough to driue Mithridates from the ſea, with the onely ſhips he would borrow of their friends and confederates. And indeed, through the ſpeciall fauour of the gods, he brought it ſo to paſſe: for they ſay, that this terrible ſtorme that deſtroyed the armie of Mithridates was raiſed vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the Realme of PONTVS, becauſe they had deſtroyed her temple in the city of PRIAPOS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuerſe that counſelled Lucullus to deferre the reſt of this warre vntill another ſeaſon: but notwithſtanding all their perſwaſions, he went through the countrey of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to inuade the Realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the firſt beginning he lacked victuals, ſo that there were thirthy thouſand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried euery one of them a buſhell of wheate on their ſhoulders: howbeit entring farther into the country, and conquering the whole, there was ſuch exceeding plentie of all things, that an oxe was ſold in his campe but for a Drachma, and a ſlaue at foure times as much. And of all other ſpoile there was ſuch great ſtore, that either they made no reckoning of it, or elſe they made hauocke of it, becauſe there was no man to ſell it vnto, euery man hauing ſo much of his owne. For they ran ouer all the countrey vnto the city of THEMISYRA, and to the valleys that lay vpon the riuer of Thermodon, and ſtayed no where longer then they were a ſpoiling. Thereupon the ſouldiers began to murmur at Lucullus, becauſe he aſſured all the cities vpon compoſition, & neuer tooke any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich themſelues by ſpoile: and yet ſayd they, he would make vs now go farther, and leaue AMISVS a great rich citie which we might eaſily take by force, if it were but a litle ſtraightly beſieged, and leade vs into the deſerts of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALDÆIANS to fight againſt Mithridates. Lucullus paſſed ouer all theſe complaints, and made no reckoning of them, becauſe he would neuer haue thought that they would haue fallen into ſuch mutiny and furie, as afterwards they did: and contrarily excuſed himſelfe the more carefully to them that blamed and reproued him, for his long tarying vpon townes and villages that were not worth the reckoning, and ſuffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather a new force and army together at his pleaſure. For, ſayd he, that is the marke I ſhoot at, & that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I do, wiſhing nothing more, then that he might once againe make himſelfe ſtrong, and bring a ſecond armie to the field, that might embolden him to come eftſoones to fight with vs, and runne away no more. Do you not ſee, ſayd he, that at his backe he hath an infinit number of deſert countries, where it is vnpoſſible euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him alſo the mount Caucaſus, and many other vnpaſſable places, which are ſufficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings beſides that would flie battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a litle way from the country of the CABIRENIANS vnto the realme of ARMENIA, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whoſe power is ſo great, that he driueth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, and carieth whole townes and cities of GREECE vnto the Realme of MEDIA, and hath all SYRIA and PALESTINE in his hands, and hath ſlaine and rooted out the kings and ſucceſſours of the great Seleucus, and hath caried away their wiues and daughters priſoners by force. This great and mightie king is allied vnto Mithridates, for he maried Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when Mithridates ſhall come and intreate him to helpe him in his diſtreſſe, that Tigranes will refuſe him, but rather we muſt thinke certainely that he will make warres vpon vs in his defence. And thus, in making haſte to driue out Mithridates, we ſhall bring our ſelues into great danger, to prouoke a new enemy, euen Tigranes againſt vs, who of long time hath lurked for a iuſt occaſion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honeſter cauſe to take armes, then to defend and keepe a king his neighbour, and ſo neare a kinſeman, from vtter deſtruction, and

» one that is compelled to seeke vnto him for succour. What need we then to prouoke him to pro» cure it, and teach Mithridates (which he purposeth not) to whom he should repaire for aide, to » make warres against our selues: & pricke him forward, or to say better, put him with our owne » hands into the way to go seeke aide of Trigranes, which of himselfe he will neuer do (thinking
» it a dishonor vnto him) vnlesse we driue him to it for very necessity. Is it not better for vs to giue » him leisure and time, to gather a second force againe of himselfe, and his owne people, that we » might rather fight with the COLCHIANS, TIBARENIANS, CAPPADOCIANS, and with such other » people whom we haue so many times ouercome: then with the MEDES and ARMENIANS?
With this determination Lucullus taried a great while before the city of AMISVS, continuing this siege of purpose, without distressing them at all. Afterwards when winter was past, he left Murena there to continue the siege, and himselfe with the rest of his army went to meete Mithridates: who had planted his campe neare vnto the city of CABIRA, determining to tary the ROMAINES comming, hauing gathered together againe a new army of fortie thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen, in the which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he passed ouer the riuer of Lycus, and went and presented battell to the ROMAINES in the plaine field. There the horsemen skirmished, and the ROMAINES had the worse: for there was one Pomponius a ROMAINE taken, of great estimation, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if in sauing his life, and healing his wounds, he would become his seruant and friend. Straight replied Pomponius, With all my hart, quoth he, so that thou make peace with the ROMAINES: if not, I will euer be thine enemy. The king esteemed his courage much, and would do him no hurt. And as for Lucullus, he was afraid to come into the plaine, because his enemy was the stronger of horsemen: and he doubted also on the other side to take his way by the mountaine, because it was very high, vneasie to clime, and full of woods and forrests. But as he stood thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRECIANS by chance that were fled, and hidden in a caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promised Lucullus if he would beleeue and follow him, he would bring him into a sure strong place to lodge his campe, where was a castell aboue the city of CABIRA. Lucullus beleeued the old mans words, wherefore so soone as night came, he raised great fires in the campe, and went his way: and after they had passed certaine straight and dangerous wayes of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place where Artemidorus had promised to bring him. Now the enemies were marueilously amazed when day light came, to see him there ouer them, in a place where if he list to fight, he might come vpon them with aduantage: and if he liked not to stirre, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stood indifferent then to hazard battell, or not. But in the meane season, they say certaine of the kings campe by chaunce were a hunting the Hart. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them off by the way: and they began by this meanes one to charge another in such sort (reliefe growing stil on either side) as Mithridates men grew the stronger. But the ROMAINES seeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, were in such a rage, that they all ranne in a choler to Lucullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and giue them a signall to fight. Lucullus, because he would shew them by experience how much the presence and eye of a good wise captaine in time of need was worth: commanded them they should not once stirre, and he himselfe in person went downe into the valley, where he commaunded the first of his men he met withall flying, to stay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did easily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chase, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne fort. Afterwards vpon this returne againe to his campe, he set his souldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to shame them withall, which the ROMAINS are wont to vse in such a case: and that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelue foote long, being in their shirtes, all vntrussed, and their other companions present seeing them do it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DARDARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vpon the marishes of Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his person, valiant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudgement to do any great enterprise, as any that was in all the army, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainement in companie, knowing how to fashion himselfe with all men. This prince, being alwayes at strife with other Lords of the countrey, and contending who should haue the first place of honor and fauour about the king: went vnto Mithridates, and promised promiſed him that he would do him notable ſeruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus. The king was very glad of this promiſe, and praiſed him maruellouſly in ſecret: howbeit openly of purpoſe he did him many iniuries, becauſe he might haue ſome colour to counterfeit anger and diſpleaſure, and to giue way for him to go yeeld himſelfe vnto Lucullus, as he did. Lucullus was maruellous glad of him, becauſe he was one of the chiefeſt men of name in all his campe, and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediatly: in the which he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that Lucullus greatly eſteemed his wiſedome, and commended his diligence, in ſuch ſort that he did him this honour, to call him ſometimes vnto the councell, and make him ſit at his boord. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occaſion to execute his enterpriſe, he commaunded his footemen to be readie with his horſe out of the trenches of the campe: and at noone dayes when the ſouldiers tooke reſt, and ſlept here and there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to haue found no bodie there to keepe him from comming in, conſidering the familiarity Lucullus ſhewed him, ſaying alſo he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and ſure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if ſleepe that caſteth away ſo many other Captaines, had not then preſerued and ſaued Lucullus that ſlept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the doore of the tent, told him that he came in verie ill time, becauſe Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lacke of ſleepe, was but then newly layed downe to reſt. Olthacus whatſoeuer the other ſayd to him, would not be ſo aunſwered, but told him he would come in whether he would or not, for he muſt needs ſpeake with him in a matter of great importance. Menedemus anſwered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more neceſſarie, then the preſeruation of his maiſters life and health, who had need to take reſt: and with theſe words, he thruſt him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was afraid then, and withdrew himſelfe ſecretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horſe backe, and rode ſtraight to Mithridates campe without his purpoſe he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainely appeareth, that occaſion, and oportunitie of time, euen in great matters deliuereth meanes, to ſaue or deſtroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines giuen vnto the ſicke and diſeaſed perſons. Shortly after, Lucullus ſent one of his Captaines called Sornatius to get victuals, with ten enſignes of footemen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertiſed, ſent preſently at his taile one of his Captaines alſo, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and ſlue him with great ſlaughter of his men beſide. And afterwards Lucullus ſent another of his Lieutenants called Adrianus with a great company of ſouldiers, to get victuals into his campe more then he ſhould need. Mithridates did not let ſlip this occaſion, but ſent after him two of his Captaines alſo called Menemachus and Myron, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horſemen: all which were ſlaine, two onely excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which he ſought to ſalue as well as he could, ſaying that the loſſe was much leſſe then it was thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and raſhneſſe of his Lieutenants. But Adrianus at his returne, paſſed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maieſtie, carying a huge number of cartes loden with corne and ſpoiles he had wonne: which draue Mithridates ſelfe into ſo great a deſpaire, and all his people into ſuch a feare and trouble, that he preſently determined to remoue thence. Whereupon, the nobilitie and ſuch as had place of credit about him, began to ſend before, and ſecretly to conuey their ſtuffe out of the campe, but vtterly prohibiting others to do the ſame. The reſt of the ſoulders ſeeing the ſtoutneſſe of the kings minions, began to ſet vpon them with open force, not ſuffering them on the other ſide once to iſſue out of the campe. This mutiny grew to ſuch a furie, that they ouerthrew their cariages and ſumpter moiles, and ſlue them preſently. Amongſt others there was ſlaine Dorylaus, one of the chiefeſt Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: and Hermæus the Prieſt of the ſacrifices was troden vnder foote, and ſmothered at the campe gate, by reaſon of the multitude of thoſe that fled in ſo great diſorder. The king himſelfe amongſt others fled, but hauing neuer a one of his gard about him, nor any of the ſquires of his ſtable to bring him a horſe: Ptolomie, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the compania of them that fled, lighted off his owne horſe, and gaue him the king, but euen in manner too late. For the ROMAINES that followed him were then euen hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of ſpeed they miſſed the taking of him, for they were verie neare him: but the couetouſneſſe of the ſouldiers was the loſſe of the prey

they had ſo long ſought for, with ſo great paine and hazard of battels, and depriued Lucullus of the honour and reward of all his victories. For they were ſo neare vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer ſo litle further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horſe that caried him away. But one of the moiles that caried his gold and ſiluer (whether by chance, or of pretended pollicy of Mithridates, as a matter purpoſely abandoned to them that purſued him) was found in the middeſt of the high way betwixt him that fled, and the ROMAINES that followed, who ſtayed there to rob the gold and ſiluer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wan ground ſo farre before them, as they could neuer after come neare him againe. And this loſſe was not all which the couetouſneſſe of the ſouldiers made Lucullus to loſe. For, one of the chiefeſt Secretaries of the king being taken, called Calliſtratus, whom Lucullus commanded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fiue hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedineſſe of them, ſlue him by the way, and yet notwithſtanding Lucullus ſuffered them to ſpoile and deſtroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the city of CABIRA, and many other caſtels and ſtrong places, where he found great treaſure, and the priſons full of poore priſoners of the GRECIANS, & many princes a kin vnto the king himſelfe, which were thought to be dead long before: & then ſeeing themſelues deliuered from this miſerable bondage, by the grace and benefit of Lucullus, thought with themſelues they were not only taken out of priſon, but reuiued and turned againe vnto a ſecond life. There was alſo taken one of king Mithridates ſiſters called Niſſa, whoſe taking fell out profitable for her: becauſe all Mithridates other wiues and ſiſters whom they placed fartheſt off, as out of all danger (& ſent into a country of greateſt ſafety, neare vnto the city of PHARNACIA) died pitifully, and were miſerably ſlaine. For Mithridates ſent one of the groomes of his priuy chamber vnto them called Bacchides, to bring them word that they muſt all die. Amongſt many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kings ſiſters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty yeares old a peece, and yet had neuer bene maried: and two of his wiues alſo whom he had maried, both of the country of IONIA, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of CHIO, and the other Monime, in the city of MILETVM. Monime, ſhe was very famous amongſt the GRECIANS: for notwithſtanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being farre in loue with her, in ſo much as he ſent her fifteene thouſand crownes at one time, yet ſhe would neuer giue eare vnto his ſute, vntill ſuch time as the mariage was agreed vpon betweene them, & that he had ſent her his Diademe or royall band, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poore Lady after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a wofull life, bewailing continually her accurſed beauty, that in ſtead of a husband, had procured her a maſter: & in ſtead of the matrimoniall company which a noble woman ſhould enioy, had gotten her a gard & garriſon of barbarous men, that kept her as a priſoner, farre from the ſweete countrey of GRECE: in change whereof, ſhe had but a dreame and ſhadow of the hoped goods ſhe looked for, hauing vnfortunately left them within her owne countrey ſhe happily enioyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vnto them, and had commanded them from the king to chuſe what manner of death they would, and which euery one of them thought moſt eaſieſt, and leaſt painfull: Monime pluckt off the royall band from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her ſelfe, but the band not being ſtrong inough, brake incontinently. Whereupon ſhe cried out: O curſed and wicked tiſſue, wilt thou not yet ſerue me to end my ſorowfull daies? And ſpeaking theſe words, caſt it on the ground, and ſpit vpon it, and held out her throte to Bacchides to be cut aſunder. The other, Berenice, ſhe tooke a cup full of poyſon her mother being preſent, who praied her to let her haue halfe, the which ſhe did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poyſon was ſtrong inough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not ſo quickly to deſtroy the daughter: becauſe ſhe had not taken that proportion which would haue ſerued her turne, but drew out the paines of her death in length, vntill ſuch time as Bacchides haſting to diſpatch her, ſhe in the end did ſtrangle her ſelfe. As for the kings two ſiſters, Roxane and Statira, which were virgines yet vnmaried, they ſay, that one of them alſo dranke poyſon, curſing & deteſting the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an ill word, nor was faint harted or ſorowfull to die, but contrarily did commend and thanke her brother highly, that ſeeing himſelfe in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cauſe them die, before they ſhould fall as ſlaues into the hands of their enemies, and before they could come to diſhonour them, or do them villany. Theſe pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous and gentle of

of nature: neuertheleſſe he went on farther, ſtill following Mithridates at the heeles, vnto the citie of TALAVRA. And there vnderſtanding that he was fled foure dayes before vnto Tigranes in ARMENIA, returned backe againe, hauing firſt ſubdued the CHALDEANS, and the TIBARENIANS, taken ARMENIA the leſſe, and brought the cities, caſtles, and ſtrong places vnto his obedience. That done, he ſent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes, to ſummon him to deliuer Mithridates vnto him: and himſelfe tooke his iourney towards the citie of AMISVS, which was yet beſieged. The cauſe why this ſiege continued ſo long, was the ſufficiency and great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus, who vnderſtood ſo well how all ſorts of engines of batterie were to be vſed, and was ſo ſubtill beſides in all inuentions that might ſerue to defend a place beſieged, as he troubled the ROMAINES much in this attempt: but afterwards he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labour, but alſo outreached by Lucullus for all his fineneſſe. For where before he had alwayes vſed to ſound the retreat at a certaine houre, and to call his men backe from the aſſault to reſt them: one day he brake that order on the ſudden, and comming to aſſault the wall, at the firſt charge wanne a peece of it, before thoſe within could come in time to reſiſt them. Callimachus ſeeing that, and knowing it was now vnpoſſible to keepe the citie any longer, forſooke it. But before his departing he ſet the citie on fire, either for malice to the ROMAINES, becauſe he would not they ſhould enrich themſelues with the ſacke of ſo great a citie: or elſe for a pollicie of warre to haue the more leiſure to ſaue himſelfe, and flie. For no man gaue eye to them that fled by ſea, becauſe the flame was ſo great, that it diſperſed it ſelfe euen to the verie wals, and the ROMAINE ſouldiers, they onely prepared to ſpoile. Lucullus ſeeing the fire without, had compaſſion of the citie within, and would gladly haue holpen it, and for the purpoſe prayed the ſouldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, euerie one gaping after the ſpoile, making great noiſe with claſhing of harneſſe, and being very loud beſides otherwiſe, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to ſpoile, hoping thereby to ſaue the houſes from fire, but it fell out cleane contrarie. For the ſouldiers themſelues in ſeeking all about with torches and linkes lighted, to ſee if any thing were hidden, they ſet a number of houſes on fire. So as Lucullus comming into the citie the next morning, and ſeeing the great deſolation the fire had made, fell a weeping, ſaying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happie, howbeit he neuer wondred more at his good fortune, then that day he did. For, Sylla ſayd he, deſired to ſaue the citie of ATHENS, the gods granted him that fauour that he might do it: but I that would faine follow him therein, and ſaue this citie, fortune thwarting my deſire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that cauſed CORINTH to be burnt. Neuertheleſſe he did his beſt indeuor at that time to helpe the poore city againe. For touching the fire, euen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a ſhower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus ſelfe before he left the city, made a great number of the houſes which were ſpoiled by fire, to be built vp againe, and courteouſly receiued all the inhabitants that were fled, beſides them he placed other GRECIANS there alſo, that were willing to dwell amongſt them, and increaſed the bounds and confines of the city which he gaue them, one hundred and twentie furlongs into the countrey. This citie was a colonie of the ATHENIANS, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire flouriſhed, and that they ruled the ſeas: by reaſon whereof, many flying the tyrannie of Ariſtion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the citie, as the naturall inhabitants of the ſame. This good hap fell vpon them, that forſaking their owne goods, they went to poſſeſſe and enioy the goods of other men: but the verie citizens of ATHENS it ſelfe that had eſcaped from this great deſolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas a peece, and ſent them againe into their countrey. Tyrannion the grammarian was taken at that time, whom Muræna begged of Lucullus: and Lucullus hauing granted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt verie diſcourteouſly, and did much abuſe Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in beſtowing this priſoner vpon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Muræna ſhould take him for a bondman, whereby he ſhould need afterwards to make him free. For ſeeming to make him free, and reſtore him to libertie, was no more then to take that freedome and libertie from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in that onely, Muræna layd himſelfe open to the world, that he had not all the parts a worthy Captaine ſhould haue in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISVS, he went to viſite

the cities of Asia, to the end that whileſt he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue ſome refreſhing of lawes and iuſtice. For, by reaſon that law was not executed of long time in Asia, the poore country was ſo afflicted, and oppreſſed with ſo many euils and miſeries, as no man liuing would ſcant beleeue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreme and horrible couetouſneſſe of the farmers, cuſtomers, and Romaine vſurers, did not onely deuour it, but alſo kept it in ſuch bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to ſell their goodly young ſonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the intereſt and vſurie of the money which they had borrowed to diſcharge their fines withall, and publickly the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the ſtatues of their gods, and other church iewels: and yet in the end, they themſelues were alſo iudged to be bondmen and ſlaues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their dayes in miſerable ſeruitude. And yet the worſt of all was, the paine they put them to before they were ſo condemned: for they impriſoned them, ſet them on the racke, tormented them vpon a litle braſen horſe, ſet them in the ſtockes, made them ſtand naked in the greateſt heate of ſommer, and on the iſe in the deepeſt of winter, ſo as that bondage ſeemed vnto them a reliefe of their miſeres, and a reſt of their torments. Lucullus found the cities of Asia full of ſuch oppreſſions, but in a ſhort time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For firſt he tooke order, they ſhould account for the vſurie that was payed monethly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly, he cut off all vſuries that paſſed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greateſt matter of all, he ordained that the creditor and vſurer ſhould enioy the fourth part of the profits and reuenues of his debter. And he that ioyned vſurie with the principall, that is to ſay, tooke vſurie vpon vſurie, ſhould looſe the whole. So that by this order, all debts were payd in leſſe then foure yeares, and the owners lands and reuenues ſet cleare of all manner payments. This ſurcharge of vſuries, came of the twenty thouſand talens, wherein Sylla had condemned the country of Asia: the which ſumme they had payed twiſe before vnto the farmers and collectors of the Romaines, who had raiſed it, ſtill heaping vſury vpon vſurie, to the ſumme of ſixſcore thouſand talents. Wherefore theſe collectors and farmers ranne to Rome, and cried out vpon Lucullus, ſaying, that he did them the greateſt wrong that could be: & by meanes of mony, they procured certaine of the comon counſellors to ſpeake againſt him: which they might eaſily do, becauſe they had diuerſe of their names in their books that dealt in the affaires of the comonwealth at Rome. But Lucullus was not only beloued of thoſe countries whom he did good vnto, but was wiſhed for and deſired alſo of others, who thought the countries happy that might haue ſuch a gouernour. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had ſent before from Talavra vnto king Tigranes in Armenia, & whoſe ſiſter at that time was Lucullus wife: he firſt tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of verie malice guided him through the high country, making him fetch a great compaſſe about, by many dayes iourneys ſpent in vaine: vntill ſuch time as one of his infranchiſed bondmen that was borne in Syria, taught him the right way. Whereupon he diſcharged theſe barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong wayes they had led him, within few dayes paſt ouer the riuer of Euphrates, and arriued in the citie of Antioch, ſurnamed Epidaphne. Where he had commandement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the countrey of Phoenicia, where he ſubdued certaine cities, and had ſome other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wan ſecretly diuerſe of the princes and noblemen, that obeyed this Armenian king but for feare, by force, and againſt their wils, amongſt whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of Gordiæna: and promiſed the aide of Lucullus alſo to many the cities that ſent vnto him (which had not long before bene ſubdued and brought into bondage) to whom neuertheleſſe he gaue in expreſſe charge, that for the time they ſhould not once ſtirre, nor alter any thing. For, the rule of theſe Armenians was intollerable to the Grecians, and ſpecially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reaſon of his great proſperity, was growne to ſuch pride and preſumption, that whatſoeuer men did commonly eſteeme beſt, and make moſt reckoning of, he would not onely haue it, and vſe it as his owne, but alſo tooke it that all was made for himſelfe whatſoeuer: and this great ouerweening grew, by reaſon of fortunes ſpeciall grace and fauour towards him. For at the beginning he had but very litle, and yet with this litle (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downe the power of the Parthians as much as any man that euer was before him. He repleniſhed the countrey of Mesopotamia with Grecian inhabitants, which he brought by force out of Cilicia and Cappadocia, compelling them

them to inhabite there. He made the ARABIANS change their manner of liuing, who are otherwise called the SCENITES, as much to say, as tent dwellers, becauſe they are vagarant people that dwell in no other houſes but tents, which they euer vſe to carie with them, and brought them out of their naturall countrey, and made them follow him, vſing them for his commoditie in trade of merchandize. There were euer many kings in his court that waited on him: but amongſt others, he had foure kings that waited continually on his perſon as his foootemen: for when he rode abroad any whither, they ranne by his ſtirrop in their ſhirts. And when he was ſet in his chaire of ſtate to giue audience, they ſtood on their feete about his chaire holding their hands together, which countenance ſhewed the moſt manifeſt confeſſion and tokens of bondage that they could do vnto him: as if they had ſhewed thereby that they reſigned all their libertie, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and maiſter, more readie to ſuffer, then any thing to do. Notwithſtanding, Appius Clodius being nothing abaſhed nor feared with all this tragicall pompe, when audience was giuen him, told king Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carie king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumph of Lucullus: and therefore did ſummon him to deliuer that king into his hands, or elſe that he proclaimed warres vpon himſelfe. They that were preſent at this ſummons, knew well inough that Tigranes (although he ſet a good countenance on the matter openly with a faint counterfeit laughing) yet hearing theſe words ſo boldly and gallantly ſpoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes hauing raigned (or to ſay better tyrannically gouerned) fiue and twentie yeares ſpace, had neuer heard any bold or franke ſpeech but that. Notwithſtanding, he aunſwered Appius, that he would not deliuer Mithridates: and if the ROMAINES made warres with him, that he would defend himſelfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him not the title, King of Kings, but only king ſimply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not ſo much as vouchſafe to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he ſent him goodly rich preſents, which he refuſed. Whereupon the king ſent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius tooke a cup onely, becauſe the king ſhould not thinke he refuſed ought of anger, or ill will: and ſo ſending all the reſt againe vnto him, made great haſte to returne to his Captaine Lucullus. Now Tigranes before that time would not once ſee king Mithridates his ſo neare kinſeman, who by fortune of warres had loſt ſo puiſſant and great a kingdome, but proudly kept him vnder in fennie, marriſh, and vnwholeſome grounds, without any honour giuen vnto him, as if he had bene a verie priſoner indeed: howbeit then he ſent for him honourably, and receiued him with great curteſie. When they were neare together in the kings pallace, they talked ſecretly one with another, and excuſing themſelues, clearing all ſuſpitions conceiued betweene them, to the great hurt of their ſeruants and friends, whom they burthened with all the occaſion of vnkindneſſe betweene them: amongſt which number Metrodorus the SCEPSIAN was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in ſpeech, and one whom Mithridates ſo much loued and eſteemed, that they called him the kings father. Mithridates at the beginning of his wars had ſent him Ambaſſadour vnto Tigranes, to pray aide of him againſt the ROMAINES. At which time Tigranes ſayd vnto him: but what ſaieſt thou to it Metrodorus: what aduice wilt thou giue me? Metrodorus either becauſe he had regard vnto Tigranes profite, or elſe becauſe he was loth Mithridates ſhould eſcape, aunſwered him againe: As Ambaſſadour, ô King, I would wiſh you ſhould do it: but as a counſellour, that you ſhould not do it. Tigranes now reported this ſpeech vnto Mithridates, not thinking he would haue hurt Metrodorus for it, though indeed he preſently put him to death vpon it. Whereat Tigranes was heartily ſorie, and repented him greatly to haue told him ſo much, although he was not altogether the occaſion of his caſting away, hauing but onely reuiued Mithridates euill will before conceiued againſt him: for he had borne him diſpleaſure of a long time, as appeared amongſt his ſecret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus ſhould be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honourably, ſparing no coſt at all vnto the dead bodie of him, whom liuing he had betrayed. There died in King Tigranes Court alſo an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deſerue that mention ſhould be made of him, for the citie of ATHENS ſake wherein he was borne: for it is ſaid, that when he was baniſhed out of his country, he fled into the citie of SELEVCIA, which ſtandeth vpon the riuer of Tigris. When the inhabitants of the ſame prayed him to teach them the Art of Eloquence in their country, he would not vouchſafe it, but answered them proudly: that a platter was too litle to hold a Dolphine in, meaning that their citie was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly suspected and accused: so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS companie any more, which grieued him so much, that he famished himselfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also verie honourably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neare vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that countrey. Now when Lucullus had quieted all things in ASIA, and had established good lawes among them, he was not careless also of games and pleasant pastimes, but while he was at leisure in the citie of EPHESVS, he made manie games, feasts, wrestlings, and fence-playes at the sharpe for ioy of his victorie, delighting all the cities of ASIA with them, the which in recompence thereof did institute a solemne feast also in the honour of him, which they called Lucullea, and did celebrate it with great ioy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleased him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honour they could deuise to giue him. But after that Appius Clodius was returned from his Ambassade, and had told Lucullus that he must make warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went backe againe vnto the realme of PONTVS, where he tooke his armie which he had left in garrison, and brought it before the citie of SINOPE to lay siege vnto it, or rather to besiege certaine CILICIANS that were gotten into the citie in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they saw Lucullus come against them, they flue a great number of the citizens, and setting fire on the citie, fled their way by night. Lucullus being aduertised of it, entred the citie, put eight thousand of the CILICIANS to the sword which he found there, and restored the naturall citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserue the city, was this vision he had. He thought in his nights dreame that one came to him, and sayd: go a litle farther Lucullus, for Autolycus commeth, who is desirous to speake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the vision meant. It was the selfe same day on the which he tooke the city of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANS that escaped by flying, he found an image lying on the ground vpon the sea side, which the CILICIANS would haue caried away: but they were taken and followed so neare, that they had no leisure to ship it. This statue (as it is reported) was one of the goodliest and notablest workes of Sthenis the image grauer. And some say that it was the image of Autolycus, who founded the city of SINOPE. For Autolycus was one of the princes that went out of THESSALIE with Hercules to go against the AMAZONES, and he was the sonne of Deimachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the ship in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogius, made shipwracke vpon a rocke on the coast of CHERRONESVS, where she was cast away: howbeit that he and his men scaping with all their furniture, came to the citie of SINOPE, which he tooke from certaine SYRIANS, who came (as they say) of one Syrus the sonne of Apollo, and of the nymph Sinope Asopus daughter. Lucullus vnderstanding this matter, called a saying of Sylla to mind, which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may giue more credit vnto, then that which is signified to vs by dreames. In the meane season he was aduertised that Trigranes and Mithridates were ready to come downe into LYCAONIA and CILICIA, because they might first enter ASIA. Lucullus maruelled much at Tigranes counsell, that sithence he was minded to war with the ROMAINES, he did not vse Mithridates aide in his wars at such time, as when he was in his best strength and force: & that he did not then ioyne his power with Mithridates, rather then suffer him to be destroyed and ouerthrowne, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding himselfe with those that could not helpe themselues. While these things passed in this sort, Machares king Mithridates sonne, that kept the realme of BOSPHORVS, sent a crowne of gold vnto Lucullus, of the weight of a thousand crownes, praying him that he would name him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last end of his first warre, and leauing Sornatius with sixe thousand men to keepe the realme of PONTVS, he departed with twelue thousand footemen, and lesse then three thousand horsemen, to go to the second warre. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a part of him, to go with so small a companie to fight with so many warlike nations, and to put himselfe vnto the hazard of so manie thousands of horsemen, in a maruellous large countrey, and of a wonderfull length, enuironed round about with deepe riuers and mountaines, couered with snow all the

the yeare through: so that his souldiers, which otherwise were no speciall well trained men, nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an euill will, and did stubburnely disobey him. And on the other side, the common counsellers at ROME cried out on him continually, and openly protested before all the people, that out of one warre he sowed another, which the commonwealth had nothing to do withall, and that he looked after none other thing but still to raise new occasions of warres, to the end he might alwaies haue armies at his commaundement, and neuer leaue the warres, because he would make himselfe great with the cost and perill of the commonwealth. These crying counsellers in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to substitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his armie with all the possible speed he could, so that he came in few daies vnto the riuer of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough, by reason of the winter season: which troubled him maruellously at that present, doubting lest it would hold him there a long time in finding out of boats, and making of posts and plancks to build a bridge to passe ouer his armie. But towards night the water began to fall a litle, and in the night fell so much, that the next morning the riuer was come to her ordinarie streame: and moreouer the country men themselues discerning certaine litle Ilands that appeared vnto them in the middest of the water course, and the riuer very calme as a marish round about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, because it was a thing they had neuer seene chaunce before: as though at his comming the riuer had suddenly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to giue him safe and easie passage. And because he would not loose that oportunitie, he passed ouer his armie immediatly: and was no sooner on the other side, but he met with a happie token of good lucke, which was this. On the other side of the riuer, there was a certaine number of kine consecrated to Diana Persica, whom the barbarous people inhabiting beyond the riuer of Euphrates, do reuerence and honour aboue all the other gods: and these kine they employ to none other vse, but onely to sacrifice them vnto this goddesse. They wander all about the countrey where they will, without any maner of tying, or shackling otherwise, hauing onely the marke of the goddesse, which is a lampe printed vpon their bodies, and they are not easie to be taken when one would haue them, but with great ado. One of these consecrated kine, after that Lucullus armie was passed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her selfe vpon a rocke which they suppose is hallowed or dedicate vnto this goddesse, bowing downe her head, and stretching out her necke, like those that are tyed short, as if she had come euen of purpose to present her selfe to Lucullus, to be sacrificed as she was. And besides her, he sacrificed a bull also vnto the riuer Euphrates, in token of thanks for his safe passage ouer. Lucullus the first day did nothing but encampe himself only, on the other side of the riuer: but the next morning and the other daies following, he went farther into the country by the riuer of SOPHENE, hurting none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly receiued his army. For when his men would haue had him to haue taken a castle by force, where they said was great store of gold and siluer: he shewed them mount Taurus a farre off, and told them, it is that which we must rather go to take: as for the things which be in this castle, they be kept for them that vanquish. And going on still with great iourneys, passed ouer the riuer of Tigris, and so entred the realme of ARMENIA with a maine armie. Now for Tigranes, the first man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus coming, had no ioy of it: for he cut off his head for his labor. And therfore from thenceforth there durst no man say any thing vnto him, vntill such time as he was at the last enuironed round with fire, which Lucullus army had raised about him, before he could heare any thing therof. For he was sporting and gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus indeed were a noble captaine, if he durst but tary Tigranes coming downe in the city of EPHESVS onely, and how he would straight flie out of ASIA, so soone as he might but heare tell of his comming against him, with so triumphing an army, of so many thousand men. And thus may we see, that like as all bodies and braines, are not alike strong nor able to cary much wine: so in like case, all wits be not resolute & constant, neuer to do amisse, nor to swarue from reasons bounds in great prosperitie. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterprised to tell him the truth: whose boldnesse had litle better reward for his newes then the first that was beheaded. For Tigranes sent him immediatly with three thousand horse, and a good number of footmen, commaunding him that he should bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, & that furthermore, he should march vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus alreadie camped with part of his armie, and the other part comming after, when his skoutes brought him newes of the barbarous Captaines approach: which at the firſt put him in feare, that if the enemie ſhould come and aſſaile them thus ſcattered in companies, and not ranged in battell and readie to fight, he might ouerthrow them whiles they were in diſorder. And therfore he remained within his campe to fortifie the ſame, and ſent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with a thouſand ſixe hundred horſe, and as many footmen (or a few more) as well naked as armed: commaunding him to approach as neare to his enemie as he could without fighting, onely to ſtay him there, vntill ſuch time as he heard newes that all his army was come together into his camp. Sextilius went to do his commaundement, but he was compelled to fight, (though againſt his will) Mithrobarzanes came ſo brauely and luſtily to aſſaile him. So was the battell ſtriken betweene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was ſlaine valiantly fighting, and all his men either broken or killed, few excepted, that onely by flying ſaued themſelues. After this ouerthrow, Tigranes forſooke his great royall citie of TIGRANOCERTA that he built himſelfe, and went to mount Taurus, where he aſſembled a great number of men out of all parts. But Lucullus would giue him no leyſure to prepare himſelfe, but ſent Muræna on the one ſide to cut them off by the way, and to ouerthrow thoſe that were aſſembled about him: and on the other ſide Sextilius to ſtop a great companie of the ARABIANS that were comming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius ſet vpon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in maner euery man. And Muræna following king Tigranes at the heeles, ſpied an occaſion to giue the charge as he paſſed a long and narrow valley, in the bottome whereof the way was very ill, and ſpecially for an armie of ſuch a length: and taking the oportunitie, ſet vpon the rereward, which Tigranes perceiuing, fled ſtraight vpon it, making all his cariage to be throwne downe in the way before the enemies to ſtay them. There were a great number of the ARMENIANS ſlaine in this ouerthrow, and mo taken. Thoſe things hauing this ſucceſſe, Lucullus went to the citie of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he beſieged round. In that citie were a maruellous number of GRECIANS that had bene brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people alſo whom they had vſed in the like forcible maner, as they had done the ADIABENIANS, the ASSYRIANS, the GORDIÆNIANS, and the CAPPADOCIANS, whoſe townes and cities Tigranes had deſtroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reaſon wherof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of gold and ſiluer, of mettals, ſtatues, tables and pictures, becauſe euery man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lords) ſtudied to pleaſe the king, to enrich and beautifie this citie, with all kinds of furniture and ornaments fit for the ſame. And hereupon Lucullus ſtraighted the ſiege as much as he could, perſwading himſelfe that Tigranes would neuer ſuffer, that it ſhould be taken, but (though he had otherwiſe determined) yet for very anger would preſent him battell, thereby to enforce him to raiſe his ſiege. And ſurely he geſſed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had diſſwaded him by expreſſe letters and meſſengers that he ſhould in no caſe hazard battell, and perſwaded him rather to cut off the victuals on all ſides from the ROMAINES with his horſemen. The ſelfe ſame counſell and aduice did Taxiles (the Captaine whome Mithridates ſent) giue him in his campe, and prayed him very earneſtly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the ROMAINES. Tigranes patiently hearkened to their reaſons at the firſt; but when the ARMENIANS were come, and all the force of the countrie beſides, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the kings of the MEDES, and of the ADIABENIANS were come alſo with all their power, and that on the other ſide there came a maruellous great hoſt of the ARABIANS that dwell vpon the ſea of BABYLON, and a multitude of the ALBANIANS from the CASPIAN ſea, and of the IBERIANS their neighbours, beſides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the riuer of Araxes, ſome comming freely to do him pleaſure, other for their penſions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table, nor in councell, but of aſſured hope of victory, and of great brags and barbarous threatnings, ſo that Taxiles was in great daunger of himſelfe, becauſe he was againſt the determination taken in councell for giuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuie the glorie of king Tigranes, and therefore did thus diſſwade him from battell. For which reſpect Tigranes would not ſo much as tarie for him, and becauſe alſo Mithridates ſhould haue no part of the honour of his victorie: but went into the field with all his great armie, vanting amongſt his familiars as they report, that nothing grieued him but one, that he ſhould fight with Lucullus alone, & not with all the other ROMAINE Captaines. Now this brauerie was not ſo fond, nor ſo farre out of ſquare, but that there was great likelihood of it when he ſaw ſo many ſundry nations about him, ſo many many kings that followed him, ſo many battels of armed footemen, and ſo many thouſands of horſemen. For he had in his armie of bow-men and ſlings onely, twenty thouſand: fiue and fiftie thouſand horſemen, whereof ſeuenteene thouſand men of armes, armed from top to toe, as Lucullus himſelfe wrote vnto the Senate: & an hundred & fiftie thouſand armed footmen, deuided by enſignes and ſquadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, maſons, and ſuch other kind of handicrafts men, to plaine waies, to make bridges to paſſe ouer riuers, to ſtop ſtreames, to cut wood, and to make ſuch kind of workes, of this ſort of people, the number of fiue and thirtie thouſand, who followed in battel ray in the rereward of the armie, making their campe ſeeme farre greater, and by ſomuch the more ſtronger. When Tigranes ſhewed on the top of mount Taurus, and that they might plainely ſee his whole armie from the citie, and that himſelfe alſo might eaſily diſcerne Lucullus armie that beſieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the citie were ſo glad of this ſight, that they made wonderfull ſhoutes of ioy, and great clapping of hands, threatning the ROMAINES from their wals, and ſhewing them the armie of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time ſate in councell to conſider what was to be done: wherein ſome were of opinion that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege, and go with his whole armie vndeuided againſt Tigranes. But others liked not that he ſhould leaue ſo great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he ſhould raiſe his ſiege. Lucullus made them anſwer, that neither of them both did counſell him well, but both together did counſell him right. Whereupon he deuided his armie, and left Murena at the ſiege of TIGRANOCERTA with ſixe thouſand men: and he with foure and twenty cohorts (in the which were not aboue ten thouſand armed footmen) and all his horſemen, with a thouſand bowmen, and ſlings or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad field by the riuers ſide. The ROMAINES ſeemed but a handfull to Tigranes campe, ſo that for awhile Tigranes paraſites made but a May-game of them to ſport withall. For ſome laughed them to ſcorne, other drew lots, and played away their part of the ſpoiles, as if they had alreadie wonne the field: and euery one of the kings and Captaines came and offered themſelues to Tigranes, and beſought him euery man for himſelfe, that he would giue him the honor alone to leade this battell, and that it would pleaſe him to ſit by in ſome place to ſee the ſport. Tigranes then, becauſe he would ſhew that he could be as pleaſant as the reſt, ſpake a thing knowne to euery man: If they come as Ambaſſadors (quoth he) they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but few. And thus they played vpon the ROMAINES, and tooke their pleaſure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the field, and put them in order of battell. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on the other ſide of the riuer toward the Eaſt, and by chaunce the ſtreame of the riuer turned ſuddenly towards the Weſt, where there was a better foord to paſſe ouer. Wherefore Lucullus marching with his armie by the riuers ſide, following the ſtreame to meete with ſome foord, caſting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, & called for Taxiles, and ſaid vnto him, laughing: Doeſt thou ſee Taxiles thoſe goodly ROMAINE legions, whom thou praiſeſt to be men ſo inuincible, how they flie away now? Taxiles anſwered the king again: I would your good fortune (O king) might worke ſome miracle this day: for doubtleſſe it were a ſtraunge thing that the ROMAINES ſhould flie. They are not wont to weare their braue coates and furniture vpon their armour, when they meane onely but to march in the fields: neither do they carie their ſhields and targets vncaſed, nor their burganets bare on their heads, as they do at this preſent, hauing throwne away their leather caſes and couerings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we ſee ſo bright and gliſtring in our faces, is a manifeſt ſigne that they intend to fight, and that they march towards vs. Taxiles had no ſooner ſpoken theſe words, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his enſigne-bearer turne ſodainely that caried the firſt Eagle, and the bands tooke their places to paſſe the riuer in order of battell. Then Tigranes ſecretly come to himſelfe, as out of drunkenneſſe, cried out aloud twiſe or thrice, come they then to vs? But then was there no ſmall ſtir and tumult, to put ſuch a world of people into battell. The king Tigranes himſelfe vndertooke to leade the middle battell, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the ADIABENIANS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the moſt part of the compleat armed men, who made the firſt front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to paſſe the riuer, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wiſh him to take heed that he fought not that day, becauſe it was one of thoſe which the ROMAINES thought vnfortunate, and call them Atri, as to ſay, blacke: for vpon one of thoſe daies, one Cæpio was ouerthrown in a set battell with all his armie by the CIMBRES. But Lucullus gaue them a pretie answer againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happie day (said he) for the ROMAINES. It was the sixteenth day of the moneth of October. And so with those words encouraging his men, passed ouer the riuer, and went himselfe the foremost man, and marched directly towards his enemie, armed with an anima of steele, made with scallop shell, shining like the sunne, and vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding his sword drawne in his hand: to let his men vnderstand, that they must sodainly ioyne with their enemies, and fight at the swords point that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with shot and slings, and that he would so quickly winne the distance of ground they had to march ere they could ioyne, that they should haue no leysure to shoot. And furthermore, perceiuing that the strength of their men of armes (whereof they made so great account) was raunged in battell vnder a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and euen, and the way vp the hill not passing foure furlongs trauell, and not very hard nor steepe to clime: he sent thither certaine horsemen of the THRACIANS and GAVLES which he had in pay, and commaunded them to giue a charge on the flancke to disorder them, and assay to cut their launces with their swords. For all the strength of these men of armes consisteth in their launces, and they can do nothing for themselues, nor against their enemies, they are so heauily armed and loden: so as it seemeth they are locked vp in their armour, as in an iron prison. And he himselfe therewithall taking two ensignes of footmen, stroue also to gaine the top of the hill, his souldiers following him hard at the heeles with a notable courage, because they saw him the foremost man trauelling on foot, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the top, he stayed a litle in the highest place he could find, and then cryed out with a loude voice: Oh companions, the victorie is ours. And as he spake those words, he led them against these men of armes, commaunding them they should not meddle with throwing of their darts, but taking their swords in their hands they should strike at their thighes and legs, because they haue no other parts of their bodies naked. Howbeit, there was no neede of such fight, for they taried not the ROMAINES, but with great crying out turned their horse heads immediatly, and ran cowardly (themselues and their horses, heauie armed as they were) through the midst of the bands of their footemen, before they had striken a stroke. And thus were so many thousands of men broken without any stroke striken, or any man hurt, or one droppe of bloud seene to be spilt. But the great slaughter was, when they began to flie, or (to say better) when they thought to flie: for they could not flie, they ranne so one vpon anothers necke, by reason of the maruellous length and breadth of their battels. Tigranes amongst the rest was one of the first that dislodged with a small company, and seeing his sonne running the same fortune, flying as himselfe did, tooke off his diademe or royall band from his head, and gaue it him weeping, commanding him to saue himself as well as he could by some other way. But the young prince durst not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his trustie seruants to keepe, who by chaunce was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: so that amongst the other spoile and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes diademe. It is thought that there were slaine at this ouerthrow, aboue an hundred thousand footmen, and very few of all the horsemen saued. On the ROMAINES side, there were about an hundred hurt, and fiue slaine. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battell in a treatise he made of the gods, writeth that the Sunne neuer saw the like ouerthrow. And Strabo another Philosopher in a certaine abridgement he made of stories, said, that the ROMAINES were ashamed and laughed at themselues, that they had drawne their swords against such dastardly slaues. And Titus Liuius declareth also, that the ROMAINES were neuer in any battell with so small a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerors were not in all the world the twentieth part (nothing like) of those that were ouercome. Wherfore the oldest and best experienced Captaines of the ROMAINES did highly commend Lucullus, because he had ouercome two of the greatest and most mightie princes of the world, by two sundry contrary meanes: the one by tract and delay, and the other by speed and swiftnesse. For he vndermined and consumed Mithridates by holding backe and delaying, at that time when all his strength was whole: and to the contrarie he destroyed Tigranes with great speed and hast. And thus did he that which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vsed delay of time to execute, and valiant expedition to winne the victorie. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hast to come to the battell, thinking still that Lucullus had vsed his wonted pollicie, to delay and giue backe alwaies: and therefore he came by small iourneys vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the

the firſt with a few of the ARMENIANS that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he ſtraight miſtruſted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troupes of them naked, and ſore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to ſeeke out Tigranes, whome he found alone, forſaken of his men, and in very poore eſtate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduerſitie with that pride and diſdaine he had vſed him before in his miſerie: but lighted off his horſe, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, and traine of a kings court that followed him to ſerue him, comforting him, and exhorting him to plucke vp his heart againe, and to be couragious thenceforth. Hereupon they both leauied afreſh the whole force and power they could from all the parts of their dominions. In the meane ſeaſon, there fell out great ſedition in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, betweene the GRECIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would haue yeelded vp the towne into Lucullus hands. Whereupon Lucullus giuing an aſſault to the citie at that very inſtant, wonne it, and ſeized vpon the kings treaſure there, leauing all the reſt to the ſpoile of the ſoldiers: in the which, beſides all other riches, there was eight thouſand talents in readie money. And yet beſides all that, he gaue of the ſpoile that was wonne vpon the enemies, eight hundred Drachmas vnto euerie ſouldier. And vnderſtanding that there were diuerſe muſitians, common players, minſtrels, and ſuch kind of people meete for feaſts and ſport, whom Tigranes had ſent for thither from all parts, to dedicate the Theater he had made in this citie: he cauſed all them to ſerue at the ſports and feaſts of this victorie. After the ſolemnization whereof, he ſent the GRECIANS home againe vnto their countrie, and gaue them mony to defray their charges by the way, and the barbarous people alſo that were brought thither by force from their natiue countries. And ſo it fortuned, that by the deſolation and deſtruction of a city forſaken, many others were built againe, and ſtored with people: becauſe thoſe cities had thereby recouered their naturall inhabitants againe, who euer after did loue and honour Lucullus, as their benefactour and founder. All other things proſpered alſo according to his vertue and merites. For Lucullus liked better the praiſe that came of bountie, of iuſtice, & of clemencie: then that that came by force of martial proweſſe and chiualrie. For in deeds of armes, he ſaid his army partly deſerued praiſe, and fortune alſo caried the beſt part away: but the praiſe of the other, were only due vnto himſelf. Wherby he ſhewed the valure of an excellent good man, well taught & trained vp in vertue: & ſo reaped the fruit of his worthy deſerts. For by thoſe good parts, he wan the harts of the barbarous people in ſuch ſort, that the kings of the ARABIANS came of good will to put themſelues and their goods into his hands. So did the nation of the SOPHENIANS alſo yeeld themſelues vnto him. The GORDIÆNIANS, in like maner, they liked Lucullus ſo well, that they would willingly haue forſaken their cities, houſes and country, to follow him with their wiues and children vpon this occaſion: Zarbienus king of theſe GORDIÆNIANS, as we haue recited before, had priuily entred amitie with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Clodius, who could no longer away with the tyranny of Tigranes. This practiſe was bewraied vnto Tigranes, who put Zarbienus, his wife and children to death, before the ROMAINES maine army came into the country of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but paſſing through his realme, gaue him very royall funerals: for hauing heaped vp a huge pile of wood, ſumptuouſly ſet out with cloth of gold and ſiluer, and other rich ſpoiles of Tigranes: he himſelfe in perſon, would needes ſet it on fire, and made the funerall effuſions and accuſtomed ſpainklings at burials, with his friends and kinſmen, doing him this honour, as to call him friend and confederate of the ROMAINE people, & appointed alſo a great ſumme of mony beſides to erect a ſumptuous tombe for him. For they found great ſtore of gold and ſiluer in the kings caſtell, and there was plentie of prouiſion alſo of 300000. buſhels of wheate: the which did enrich his ſouldiers maruellouſly, and made Lucullus to be wondred at, that hauing receiued not one Drachma from the ſparing coffers at ROME, he had notwithſtanding made the war entertaine it ſelfe. About the ſelfe ſame time alſo, the king of the PARTHIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to offer him his friendſhip and alliance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and ſent ambaſſadours from him alſo of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the king of the PARTHIANS ſtood doubtfull how to reſolue which part he ſhould take, and that ſecretly he ſent vnto Tigranes, to aske the realme of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aide him againſt the ROMAINES. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of PARTHIAES double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes and Mithridates, as two enemies wearied and ouercome, and a litle to proue the force and power of the PARTHIANS by making wars vpon them, thinking it great honour vnto him, if he might discomfite and ouerthrow three so mightie kings one after another, like a valiant conquerour that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had passed through the countries of three of the greatest princes vnder the Sunne, alwaies a conquerour, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sornatius and other of his captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of PONTVS, that they should repaire to him with all speed with the bands they had vnder their charge, for that he was determined to depart out of the country of GORDIANA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenants that had many times before found their souldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commaundements, knew plainely then their cankred stomackes, and incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or perswasions they could vse: but contrarily they cryed out, and told them plainely, that they would no longer tary where they were, but would go home to their country, and leaue the Realme of PONTVS without guard or garrison at all. And farther, that worst of all was, when these newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they gaue a full example of boldnesse to his souldiers there, to mutine in like sort, hauing goodwill and disposition thereunto of themselues before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with fineneſse, were become so dull and lazie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnesse of warres, but desired to liue in all idlenesse and ease. And hearing the report of their fellowes stoutnesse, called them lustie laddes, saying, they must needs take the like course, and do as they taught them, vanting of their good seruice of long time done, which well deserued leaue now to depart home with safetie, and thencefoorth take their rest. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, and many other their words, worse and fuller of sedition then these: brake off his enterprise against the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the middest of sommer to meet with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieued him to see the fields so full of wheate yet standing, which came by the season of the yeare, and coldnesse of the aire, being so slacke and slow in all those parts. Neuertheless, he came downe into the vally, and at two or three skirmishes ouerthrew the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his comming downe. And ranne ouer all the valley, and destroyed the whole country without let or stoppe of any man, taking away the prouision of corne that was made for Tigranes campe: whereby he straighted his enemies vnto that neede and necessitie of victuals which himselfe feared, and yet ceassed not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell: sometime inclosing their campe with trenches about, as if he meant to famish them: somtime againe destroying and spoiling the whole countrie before their face. But because they had so oft bene discomfited, they would no more stirre, nor once moue against him. Lucullus perceiuing that, in the end raised his campe, and went and laid siege vnto ARTAXATA, the chiefe citie of the kingdome of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wiues and young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard another battell, then suffer that citie to be lost. It is said that Hannibal of CARTHAGE (after king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in battell by the ROMAINES) went vnto king Artaxes, whome he taught many necessarie and profitable things for his realme: and amongst others, cõsidering that one of the goodliest and pleasantest places of all his kingdome lay wast, and no reckening made of it, drew a plot of a citie, brought the king thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuice maruellous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to see the worke finished. And thus was this noble and famous city built, & called after the kings name, ARTAXATA: and held euer after the reputation of the chiefest place of the whole realme of ARMENIA. Tigranes being aduertised that Lucullus went to lay siege thereunto, could not indure it, but went with all his armie to follow the ROMAINES, and the fourth day came and camped hard by them: insomuch as there was but the riuer of Arsanias betweene them, which the ROMAINES of necessitie must passe ouer to go to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauing first sacrificed vnto the gods, assuring himselfe of the victorie, as if he had it already in his hands: made his armie passe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohorts in the front, and the other behind, fearing lest the enemies hauing a great number of men of armes should enuiron them at their backes. They had against them also the MARDIAN bowmen on horseback, and the IBERIANS with their launces, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best souldiers he had in pay: and yet for all that they did no notable seruice. For when they had skirmished but a litle with the horsemen of the ROMAINES, they durst not tarie the legionaries or footbands that came behind them, but dispersed themselues, some flying one way, some another, which intised the Ro-

MAINE horsemen to follow the chase. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes person, saw the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to breake vpon the footmen. Lucullus seeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat afraid thereof: sent in hast to call in his horsemen that followed the chase, and in the meane time himselfe marched foremost, against these Lords and Satrapes, which were in the front before him with all the nobilitie of their hoast, whom he put in such a feare, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kings ranged in battell one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of PONTVS, who had not the heart so much as to abide the cries of the ROMAINES. The chase was very long: for it continued all night, vntill such time as the ROMAINS were wearied with killing, taking of prisoners, and packing vp of all kinds of spoiles. Titus Liuius saith, that there were slaine moe men in the first battell, but greater personages in the second: and the chiefest of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus heart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to go farther into the country, euen vtterly to destroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumne, (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that season haue thought) there fell out so great a cold, that for the most part, it did nothing but snow: and if the element did any thing cleare, then froze it so hard, that the horse could come by no water, the riuers were so extreamely congealed with ice. And there could no man passe ouer by foord: for they did not so soone enter, but the ice brake and cut the veines and sinewes of the horse legs asunder, they were so hard and thicke withall. And furthermore the country being full of trees, woods and forrests, and the waies very narrow, not being able to passe by the fields, they were through wet with snow that fell vpon them: and when they came to their lodging, then it was worse, for there they were constrained to lye in soft and moist places. And therefore the souldiers had followed but few daies after this battell, but they refused to go any farther. And first they sent their Colonels and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leaue off this iourney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in troupes, and in the night time began to murmure and groine in their tents (which is a certaine signe and token of a mutinous armie, that hath a mind to rebell against their Generall) although that Lucullus vsed all gentle persuasions to win them with patience to abide this iourney, at the least, till time they might take the citie of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to the end they might there destroy the worke and memorie of the greatest enemy that euer the ROMAINES had in the world, meaning Hannibal. But when he saw all this wold not preuaile, he brought them backe againe, & passed ouer mount Taurus another way, and came downe into the country called MYGDONIA, a very hote and fertile soile, where there is a great citie, and maruellously replenished with inhabitants: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS call it ANTIOCH of MYGDONIA. In that city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes owne brother: but for experience in engines of battery, and for sufficiencie and skill in such matters, there was Callimachus also, he that so maruellously troubled Lucullus before at the siege of the city of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this citie besieged the same by all such meanes as might enforce it, & that so valiantly, that in very short time he tooke it by assault. And as for Gouras, who submitted himselfe to Lucullus mercie, he was very curteously intreated. But for Callimachus, he wold not once heare him speake, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would saue his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but himselfe only. But Lucullus commaunded them to bring him with gyues to receiue the punishment he had iustly deserued, for setting the city of AMISVS on fire, and taking from him the meane to shew the GRECIANS his goodnes, affection & liberality towards them. Vntill this present time, it might be truly said, that good fortune euer fauored & followed Lucullus in all his enterprises and affaires: but from that time forwards, it was quickly seene that the fauorable blast of fortune failed him, he did all his things with so great paine, and al that he did, fell out contrarie vnto him, and to very ill purpose. Indeed he did euer shew the valiancie, patience, and great courage that should be in a valiant General, or Lieutenant of an army. But his exploits and doings had neuer after that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to haue: but to the contrary, he was like to haue lost all that he had won before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the brawles and vaine contention he had with his people to no purpose. But the worst was, that they make himselfe the onely author of all these euils: because he could not, or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multitude of his souldiers: thinking that whatsoeuer a Generall, or any other officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he hath vnder his charge, is to dishonour himselfe, and to giue cause vnto his souldiers to despise his authoritie. But that which made most against him was this: that he gaue no estimation to gentlemen, and men of like qualitie to himself, but disdained them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For these they say were his faults and imperfections, but otherwise that he wanted no vertues, nor naturall giftes and good conditions that could be possibly wished for or desired. For he was a tall gentleman, of goodly presence, well spoken, wise and discreete, as well in matters of gouernment, as in warres: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encourage his souldiers in warre. Salust writeth of him, that his souldiers began to mislike with him, euen from the first entrie into these warres, because he made them lye out two winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the city of CIZICVS, & the other before the citie of AMISVS. And euen as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them: for either they lay in their enemies country, or else if they lay in their friends, yet he made them campe abroad in the field, and shrowd themselues in their tents: for Lucullus neuer entred with his armie into any citie or confederate towne of GRECE. Now if the souldiers of themselues misliked Lucullus, the Oratours at ROME that were his enemies, and enuied his prosperity and glory, gaue them yet greater occasions to mutine against him. For they continually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out this warre in length, purposely because he would alwaies haue occasion to rule, and meanes to get, hauing in his hands in maner all CILICIA, ASIA, BITHYNIA, PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTVS, ARMENIA, and all the prouinces and regions as farre as to the riuer of Phasis: and yet he had not long before spoiled the princely houses of Tigranes, as if he had bene sent thither only to sacke and spoile, and not to destroy and ouercome those kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors that spake these words. It was he also that most moued the people to take order that Lucullus shold be called home, and other sent to succeed him in the charge and gouernment of the countries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane it was also ordained, that diuers which were vnder his charge, should be dispenced withall for their oaths, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But besides these and such like great causes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, and that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other euils being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licentious, and a harebraind man. He was Lucullus wiues brother, and she was so light of her body, that Clodius her brother was accused of incontinencie with her. This Clodius being at that time in Lucullus campe, caried not that estimation and credit he thought himselfe worthy of. For he tooke himselfe equall with the best, and would needes haue bene holden for chiefe: when indeed there were many of farre better desert, he being noted both for a vicious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he beganne for spite to suborne the bands called FIMBRIANS, and to stirre them vp against Lucullus, sowing sweet and pleasant words amongst the soldiers, which being wonted thereunto, looked still to be flattered. For they were those whom Fimbria had procured to kill the Consull Flaccus, and chuse him in his stead for their Captaine. By reason whereof they gaue good eare to Clodius words, and called him a noble Captaine, and a louer of souldiers. For when he spake vnto them, he made as though he had pitied them, for that they should neuer see an end of their great paines and warres, but should miserably consume their dayes in fighting continually, sometime with one nation, and sometime with another: and that they wandred through all the countries of the world, receiuing no worthy reward of so long and painefull seruice, seruing onely to guard Lucullus carts and cammels loden with plate and vessell of gold and siluer and other precious stones. Where the souldiers that had serued vnder Pompey, tooke now their ease at home in their country with their wiues and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly faire cities, as rich Burgesses and wealthie citizens: and yet they had not driuen Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdoms, into desert places vnhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houses of ASIA, but onely made a litle warre in SPAINE against those that were banished, and in ITALIE against fugitiue slaues. Shall we then, said he, carie harnesse on our backes all the daies of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped vntill this present, reserue our selues, our bodies and liues for that noble Captaine, who esteemeth the greatest honour and glory he can atchieue vnto, is to make his soldiers rich that serue vnder him? Lucullus army was so seduced and corrupted with these mutinous and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no longer follow him, neither against

Publius Clodius stirred vp the souldiers against Lucullus.

Tigranes, nor againſt Mithridates: who went preſently out of ARMENIA into his realme of PONTVS, and began to conquer it againe, whileſt the ROMAINE ſouldiers mutining againſt their Generall, remained idle in the prouince of GORDIÆNA, excuſing themſelues by the winter ſeaſon, and tarying vntill Pompey or ſome other captaine ſhould quickly come to raiſe the ſiege, and ſucceede Lucullus. Notwithſtanding, when they vnderſtood that Mithridates had ouerthrowne Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went againſt Sornatius and Triarius: they were then aſhamed of themſelues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauerie, when he heard that Lucullus drew neare, made haſt to win the victory, as if it had bene cock ſure before Lucullus came: and was himſelfe ouerthrowne in a great battell, where ſome ſay there died aboue ſeuen thouſand ROMAINES, amongſt the which were a hundred and fiftie Centurions, and 24 Captaines or Colonels of a thouſand men apeece, and yet beſides, Mithridates tooke their campe alſo. Shortly after this ouerthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the ſouldiers ſought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he proued ſundry meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once ſtirre abroad, becauſe he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mightie power. Wherupon he determined againe to go againſt Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he ioyned forces together. But as he was in his iourney towards him, the FIMBRIAN bands began to rebell anew, and would not follow his enſignes, ſaying, and alleaging for themſelues, that by decree of the people they had leaue to depart, and were diſcharged from their oath: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to commaund them, conſidering that the gouernment of the prouinces which he had, was giuen vnto others. Lucullus perceiuing this, did ſo humble himſelfe vnto them, ſuppoſing that way to win them, as there was no kind of vncomely humilitie, but he ſubmitted himſelfe vnto it: inſomuch as he went into their tents to pray and intreate them one after another, with water in his eyes, and with ſo great lowlines, as euen to ſhake hands with them. But they fiercely reiected all his courteſies and faire intreaties, caſting their pennileſſe purſes before him, and angrily bade him fight with his enemies alone, ſince he had with the ſpoile of them all ſo well enriched himſelfe alone. Neuertheleſſe, at the interceſſion and earneſt requeſt of the other ſouldiers, theſe FIMBRIAN bands were compelled to promiſe, that they would yet tarry all that ſommer, ſo that if no man in the meane time offered them battell, at the end of the terme, they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condition, or elſe to remaine alone, and conſequently to forſake the country of the barbarous people. With much ado thus he kept them together, but in ſuch ſort, as he durſt no more venture to compell them to come to battell, contenting himſelfe that they were willing onely to ſtay with him, being forced to ſuffer Tigranes in the meane time to deſtroy and ouerrun the countrey of CAPPADOCIA, and Mithridates alſo to brag againe, of whom he had before written to the Senate that he had vtterly ouercome him: inſomuch as there came commiſſioners and deputies from ROME by his owne procurement, to order the ſtate of the realme of PONTVS with him, as of a kingdome alreadie wonne to the ROMAINE Empire. But when they were come, they found him not maiſter of himſelfe, and that his owne ſouldiers flouted him, and did him all the ſpite and iniurie they could. For they were ſo vnruly towards their Captaine, and did ſomuch diſdaine him, that when the end of the ſommer was come, they armed themſelues with armour and weapon, and drawing out their ſwords in mockerie, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the field: and after they had made the noiſe and cries accuſtomed when they ioyned battell, and made as though they fought, hurling and ſwinging their ſwords in the aire, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promiſed Lucullus to tary. On the other ſide, Pompey had written vnto the other ſouldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him: for through the peoples fauor at ROME, the practiſes and flatteries of the common counſellers there, he was ſubſtituted Generall in Lucullus place: which much miſliked the Senate and nobility: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to haue a ſucceſſor ſent, not to ſucceed him in troubles and dangers, but in glory and honor of triumph. And that they ſhould compell him not only to reſigne vp the office of a Generall to another, but (for the good ſeruice he long time had done) the reward of his honor due for the ſame: and this alſo more miſliked thē that were then about him. That ſo ſoone as Pompey was arriued in ASIA, he tooke all power and authority from Lucullus, to puniſh or reward any man for good or ill ſeruice done to the cōmonwealth in thoſe warres, and did moreouer prohibite by publike billes ſet vp in euery common place, that they ſhould no more repaire vnto him, nor obey ought that he, or any of the tenne Commiſſioners ſent to diſpoſe of the ſtate of the prouinces wonne by him, ſhould commaund or ordaine: and becauſe Pompey came with a greater power and armie then his, he was in ſome feare of him. Their friends thought good neuertheleſſe they ſhould meete together: and ſo they did incontinently, in a village of GALATIA, where at the firſt meeting they ſaluted each other very courteouſly, reioycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of greater dignitie, becauſe he had bene Generall of the ROMAINE people in many warres, and had alreadie triumphed twiſe. The bundels of rodds which the Sergeants caried before them, were wreathed about with laurell braunches for the victories they had both atchieued: but Pompeys bundels were withered away, becauſe they had come a long iourney through hote and drie countries. Lucullus officers ſeeing theirs withered, courteouſly gaue them of theirs freſh and new gathered: which Pompeys friends tooke for a ſigne of good lucke. For to ſay truly, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cauſe of the honour that Pompey afterwards wanne. Howbeit in the end for all their talke, they were no whit the better friends: but departed the one from the other more ſtrange then they met. For Pompey by a plaine Edict, brake, reuoked and diſanulled all Lucullus ordinances, and taking from him all his other ſouldiers, left him but onely ſixteene hundred to accompany his triumph, and yet they followed him with vnwilling minds: ſuch was Lucullus imperfection and maime, either by nature or frowardneſſe of fortune, that he lacked the chiefeſt thing a Generall ſhould haue, which was, to be beloued of his ſouldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongſt many other his excellent vertues, and magnanimitie, wiſedome, iudgement and iuſtice, the riuer of Euphrates had not bene the vttermoſt confines of the Empire of ROME on ASIA ſide, but it had extended as farre as the ſea Hyrcane, yea euen vnto the vtmoſt part of the world. For king Tigranes had alreadie conquered the other nations that lye beyond that, ſauing the countrie of PARTHIA, which then was not ſo great nor ſtrong, as it appeared afterwards in Craſſus time: nor ſo ioyned and knit together, but (what through ciuill diſſentions amongſt them at home, and forraine warres of their neighbours abroad) was ſo weake, that with great difficulty they could defend themſelues from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their skinnes. But to take things rightly as they be indeede, me thinkes that Lucullus did more hurt vnto his country by other, then he did benefit the ſame by himſelfe. For the tokens of triumph and victories which he wanne in ARMENIA ſo neare vnto the PARTHIANS, the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS which he had ſacked and ſpoiled, the great treaſure that he brought to ROME, and the Diademe alſo of Tigranes, which was ſhewed in triumph as a priſoner with the reſt: moued Craſſus with ſuch a maruellous deſire to paſſe into ASIA, as if all the barbarous people had bene nothing but an aſſured ſpoile, and a prey expoſed vnto all thoſe that would come to take them. But Craſſus farre otherwiſe finding him ſelfe gauled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by proofe, that Lucullus had not ſo much ouercome his enemies for that they wanted skill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wiſedome and valiantneſſe. But that ſhall be ſeene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found firſt of all his brother Marcus accuſed by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of Treaſurer in Syllaes time, and by his commaundement, whereof he was cleared by ſentence of the Iudges. But Memmius of ſpite turned his anger againſt Lucullus ſelfe, ſtirring vp the people againſt him, and letting them vnderſtand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much part of the treaſure, which ſhould haue come to the commonwealth, and that to worke his feate the better, he had prolonged theſe warres as he did: wherefore he perſwaded them flatly to denie him the honour of his triumph. And truly Lucullus was in great daunger to haue loſt it vtterly: but that the Noblemen of the citie, and they that were of greateſt authoritie, intermedled themſelues with the tribes when they came to paſſe it by voices of the people, whom they intreated ſo much through ſute and perſwaſion, that in the end, with much ado, the people ſuffered him to enter the citie in triumph. So Lucullus made a triumphant entrie, not terrible nor troubleſome for the long ſhew or ſight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither with him, as many other Captaines had done before him. For he cauſed the ſhew-place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be ſet out and furniſhed chiefly with armour and weapons of the enemies to a maruellous number: and with the kings engines and inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleaſant ſight to behold. And in this ſhew, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, ten carts of warre armed with ſythes that paſſed by, and threeſcore of the chiefeſt friends and Captaines of the two kings that were led priſoners through the citie. And there were alſo drawne after them, an hundred and ten gallies all armed in the prores with ſtrong ſpurres of copper, and a ſtatue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, ſixe foot high, with a rich target ſet with precious ſtones. Beſides all that, there were twentie cupbords as full of ſiluer plate as could be, and thirtie cupbords full alſo of golden veſſell, armour and coine of gold, caried vpon mens ſhoulders. After them followed eight mules laden with golden beddes, and ſixe and fiftie other mules that caried ſiluer bullion, and a hundred and ſeuen other mules that caried ſiluer coine, amounting to the ſumme of two hundred threeſcore and ten thouſand Seſtertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of account caried alſo, wherein were particularly written the ſummes of money which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre againſt pyrates on the ſea, and vnto the treaſurers and high treaſurers, to put into the ſparing coffers of the common wealth at Rome. And afterwards in an article by it ſelfe, that he had giuen nine hundred and fiftie Drachmas to euery ſouldier by the polle. After the ſhew of this triumph was ended, he made a generall feaſt, in the which he feaſted all the citie and villages thereabouts, which the Romaines call Vicos. And afterwards forſooke his wife Clodia for her vnchaſt and wanton life, and maried Seruilia Catoes ſiſter: howbeit he wanne nothing by the exchange, for he ſped as euill with the ſecond as he did with the firſt. For, ſauing that ſhe was not ſlaundered with the inceſt of her owne brethren, otherwiſe ſhe was as diſhoneſt and vnchaſt as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers ſake, but at the length grew wearie of her, & put her away as he had done Clodia. Now when he had filled the Senate with a maruellous hope and expectation of him (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withſtand Pompeys tyrannie, and to vphold and maintaine the authoritie of the nobility and Senate againſt the people, for that by his noble deedes he had atchieued ſo great fame and reputation) he ſuddenly gaue ouer al dealings in the affaires of the commonwealth: either becauſe he ſaw it ſo beſt, being a hard thing now to keepe it from ruine: or elſe (as other ſaid) for that he felt himſelfe ſufficiently furniſhed with honour and wealth, and therefore determined from thencefoorth to liue quietly all at his eaſe, after ſo great paines, trauels and troubles, the end whereof fell not out ouer fortunately. And ſurely ſome were of his mind, and liked this great chaunge of his maruellous wel: becauſe he did not as Marius did, neither hapned on the ill ſucceſſe and end that Marius had. For Marius after the notable victories which he brought from the Cimbres, and after his valiant acts in wars which had wonne him great honour, yet would he not ſo leaue off, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glorie: but of an vnſatiable mind, and ambitious deſire to rule and beare ſway, (being withall a very old man) went and ſorted himſelfe amongſt young men deſirous of gouernment, who brought him not only to commit many outrages, but made himſelfe alſo to ſuffer greater cruelties. It is thought alſo that Cicero had ended his aged courſe more happily, if after he had quenched Catilines conſpiracie, he had then taken his eaſe. And ſo had Scipio in like caſe, if when he had ioyned Numantia vnto Carthage, he wold thē haue quieted himſelfe. And therefore, ſome ſay, that there is a certaine reuolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wiſe man ſhould meddle any more with the affaires of the commonwealth: no more then a man whoſe youth and ſtrength is gone and decayed, is any more fit to iuſt, wraſtle, or enter into ſuch exerciſes of the body. But contrarily, Craſſus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, becauſe he gaue himſelfe ſo much to pleaſure and paſtime: as if to liue pleaſantly & delicately did not worſe become his age, then to command an armie, or to gouerne the affaires of a common weale. And for my part, reading Lucullus life, me thinks that I reade an auncient Comedy, the beginning whereof is tedious, and the latter end ioyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you find notable exploits done by him in warres, and great good gouernment alſo in peace: but in the end they all turned into feaſts and banquets, and lacking litle of maskes & mummeries, dancing with torches, and all other ſuch delights fit for young men. For I bring within the compaſſe and reckening of his fineneſſe and pleaſures, his ſumptuous buildings, his ſtately walks and galleries, his hot-houſes and ſtoues, his tables and pictures, his ſtatues alſo, and the great workemanſhip and curioſitie he had beſides of all other arts by him gotten together out of all parts, to his infinite charge: abuſing therein the world of goods and treaſure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwiſe. Inſomuch, that notwithſtanding exceſſe and ſuperfluitie hath euer ſince increaſed vntill this preſent time, yet they recken the gardens Lucullus made, to be the most sumptuous and delicatest places that the Emperors haue. And therefore Tubero the Stoicke Philosopher, hauing seene these stately works which Lucullus had caused to be made neare vnto NAPLES, by the sea side (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged vpon vaults) and great ditches cast by force to make the sea passe and run through his houses, to keepe fish therein, and lodgings also that he built in the sea it selfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gowneman, as if he would haue said, Xerxes the ROMAINE.

Lucullus called Xerxes the gowneman. Xerxes cut through the mountaine Atho, and made a channell for his ships to passe through.

For euen so did Xerxes in old time cause the mountaine Atho to be cut in sunder, and a channell to be digged there to passe his ships through. He had also many other pleasant places within the territories of ROME neare vnto THVSCVLVM, where there were great large haules set vpon tarrasses to see round about far off in the day time. And Pompey going thither sometime to see him, reproued him greatly, telling him that he had built a maruellous faire sommer house, but not to be dwelt in in the winter season. Lucullus laughing, answered him: do ye thinke me to haue lesse wit and reason then storkes or cranes, that I cannot shift houses according to the season? And another time there was a Prætor of ROME, that making playes to shew the people pastime, sent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to set foorth his players: Lucullus made him answer, that he would cause his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demaunding of him how many he should neede, the other answered, that a hundred would serue his turne. Whereupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furnish him with two hundred, if his case so required. And therfore the Poet Horace writing this storie, addeth to a notable exclamation against superfluity, saying: that men thinke that a poore house, where there is no more riches then necessarie, and where there is not more then appeareth in sight, and that the maister knoweth of. He was a vaine man in his ordinarie seruice at his boord, not only in that his beds whereon he fed, were couered with rich carpets of purple, and himselfe serued in gold and siluer vessell set with precious stones, and that there was dauncing, musicke, playes, and other such like pastimes of ordinarie: but also for that he was continually serued with al sorts of fine dainty dishes, with works of pastry, banquetting dishes, and fruit curiously wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondred at of men of simple vnderstanding and meane condition. Therefore was Pompey maruellously esteemed, and specially for a word he spake one day when he was sicke, and that the Phisitian had willed him to eate of a Thrush. For when his seruants told him they were hard to come by in sommer, but at Lucullus house where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wise they should aske any of him, but said vnto his Phisitian: What if Lucullus were not giuen to pleasure, could not Pompey liue? And so willed them to get him some other such thing, as they might more easily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend and kinsman both, & yet he so much misliked his maner of liuing & ordinarie expence, that one day a yong man making a long and tedious oration in open Senate (out of time, & to no purpose) touching meane diet, sobrietie, and temperance of life: Cato could no longer abide him, but rose vp, and said vnto him: What, wilt thou not leaue babling to vs al day: thou that art rich as Crassus, that liuest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirme that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them: neuertheless it is certaine, by the notable sayings they haue gathered of Lucullus, he did not only delight to liue so delicatly, but also he gloried in it. Some write that he feasted certaine GRECIANS many daies together in his house, that were come out of GRECE to ROME: and that they being men brought vp with the sobrietie and simplicity of GRECE, after they had bene feasted there diuers times, were ashamed, and refused to go thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supposing that he had made them this great cheare for their owne sakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: my Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that: indeed I must needes graunt that there is somewhat more then ordinarie to welcome you withall: but I tell you truly, the most part is for Lucullus sake. Another time when he supped alone, and his men had laid but one boord, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his steward to know why he was serued so: the steward answered him: My lord, because I saw you send for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What said he againe: knewest not thou that Lucullus shold sup to night with himself? In fine, Lucullus fare was so well knowne through ROME, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble housekeeping. Wherupon, Cicero & Pompey being desirous to see the proofe thereof, came one day to him in the market place seeing him at leysure: for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey (though there was some iarre betweene them for matters of warres) did not let for all that

to come vnto him, and to ſpeake gently one to another. And Cicero after he had ſaluted him, aſked him if he would be contented they ſhould come and ſee him. Oh, ſayd he, with all my heart: I pray you come to me. Well then, ſayd Cicero, Pompey and I will come and ſup with you to night, with condition that you prouide no more then your ordinarie: Lucullus told them againe, they ſhould then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they taried till to morow. But they would none of that, no nor ſuffer him to ſpeake with his men, for feare he ſhould command them to prouide ſomewhat more then for himſelfe. Neuertheleſſe, at his deſire they ſuffered him onely in their preſence aloud to tell one of his men, that he would ſup that night in Apollo: (for ſo was one of the moſt ſtately and ſumptuous haules of his houſe called) and with that word onely he finely deceiued them both, and they neuer found him. For euerie haule had his certaine ſumme and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery ſupper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and ſeruice for the ſame. So that when his ſeruants had their watch-word but in what haule he would ſup, they knew ſtraight what charge he would be at for his ſupper, and what orders ſhould be obſerued therein. Now Lucullus maner was to ſpend when he made any feaſt in the haule of Apollo, fifty thouſand pence, and that ſelfe day the ſupper was prepared according to that value: inſomuch as Pompey maruelled how it could be poſſible that a ſupper of ſo exceeding great charge could be ſo ſuddenly prepared. In ſuch things therefore did Lucullus lauiſhly and riotouſly ſpend his goods, like ſpoiles indeed gotten of ſlaues and barbarous people. But that eſpecially which he beſtowed vpon bookes, was a very commendable and honeſt expence. For he had gathered together a great number of notable hiſtories, the vſe whereof was more honour to him, then the hauing of them. For his library was euer open to all commers, and they ſuffered the Grecians to come into his goodly tarraſſes & faire walkes, or other pleaſant places thereabouts conuenient to ſit and reaſon together, and neuer ſhut doore againſt them: where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes ſpent the whole day in conference together, as in the houſe of the Muſes, being verie glad when other matters were diſpatched, they had ſo much leiſure as but to go thither. And Lucullus ſelfe would alſo many times be amongſt them, in thoſe tarreſſes and pleaſant walkes, delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to diſpatch them that had any buſineſſe with him, and graunted the thing they requeſted of him. To conclude, his houſe was a common receipt for all them that came from Grece to Rome. He loued all maner of Philoſophy, and refuſed no ſect of the ſame. But from his youth vpward, he euer loued and eſteemed beſt the Academicke ſect, not that which they call the new Academicke (although it flouriſhed at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made ſuch eſtimation of) but the old Academicke, which the Philoſopher Antiochus of the citie of Ascalon did defend & maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rhetoritian and well ſpoken, whom Lucullus ſought to winne by all meanes, to make him his friend, and to haue him in houſe with him: becauſe he might inuey againſt Philoes hearers and followers, whoſe ſcholer Cicero among the reſt was, that wrote a notable booke againſt this old Academicke ſect. And in the ſame he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old Academickes: who hold, that a man may certainly know and comprehend ſomething, and called that Catalepſin: but Cicero defended the contrarie. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we haue rehearſed before) verie good friends, and had both one ſelfe deſire for gouernement in the common wealth. For Lucullus did not ſo withdraw himſelfe from matters of ſtate, that he would no more meddle at all, nor heare ſpeake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition and contention, as a thing of no ſmall danger, and breeding great reproch and diſhonour to Marcus Craſſus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authoritie. And theſe two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raiſed vp to withſtand Pompeys greatneſſe, being affraid of him, after that Lucullus had refuſed the chiefe place of authoritie. But otherwiſe, Lucullus would be in the market place at courts and common councels, to pleaſure his friends when they requeſted him: and would go to the Senate alſo, when there was occaſion to breake any new practiſe, or to ouerthrow Pompeys ambitious pollicie. For he ouerthrew all the orders and conſtitutions that Pompey had made, after he had ouercome the kings, Mithridates and Tigranes: and with the helpe of Cato hindred a diſtribution of money which Pompey had written for to Rome, to be beſtowed amongſt his ſouldiers. Whereupon Pompey fell in friendſhip (or to ſpeake more plainely, in conſpiracie) with Craſſus and Cæſar, by whoſe helpe and aſſiſtance, he filled Rome with armes and ſouldiers: and made the people by force to paſſe and confirme what he would haue done, after he had violently expulſed Lucullus and Cato out of the market place. Whereat the noblemen were much offended, and miſliking the great wrong they had offered Lucullus and Cato, Pompeys followers ſuborned a * BRVTIAN, and ſayd he was taken lying in waite to kill Pompey. Whereupon the ſayd BRVTIAN being examined by the Senate, named certaine: but when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, ſaying that he had hired him to kill Pompey. But no man beleeued him: for they perceiued openly in the market place, that he was procured by themſelues falſly to accuſe Lucullus, and Pompeys other aduerſaries. And this was proued more plainely within few dayes after, when they threw the body of this BRVTIAN dead in the middeſt of the ſtreete, out of the priſon: who they ſaid died of himſelfe with ſickneſſe. Howbeit the markes being plainly ſeene of the halter wherewith they had ſtrangled him, and the ſtripes appearing alſo which they had giuen him, did plainly ſhew that they themſelues did it, whom after they had ſuborned to accuſe Lucullus, they ſlue in this maner. This was the cauſe why Lucullus did more then before abſent himſelfe from medling in publicke cauſes: but after, when he ſaw that they had ſo wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes alſo to conuey Cato farre inough off, vnder pretenced colour to ſend him with charge into the Ile of CYPRVS: then he gaue vp altogether. Some write that a litle before his death, he was not perfit in his wits, decaying through age by litle and litle. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos ſayth, that it was not for age, nor ſickneſſe that his wits did alter, but through poyſon which one of his ſlaues had giuen him, whom he had made free, called Calliſthenes: who gaue it him, not of any euill intent, but becauſe his maiſter ſhould loue him the more, ſuppoſing that this poyſon had power to make him loue him. But he troubled his wits ſo much with this poyſon, that Lucullus while he liued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouerſee his goods. Notwithſtanding this when he was dead, he was as much bewailed and lamented of all the people, as if he had died in his beſt credit, and greateſt proſperity. For all the people ran to honour his funerals, and his bodie was caried to the place, by the young noblemen of the citie. The people would in any caſe haue buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But becauſe no man thought of it before, and alſo for that things neceſſary were not eaſily to be prouided for the place: his brother Marcus beſought the people they would be content his funerals might be at a towne of his owne, neare vnto the city of THVSCVLVM, where his tombe was prepared, and he himſelfe liued not long time after.

For as Lucullus both in age, and honor, had not left him farre behind him: ſo did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwaies dearely loued him, he could not then long liue, and ſuruiue him.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

NOthing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happie, then to dye when he did, before he ſaw the chaunge and alteration of the common weale, which the fatall deſtinies plagued the ROMAINES withall, with ſedition and ciuill warres: and that he died in his countrey yet enioying her libertie, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that (aboue all other things) he was likeſt vnto Cimon: who died whileſt the GRECIANS were in good loue and peace with other, and not in broile of diſcord and ciuill warres. Indeed Cimon died in his campe, being Generall of his countrey, at the ſiege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, not withdrawne to his home, as one wearied, liuing idly, or leading a voluptuous life in feaſts and banquets, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphs: but as Plato ſayd (when he wiſely blamed and reproued Orpheus, who promiſeth perpetuall drunkenneſſe in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that liued well in this life) merily. And truly it is a great comfort and contentation of mind, for an old man feebled with age, and compelled by weakeneſſe, to withdraw himſelfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernement in peace, as in warres: and quietly to paſſe his time in ſtudy, where delight is ioyned with honeſt contemplation. But to finiſh his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleaſure, as vnto their onely end, and moreouer, to grow old by pleaſure and vanitie, ſolemnizing Venus feaſt all the reſt of his life, after he had made ſuch warres, and commaunded ſuch armies: that me thinkes a thing vnworthie of an honeſt ACADEMICKE, and altogether vnmeete for one profeſſing old Xenocrates doctrine, but fit rather for a man giuen ouer altogether to Epicurus diſcipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be conſidered of in theſe two men, that the ones youth was altogether vicious and reprochfull, and the others to the contrarie, honeſt and vertuous. But he is the better that chaungeth for the better: and that nature is alwayes more commendable, in whom vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young: then that which by continuance of time ſheweth ſtill the contrarie. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one ſelfe meane: but they did not both alike vſe their riches. For it were to no purpoſe to compare the buildings of the wall that ſtandeth South within the caſtell of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cimon brought thither, with the fine built chambers, and high raiſed turrets to gaſe afarre, and enuironed about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the ſpoiles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimons table alſo of moderate fare and diet, but yet open to euerie man, comparable to Lucullus boord: which was ſumptuouſly furniſhed, and ſhewed the greatneſſe of his Lord. For Cimons boord fed many mouthes daily with a ſmall charge: and Lucullus table exceeded in expence, to feede a few, with ſuperfluous dainties. Vnleſſe they will ſay, that time

A good gift to decay vice, and to increaſe vertue.

caused this difference betweene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leisure to haue withdrawne himselfe to quiet in age from gouernement and armes, he also would not haue led a more sumptuous and dissolute life, giuen to all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loued wine, banquets, and playes, and was also giuen to women, as we haue told you before. But prosperitie, and fortunate successe of things do bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises, that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine desires. And therefore had Lucullus died abroad in the warres, whilest he commaunded armies, there had not bene that liuing man, how curious soeuer he had bene to reproue other mens faults, that could haue detected him of any reprochfull vice. And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres: no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by sea as by land. And like as in games of prise and exercises of bodie which are shewed in GREECE, they that in one selfe day winne the games at wrestling, and weapons both, are called by a straunge custome, not conquerours onely, but victours also, to honour them withall: euen so me thinkes that Cimon in like case hauing in one selfe day crowned GREECE with two notable markes of triumph, for two battels he wanne, the one by sea, and the other by land, deserueth to haue some place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreouer, Lucullus receiued the authority to commaund, of his countrey and common wealth: but Cimon gaue his countrey both authority and abilitie to commaund. Lucullus found his countrey a commaunding people to all their friends and confederates: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily, found his countrey marching vnder anothers ensigne, and through his valiantnesse did so behaue himselfe, that he made his citie go before her confederates, and triumph ouer her enemies: compelling the PERSIANS by force to giue them the rule by sea, and perswading the LACEDÆMONIANS willingly to giue place vnto them by land. Now if the chiefest thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make himselfe to be beloued of his souldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his souldiers, and Cimon esteemed and wondred at, euen of the confederates themselues. For Lucullus was forsaken of his owne men: and Cimon was followed by verie strangers, for the confederates did ioyne together with him. Lucullus returned home into his countrey, forsaken of those he caried out with him. Cimon returned againe, commaunding them that were sent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his countrey three notable things, and hard for them to haue compassed: to wit, made peace with the enemies, giuen them authoritie and rule of their confederates, and ioyned friendship with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them vndertooke to destroy great Empires, and conquer all ASIA: but neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him off on the sudden being Generall, and when his affaires prospered best. The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or because he would not satisfie the complaints and griefes of his men, which caused them so much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be sayd also, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his countrey for the space of ten yeares, because that in ten yeares space (as Plato sayth) they should no more heare him speake. For to say truly, it seldome times happeneth, that the graue wits of noble men do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people: because they striuing continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieue them as much, as surgeons do their patients when they bind vp their sores with bands to cure them. For though by that binding they restore and bring to their naturall places againe the broken bones or members out of ioynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinkes neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus went a great deale farther with his armie, then euer Cimon did. For he was the first ROMAINE captaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, & the riuer of Tigris with an armie. He tooke and burnt almost in sight of both the kings, the royall cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCERTA, CABIRA, SINOPE, and NICIBIS. Towards the North, he went as farre as the riuer of Phasis: towards the East, into MEDIA: and Southward, euen to the red sea, and vnto the Realmes of ARABIA, subduing all vnto the ROMAINE Empire. And hauing ouerthrowne all the power of these two mightie kings, he tooke from them all, but their persons onely: who fled and hid themselues like wild beasts, in infinite deserts and vnpassable forrests. Wherein is easily discerned the difference betwixt

Cimons two victories obtained in one day.

Great difference betwixt Cimon and Lucullus.

Graue Magistrates resembled by similitude vnto good Surgeons.

betwixt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor ouerthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediatly after against the GRECIANS, and ouerthrew the greatest part of their armie in EGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding himselfe altogether pulled downe on his knees, and broken by the former battels: durst neuer once onely shew his armie vnto Pompey, out of the strength of his campe, but fled into the Realme of BOSPHORVS, where he died. And Tigranes, he went and humbled himselfe on his knees, vnarmed and without weapon, vnto Pompey: and taking his diademe off from his head, layed it at his feete, not flattering him for the victories he had wonne, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reason whereof he scaped good cheape, and thought himselfe happie, when Pompey gaue him onely the marke and title of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the more worthie Captaine, and stoutest champion, that leaueth his enemie in weake estate for him that followeth, and shall fight afterwards with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the king of PERSIA ouer-harried, the pride and fiercenesse of the PERSIANS layed a ground, by many great battels they had lost before vnto Themistocles, king Pausanias, and Leotychides, who had ouerthrowne them: and going now againe to fight afresh with them, it was an easie thing to ouercome the bodies of those, whose hearts were alreadie vanquished. Where Lucullus to the contrary, assailed Tigranes, that had neuer bene ouercome, but bare a maruellous loftie mind with him, for the many great battels and conquests he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison betweene those that Cimon ouerthrew, and those that were raunged in battell against Lucullus. So that all things weighed and considered, it were hard to iudge which of them two proued the worthiest man: for that it seemeth, that the gods did fauour both the one and the other, telling the one what he should do, and the other what he should not do. And thus it appeareth by testimonie of the gods, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euerlasting glory.

THE LIFE OF Nicias.

I Haue reaſon (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Craſſus, and the euents that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with thoſe that befell the other in SICILE: yet am I to pray them that ſhall happen to reade my writings, not to thinke me in entermedling with thoſe matters (in the deſcribing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond himſelfe, both for varietie and liuelineſſe of narration, as alſo in choice and excellent words) to haue the like intent and opinion, that Timæus the hiſtoriographer had. Who, hoping by the grauitie and life of his words and reports, to darken the glorie of Thucydides, and make Philiſtus (in compariſon of himſelfe) appeare ignorant, and without any grace of hiſtoricall narration: hath in his hiſtorie of purpoſe ſought occaſion to enter into the deſcribing of thoſe battels by ſea and by land, and the report of thoſe ſpeeches and orations, which are deliuered by them with great iudgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neare them whom he contends to paſſe, as doth the footman to the LYDIAN coach, as ſayth Pindarus: and beſides ſheweth himſelfe fond and of ſmall iudgement, or as Diphilus ſaith:

The praiſe of of Thucydides.

Timæus follies.

A lubber laden with Sicylian greaſe.

And in diuers places, he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he ſayeth, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Captaine (whoſe name was deriued of this word Nice, ſignifying victorie) diſſwaded their attempts againſt SICILE: and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to ſay, the images of Mercury) it was foreſhewed that they ſhould receiue great ouerthrowes by the Generall of the SYRACVSANS, called Hermocrates, the ſonne of Hermon. And further, that it was not vnlikely that Hercules did fauour the SYRACVSANS, by reaſon of the goddeſſe Proſerpina (protectour and defendor of the citie of SYRACVSA) to requite her for that ſhe gaue him Cerberus the dogge, porter of hell: and that he did malice the ATHENIANS beſides, becauſe they tooke the ÆGESTÆANS parts (who came of the TROYANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promiſe and faith with him, whoſe city himſelfe had ouerthrowne in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon king of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timæus ſhewes as much wit and iudgement, in deliuering vs ſuch toyes in an hiſtorie: as he doth in correcting the ſtyle of Philiſtus, or in condemning and railing on Plato and Ariſtotle. But in my fanſie, this ambition and contention to write or to ſpeake more clearely then others, ſheweth alwayes a baſe enuious mind, like a ſcholler full of ſchoole points.

Timæus reproueth Plato and Ariſtotle.

But

But when it striueth with things that for their excellence are past imitation, then is it extreme folly and madnesse. Since therefore I may not passe ouer nor omit certaine things, which Thucydides and Philistus haue alreadie set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the varietie of his successes and fortune did couer: I must lightly touch them, and report so much as is necessarie and conuenient, least men condemne me, for slouth and negligence. And in the rest I haue endeuoured to gather and propound things not commonly marked and knowne, which I haue collected as well out of sundry mens workes and ancient records, as out of many old antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will serue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be sayd that which Aristotle hath written of him, that there were three famous citizens of Athens, very honest men, and which fauoured the communaltie with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the sonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the sonne of Milesius, and Theramenes the sonne of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest account: for he is flouted as a forreiner borne in the Ile of Ceos, and challenged besides for inconstant and irresolute in matters of state and gouernment: and inclining sometimes to one faction, sometimes to another: he was called Cothurnus, a kind of buskin indifferently seruing for both legges, and in old time was vsed of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good acts in fauour of the nobility against Pericles, who alwayes tooke part with the inferiour sort. Nicias that was the yonger, had reasonable estimation in Pericles life time: for he was ioyned captaine with him, and oftentimes also had charge by himselfe alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobility raised him to great authority, to be as a strong bulwarke for them, against Cleons insolency and boldnesse: and withall he had the loue of the people, to aduance and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, he did so flatter and dandle them, like an old man, still feeding their humor with gaine: but yet they themselues whom he thus flattered, knowing his extreme couetousnesse, impudency, and boldnesse, preferred Nicias before him, because his grauity was not seuere nor odious, but mingled with a kind of modesty, that he seemed to feare the presence of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and esteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearfull & mistrustfull nature and disposition: in warres he cloked his feare with good fortune, which euer fauored him alike in all his iourneys & exploits that he tooke in hand where he was captaine. Now being much afraid of accusers, this timorous manner of his proceeding in the city, was found to be popular, whereby he wan him the goodwill of the people: and by meanes thereof rose daily more and more, because the people commonly feare those that hate them, and aduance them that feare them. For the greatest honor nobilitie can do to the communalty, is to shew that they do not despise them. Now Pericles, who through his perfit vertue only, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole state and comonwealth of Athens, he needed no counterfeit colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to win their fauour and goodwils: but Nicias lacking that, and hauing wealth inough, sought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauor. And where Cleon would entertaine the Athenians with pleasant toyes and deuises, and could feede the peoples humour that way: Nicias finding himselfe no fit man to worke by such encounter, crept into the peoples fauour with liberality, with charges of common playes, and with such like sumptuousnesse, exceeding in cost and pleasant sports, not onely all those that had bene before him, but such also as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his consecrating vnto the gods: as the image of Pallas in the castell of Athens, the gilt being worne off: and the chappell which is vnder the festiuall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe prise in Bacchus daunces, & neuer went away without some game. And touching this matter, there goeth a report that at certaine playes whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth vpon the players stage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus: and being a goodly tall young man, without any haire on his face, the Athenians tooke such pleasure to see him so attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. Therewithal Nicias stood vp, and told them, that it were ashame for him to leaue the bodie of a man in bondage, that openly was esteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young slaue a free man. Men write also of certaine sumptuous and deuout acts he did in the Ile of Delos, where the dauncers and singers which the cities of Grece sent thither to sing rimes and verses in the honour of Apollo, were wont before to arriue disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ranne to see them, who made them sing straight without any order, and landing in haſte out of their ſhips, they left their apparell, and put on ſuch veſtements as they ſhould weare in proceſſion, and their garlands of flowers on their heads, all at one preſent time. But Nicias, being commaunded to go thither to preſent the ſingers of ATHENS, landed firſt in the Ile of RENIA, hard adioyning to the Ile of DELOS, with his ſingers, his beaſts for ſacrifice, and with all the reſt of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had cauſed to be made at ATHENS, vpon meaſure taken of the channell, betwixt the one and the other Ile, ſet out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with noſegayes and garlands of triumph, and with excellent wrought tapiſtry: which in the night he ſet vp vpon the channell, being not very broad, and the next morning by breake of the day cauſed his ſingers to paſſe ouer vpon it, ſinging all the way as they went in his proceſſion ſo nobly ſet foorth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the ſacrifice, the feaſt, and games that were to be played were finiſhed, he gaue a goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, bought lands beſides that coſt him ten thouſand Drachmas, which he conſecrated alſo vnto the god Patron of the Ile: and ordained, that the profits of the ſame ſhould be yearely beſtowed by the DELIANS, vpon an open ſacrifice and feaſt, in the which they ſhould pray to their god, for the health and proſperity of Nicias: and ſo cauſed it to be written and grauen vpon a pillar he left in DELOS, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offering, and foundation. Afterwards, this copper palme tree being broken by winds, it fell vpon the great image of the NAXIANS gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremonie and act of his, there was a maruellous pompe, and great ſhew of popular ambition: neuertheleſſe, he that ſhall conſider of his life and actions, may eaſily perſwade himſelfe that aboue all, he did it of verie pure zeale and deuotion, and ſecondly, to giue pleaſure and paſtime to the people. For by Thucydides report of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly giuen to religion. We find written in one of the dialogues of Paſiphoon, that Nicias did ſacrifice daily to the gods, and kept a ſoothſayer continually in his houſe, giuing out abroad, that it was to councell with him what ſhould happen about the affaires of the common wealth: but in troth it was to inquire of his owne buſineſſe, and ſpecially of his mines of ſiluer. For he had many great mines about LAVRION ſide, that were verie profitable to him: but withall they digged with great daunger, and he was driuen continually to keepe a maruellous number of ſlaues at worke there. The moſt part of Nicias riches was in readie money, and thereby he had many crauers and hangers on him, whom he gaue money vnto: for he gaue as well vnto wicked people that might do miſchiefe, as vnto them that deſerued reward, and were worthie of his liberalitie. Thus was his feare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was alſo a reuenew to the good: and hereof the comicall Poets do deliuer vs auncient teſtimonie. For Teleclides ſpeaking of a certaine informer, ſaith thus:

Nicias ſuperſtitious.

Nicias mines of ſiluer.

Nicias for feare gaue to the wicked.

Charicles did refuſe to giue one Mina, for to ſtay
The bruting of his ſecret birth, conueyed cloſe away:
But Nice, the ſonne of Nicerate, did willingly beſtow
A brace of Minas double told. And though I well do know
The cauſe of his ſo doing, yet I will not him bewray:
For why? The man is my good friend, and wiſe I dare well ſay.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedie intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine ſimple man vpon the ſtage, doth aske him:

The informer:

How long is it a go ſince thou didſt ſpeake with Nicias?

The plaine man:

I ſaw him ſtanding euen right now vpon the market place.

The informer:

This man affirmes he ſaw him there. And wherefore ſhould he ſay
He ſaw him, but of ſome intent his lewneſſe to bewray?
Now ſirs, yee ſee how Nicias here is taken in the trip,
For all his walking cloſe in clouds, to giue the priuie ſlip.

The Author:

O fooliſh folke, ſuppoſe ye that ſo good a man as he,
In any fault or ſhamefull fact will tardy taken be?

And

And Cleon threatning in the comedie of Aristophanes, intituled the Knights, sayth these words:

The Orators if by the throte I take,
Then sure I am, that Nicias straight will quake.

Phrynichus selfe also telleth vs glaunsingly, that he was so timorous and easie to be frayed, when he sayd, speaking of another man:

A good stout man (I know full well) he was,
And not a coward, like to Nicias.

Now Nicias being thus timorous of nature, and fearing to giue any litle occasion to the Orators to accuse him: kept himselfe so warily, that he neither durst eate nor drinke with any man in the city, nor yet put forth himselfe in companie to talke, or passe the time amongst them, but altogether auoided such sports and pleasures. For when he was in office, he would neuer out of the counsell-house, but still busied himselfe in dispatching causes, from morning till night, and was euer the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of state in hand, then was he verie hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no accesse vnto him, but kept close in his house: and some of his friends did euer aunswer them that came to his gate, and prayed them to pardon him, saying, that he was busie then about affaires of the commonwealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his house, and had himselfe taught him both learning and musicke, was his greatest procurer and instrument to keepe him from speech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnesse and grauity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they find certaine Poeticall words at this day: who being captaine of a certaine number of men that were sent to dwell in Italie, did build there the citie of Thvries. Hieron I say did serue his turne, and holpe him secretly to enquire what he would vnderstand of the Soothsayers, and gaue out these words among the people: that Nicias led too miserable and painefull a life, for the ouergreat care he tooke to serue the commonwealth: insomuch, as though he were in his hot-house to wash him, or at his table at meate, his mind ran still of some matters about the commonwealth, and to serue the state did neglect his owne priuate affaires: so that he scant began to sleepe and take rest, when others commonly had slept their first sleepe, and that he looked like no bodie. Furthermore, that he was growne crabbed and vncourteous, euen to such as before had bene his familiar friends: so that, sayd he, he loseth them together with his goods, and all for seruice of the commonwealth: where others grow rich, and win friends, by the credit they haue to be heard of the people, and can make merry among them, and sport with the matters of state which they haue in their hands. Now in troth, such was Nicias life, that he might truly say that which Agamemnon spake of himselfe in the tragedie of Euripides, called Iphigenie in Avlide.

Nicias life.

In outward shew of stately pompe, all others I exceed,
And yet the peoples vnderling I am in very deed.

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in some things did serue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, and wiser then others, although they yet mistrusted their sufficiency, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their courage, by taking their authoritie from them: as for proofe, the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon, and the mistrust they had of Antiphon Rhamnvsian, and moreouer by that they did vnto Paches (that tooke the Ile of Lesbos) who being brought before the Iudges in open councell to giue vp an account of his charge, drew out his sword, and slue himselfe in presence of them all. Nicias I say, remembring these examples, sought euer to flie from those offices, which were either too great, or too small, and when he accepted anie, had speciall regard to worke surely, and to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily coniecture, prospered maruellous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisdome, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiency, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the gods, contented himselfe to lessen his glorie, and that onely to auoid enuy: as the euent of things falling out euen in his time do sufficiently witnesse vnto vs. For the citie of Athens hauing sustained many great losses and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a party, nor had ought to do in any of them. As once for example: the Athenians were ouercome in Thracia by the Chalcidonians, howbeit it was vnder the leading of Calliades and Xenophon, who were their Captaines. Another time, the losse they had in Ætolia vnder the charge of Demosthenes. Moreouer, at Delivm, a city of

Boeotia, where they loſt a thouſand men at one conflict, Hippocrates then being generall there. And as touching the plague, the greateſt number layd the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reaſon of warres kept the men that came out of the countrey, within the wals of the city of Athens: and ſo by changing of aire, and their wonted manner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all theſe great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias euer burthened: but contrariwiſe he being Captaine tooke the Ile of Cythera, which the Lacedæmonians inhabited, being an excellent place for ſituation to moleſt and deſtroy the countrey of Laconia. He wan diuerſe cities that had rebelled in Thracia, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of Athens. At his firſt comming, hauing ſhut in the Megarians within their wals, he tooke the Ile of Minoa: and at his departure thence, ſhortly after wan the hauen of Niſea alſo. Furthermore, landing in the countrey of the Corinthians, he ouercame them that offered him battell, and ſlue a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chanced to forget to bury two of his men that were ſlaine, whoſe bodies could not be found in gathering vp of the reſt: howbeit, ſo ſoone as he heard of it, he cauſed all his fleete to ſtay, and ſent an Herauld to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetch away thoſe two bodies. Now, though by law of armes they that ſent to aske leaue to take away their dead to burie them, did thereby loſe the honour of their victory, and were barred to ſet vp any marke or token of triumph, becauſe it ſeemed by the ſute, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the petitioners that made requeſt for them, which otherwiſe needed not to haue made demaund of them: Nicias notwithſtanding was contented rather to forſake the honour of his victory, then to leaue the bodies of two of his countrimen in the field without buriall. So, after he had deſtroyed all the coaſt of Laconia, and had ouercome certaine Lacedæmonians that came againſt him in battell, he tooke the city of Thyrea, which the Æginetes kept at that time, whom he brought priſoners vnto Athens. And when the Peloponnesians had prepared great armies both by ſea and by land to beſiege the fort of Pyle, the which Demoſthenes the Captaine had fortified: battell being giuen by ſea, it chanced there remained foure hundred naturall citizens of Sparta, within the Ile of Spacteria. Now the Athenians thought it a noble exploit of them (as indeed it was) to take thoſe foure hundred aliue: howbeit the ſiege was very ſore, becauſe they lacked water euen in the middeſt of ſommer, and were forced to fetch a maruellous compaſſe to bring victuals to their campe, which when winter ſhould be once come, would be very dangerous, and almoſt an impoſſible thing to do. Whereupon, they then became ſory, and repented them much that they had ſent away the Ambaſſadors of the Lacedæmonians which came to them to treate of peace, and that they had (through Cleons procurement) ſuffered them to depart in that ſort without reſolution taken: who was againſt them altogether, onely to do Nicias a deſpite, being his enemy, and did earneſtly ſolicite the matter the Lacedæmonians requeſted. This was the cauſe why Cleon perſwaded the Athenians, to refuſe their offer of peace. But when the people ſaw that this ſiege drew out in length, and that their campe ſuffered grieuous wants and neceſſities: then fell they out with Cleon, and he againe burthened Nicias, ſaying, that through his feare he would let the beſieged Spartans eſcape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they ſhould not haue holden out ſo long. Thereupon the Athenians ſayd aloud to Cleon: and why doeſt not thou go thither then to take them? Moreouer Nicias ſelfe alſo riſing vp, openly gaue him his authority to take this Pyle, and bad him leauy as many ſouldiers as he would to go thither, and not to bragge with ſuch impudent words where was no danger, but to do ſome notable ſeruice to the common wealth. Cleon at the firſt ſhrunke backe, being amazed withall, litle thinking they would haue taken him ſo ſuddenly at his word: but in the end, perceiuing the people vrged him to it, and that Nicias alſo was importunate with him, ambition ſo enflamed him, that he not onely tooke the charge vpon him, but in a brauery ſayd, that within twentie dayes after his departure he would either put all the Spartans to the ſword, or bring them priſoners vnto Athens. The Athenians hearing Cleon ſay ſo, had more luſt to laugh a good, then to beleeue that he ſpake: for it was their manner euer to laugh at his anger and folly. For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being ſolemnly aſſembled in councell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon would ſay, and hauing taried long for him: at the length he came with a garland on his head, and prayed the aſſembly to diſmiſſe the court till the next morning: for (quoth he) I ſhall not be at leiſure to day, becauſe I haue ſacrificed, and do feaſt alſo certaine ſtraungers my friends that are come to ſee me. So the people burſt out in a laughing, laughing, and brake vp the assembly. This notwithstanding, fortune fauored him at that time, and he handled himselfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they besieged, within the time he had appointed, sauing such as were slaine: & hauing made them yeeld, brought them prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and reproach. For it appeared not onely a casting away of his shield, but worse then that, a voluntarie forsaking of his prouince vpon a base timerous mind, giuing his enemy occasion thereby to do some noble exploit, depriuing himselfe of his honorable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedie of birds, saying:

It is no time to sleepe and linger still,
As Nicias doth: without good cause or skill.

Cleons victorie of the Lacedæmonians.

Also in another place of his comedie of plowmen, he saith:

I faine would follow husbandrie. Who lets thee? Mary you.
A thousand Drachmas I will giue to be discharged now
Of office in the common weale. Content, so shall we haue
Two thousand Drachmas iust, with those which Nicias lately gaue.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the common wealth, suffering Cleon in that sort to grow to credit and estimation. For after that victorie, Cleon grew to so haughty a mind and pride of himselfe, that he was not to be dealt withal: wherupon fell out the occasion of the great miseries that happened to the city of ATHENS, which most grieued Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other things tooke away the modesty and reuerence vsed before in publicke orations to the people: he of all other was the first that cried out in his orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his gowne, and flung vp and downe the pulpit as he spake. Of which example afterwards followed all licentiousnesse, and contempt of honesty, the which all the Orators and counsellors fell into, that dealt in matters of state and common wealth, and was in the end the ouerthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practise in the state, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither simply euill: but as they say of the land of EGYPT, that for the fatnesse and lustinesse of the soile:

The immoderate liberty of Cleon.

Cleons lewd and light gestures in his Orations.

It bringeth forth both wholesome herbes, and also noysome weeds.

Euen so Alcibiades wit excelling either in good or ill, was the cause & beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was rid of Cleon, he could not yet bring the citie of ATHENS againe to peace and quietnesse. For when the commonwealth began to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into warres, through Alcibiades extreme furie of ambition. And thus it began. The onely peace-breakers and disturbers of common quiet generally throughout GREECE, were these two persons, Cleon and Brasidas: for warre cloked the wickednesse of the one, and aduanced the valiantnesse of the other, giuing to either occasion to do great mischiefe, and also oportunitie to worke many noble exploits. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a battell fought by AMPHIPOLIS, Nicias straight perceiuing the SPARTANS had long desired peace, and that the ATHENIANS were no more so hotly giuen to warres, but that both the one and the other had their hands full, and were willing to be quiet: deuised what meanes he might vse to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GREECE also from broile and miserie of warre, that thenceforth they might all together enioy a peaceable and happie life. The rich men, the old men, and the husbandmen, he found verie willing to harken to peace: and talking priuatly also with diuerse others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being desirous of wars. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they sought it: the SPARTANS beleeued him, not onely for that they had found him at other times verie soft and courteous, but also because he was carefull to see that their prisoners of SPARTA (who had bene taken at the fort of Pyle) were gently intreated, and had made their miserable captiuitie more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betweene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abstinence, they frequenting one another againe, and beginning to taste the sweetnesse and pleasures of peace, and the safety of free accesse one to see anothers friends that were strangers: began then to wish that they might still continue in peace and amitie together, without effusion of bloud of either partie, and tooke great delight in their daunces, to heare them sing such songs:

Alcibiades diuers wit.

Cleon & Brasilas the two peace breakers generally of all Greece.

Nicias reconcileth the Spartans with the Athenians.

And let my speare be ouergrowne, with dustie spiders webs.

They did alſo with great ioy and gladneſſe remember him which ſayd, that in peace no ſound of trumpet, but the crowing of the cocke doth wake them that be aſleepe: & on the other ſide they curſed and tooke on with them that ſayd it was predeſtined, the warre ſhould continue thriſe nine yeares. And ſo, vpon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuerſall peace throughout all GRECE. Now moſt men thought that ſurely all their ſorowes and miſeries were come to an end, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, ſaying: that he was a man beloued of the gods, who for his deuotion towards them, had this ſpeciall gift giuen him, that the greateſt bleſſing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confeſſe a troth, euery man was certainely perſwaded that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light cauſes perſwaded the GRECIANS to runne headlong into moſt grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other ſide had brought them to become friends, and to forget the great hurts the one had receiued of the other in former warres. And euen to this preſent day that peace is called Nicium, as who would ſay, Nicias peace. The capitulations of the peace were thus agreed vpon: that of either ſide they ſhould alike deliuer vp the cities, and lands, which each had taken from other in time of wars, together with the priſoners alſo: and that they ſhould firſt make reſtitution, whoſe lot it was to begin. Nicias (according to Theophraſtus report) for ready money ſecretly bought the lot, that the LACEDÆMONIANS might be the firſt that ſhould make reſtitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that diſliked of this peace, ſought by the complaints they made, to renew the warre againe: Nicias then perſwaded both the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, that they ſhould adde for ſtrength vnto their countrey, the alliance and peace offenſiue and defenſiue made betweene them, for a more ſure knot of friendſhip, whereby they might be the better aſſured the one of the other, and alſo the more dreadfull to their enemies that ſhould rebell againſt them. Theſe things went cleane againſt Alcibiades mind: who beſides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemy alſo vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that they ſought to Nicias, and made none account of him, but deſpiſed him. Here was the occaſion that cauſed Alcibiades to proue from the beginning what he could do to hinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet ſhortly after, Alcibiades perceiuing that the ATHENIANS liked not ſo well of the LACEDÆMONIANS, as they did before, and that they thought themſelues iniured by them, becauſe they had lately made league with the BOEOTIANS without their priuity, and had not wholly rendred vp the cities of PANACTVM and AMPHIPOLIS according to the conditions articled betweene them: began then to enlarge and aggrauate the peoples complaints, and to make them offended with euerie one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambaſſadors from the city of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and ſo handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made league offenſiue & defenſiue with thē. While theſe matters were thus in hand, there came to ATHENS alſo Ambaſſadors from LACEDÆMON, with full power and authority to ſet all things at ſtay, & to compound all controuerſies: who hauing firſt ſpoken with the Senate, propounded things vnto them both verie honeſt and reaſonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affraid that they letting the people vnderſtand ſo much, ſhould therby bring them to yeeld to what they deſired: he finely deceiued the poore Ambaſſadors by this deuiſe. He promiſed vpō his oath to helpe them in that they went about, ſo farre foorth as they would not confeſſe themſelues to haue abſolute power from the Ephores: making them to beleeue it was the onely way to bring their matters to paſſe. The Ambaſſadours giuing credit to his words, relied vpon him, and ſo forſooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people being ſet in councell, and there demaunded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accord all matters, yea, or no. Whereunto they made him aunſwer with a loud voice, that they had not. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrarie both to their expectation, and his owne oath and promiſe made vnto them, began to call the councell to witneſſe, whether they did not in open Senate ſay the contrarie, & ſo aduiſed the people not to truſt nor giue credit vnto ſuch men, as were openly taken with ſo manifeſt a lye, and that in one ſelfe matter would one while ſay one thing, another while another. It bootes not to aske whether the Ambaſſadours were much amazed to heare Alcibiades words: for Nicias himſelfe wiſt not what to ſay to the matter, the ſuddenneſſe of the cauſe did ſo confuſe and grieue him, being a thing he leaſt looked for. Now the people they were ſo moued beſides, that they became indifferent whether to haue ſent for the Ambaſſadors of ARGOS preſently to haue made league with them, or not: but there fell out an earth-quake vpon this matter, that greatly ſerued Nicias turne, and brake vp the aſſembly.

The

The people meeting againe in councell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could do or say, could scant withhold them from making league with the ARGIVES: and to get leaue in the meane time to go to the LACEDÆMONIANS, promising he would make all well againe. Thereupon, Nicias going to SPARTA, was receiued and honoured there like a noble man, and as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the rest, he preuailed nothing, and being ouercome by those that fauoured the BOEOTIANS, returned againe to ATHENS as he departed thence: where he was not only ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed, but was also in danger of his person, through the fury of the people, that at his request and counsell had redeliuered such men prisoners, and so great a number of them. For indeed, the prisoners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the fort of Pyle, were all of the chiefest houses of SPARTA, and their kinsemen and friends were the noblest men of the citie. Notwithstanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, sauing that they chose Alcibiades their Captaine, and made league with the ELIANS, and MANTINIANS (which had reuolted from the LACEDÆMONIANS) and with the ARGIVES also: and sent pyrats to the fort of Pyle, to spoile the country of LACONIA. Vpon these occasions the ATHENIANS fell againe into warres. Now when the quarrell and controuersie was greatest betweene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracisimon (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the people banished for ten yeares any such of their citizens as they thought either of too great authoritie, or that was most enuied for his wealth and substance. Alcibiades and Nicias were then not a litle perplexed, considering their present daunger, being sure that the one of them two should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the people hated Alcibiades life, and were afraid of his valiantnesse: as we haue more amply declared in the description of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be enuied: besides they misliked his straunge maner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conuersant with the people then he was, and counted him too stately: moreouer they hated him also because in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the people desired, and had enforced them against their wils to agree to that which was profitable for themselues. In fine, to speake more plainely, there fell out great strife betweene the yong men that would haue warres, & the old men that coueted peace, some desirous to banish Nicias, & some others Alcibiades: but

Where discord raignes in realme or towne,
The wicked win the chiefe renowne.

And so it fell out then. For the ATHENIANS being deuided in two factions, gaue authoritie to certaine of the most impudent & insolent persons that were in all the city: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the town of PERITHVS, a man of no hauior nor value, why he should be bold: but yet one that grew to some credit and power, dishonouring his country, by the honour they gaue him. Now Hyperbolus thinking himselfe free at that time from any danger of banishment, (hauing rather deserued the gallowes) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him well inough that remained behind: shewed openly that he was glad of their discord & variance, and busily stirred vp the people against thē both. Nicias & Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practises, hauing secretly talked together, ioyned both their factions in one: wherby they brought it so to passe, that neither of thē were banished, but Hyperbolus selfe for ten years. Which matter for the present time made the people very mery, though afterwards it grieued them much, seeing their ordinance of the Ostracisimon blemished by the vnworthines of the person: which punishment was an honor vnto him. For this banishment was thought a meet punishment for Thucydides, Aristides, and such like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too great an honour, and too manifest an occasion of glorie to be giuen to him, that for his wickednesse had the selfe same punishment, which was to be inflicted vpon the chiefest estates for their greatnesse. And the comicall Poet Plato himself saith in a place:

Although his lewd behauior did serue as much and more,
Yet was not that the punishment he should haue had therefore.
The Ostracie deuised was for men of noble fame,
And not for varlets, whose lewd life deserued open shame.

After this Hyperbolus, there was neuer man banished with the Ostracisimon. For himselfe was the last, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, and neerest kinseman to the tyrant was the first. Sure fortune is a very vncertaine thing, and without conceit of reason. For had Nicias franckly put himself to the hazard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needs haue happened him: either to haue remained in the city with victorie, his aduersarie being banished: or being conuict by his banishment, to haue scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the fame he had wonne of a wise Captaine, though he had bene ouercome. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus writeth, how Hyperbolus not Nicias was banished through the dissention that fell betwixt Phæax and Alcibiades: albeit most writers agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambassadors of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being come to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of SICILIA, Nicias being against it, was ouercome by Alcibiades craft and ambition. For he, before they were called to counsell, had already through false surmizes filled the peoples heads with a vaine hope and perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, and the old men also in artificers shoppes, and in their compassed chaires, or halfe circles where they sate talking together, were euery one occupied about drawing the platforme of SICILE, telling the nature of the SICILIAN sea, and reckening vp the hauens and places looking towards AFRICKE. For they made not their accompt that SICILE should be the end of their warres, but rather the store-house and armory for all their munition and martiall prouision to make warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICKE, and consequently all the AFRICKE seas, euen to Hercules pillars. Now all their minds being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, he found very few men of qualitie to stand by him. For the rich, fearing lest the people would thinke they did it to auoide charge, and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though indeed not contented withall: yet would not Nicias leaue still to counsell them to the contrarie. But when they had past the decree in counsell for the enterprise of SICILE, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the next session of the councell holden in the city, Nicias rose vp againe, to see if he could turne the people from this iourny with all the protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and priuate commoditie, he brought the commonwealth into so farre and daungerous a warre. But all his words preuailed not. Himselfe before all others was thought the meetest man for this charge, partly, because of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater safetie, when his timerous foresight should be ioyned with Alcibiades valiantnesse, and with Lamachus softnesse, which indeed most confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demostratus one of the Oratours that most procured the ATHENIANS to vndertake this enterprise stepped foorth, and said: It were good that Nicias left off, and set aside all these excuses and deuices, and preferred a decree, that the people should throughly authorize the Captaines that were chosen, to set forward and execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so perswaded the people to passe & authorize it. Yet it is said that the Priests obiected many things to hinder the iourney. But Alcibiades also hauing suborned certaine Soothsayers, alleaged in like case some auncient Oracles that said, the ATHENIANS should haue great honor from SICILE: and further had enticed certaine pilgrimes, who said they were but newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence: That the Athenians should take all the Syracusans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come, they held their peace, lest it should seeme they intermedled to prognosticate euill for affections sake, seeing that the signes themselues, which were most plaine and notorious, could not remoue them from the enterprise of this iourney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes and images of Mercurie, which in one night were all to be mangled, sauing one image onely called the Hermes of Andocides, which was giuen and consecrated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGEIDES, and was set vp directly ouer against a citizens house called Andocides. Furthermore, the chaunce that happened by the altar of the twelue gods: where a man leaping sodainely vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut off his genitories with a stone. And in a temple also in the city of DELPHES, where was a litle image of Minerua of gold, set vpon a palme tree of copper, which the city of ATHENS had giuen of the spoiles won of the MEDES. Vpon that palme tree sate certaine crowes many daies together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the fruit of it which was all of gold, vntill they made the same to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIANS said, that the DELPHIANS (whom the SYRACVSANS had subdued) had finely fained this deuice. There was a prophecie also that commanded them to bring one of Mineruaes Nuns to ATHENS, that was in the citie of CLAZOMENES. So they sent for this Nun called Hesychia, which is, rest: and it seemeth it it was that which the goddes by this propheſie did counſell them vnto, that for that time they ſhould be quiet. Meton the Aſtronomer hauing charge in the armie leauied for the war of SICILE, being afraid of this propheſie, or otherwiſe miſliking the celeſtiall ſignes and ſucceſſe of the iourney: fained himſelfe mad, and ſet his houſe a fire. Others ſay he counterfeited not madneſſe, but did one night indeed ſet his houſe a fire, and that the next morning looking rufully on it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pitifull ſtate, to ſue to the people, that in conſideration of his great misfortune hapned him, they would diſcharge his ſonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gally at his owne coſt, and ready to make ſaile. Moreouer, the familiar ſpirit of wiſe Socrates that did vſe to tell him before what ſhould happen: told him then that this iorney would fall out to the deſtruction of ATHENS. Socrates told it to certaine of his very familiar friends: and from them the rumor became cõmon. And this alſo troubled a number of them, for the vnlucky daies on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very daies on the which the women celebrated the feaſt and yeareday of Adonis death: and there were alſo in diuers parts of the city, images of dead men caried to buriall, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that ſuch as did put any confidence in thoſe ſignes, ſaid they miſliked it much, and that they were afraid leſt the ſame ſignified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was ſet out with ſuch pompe and brauery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he ſpake againſt this war in open councell, whileſt they were deliberating vpon it, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of ſo honorable a charge to make him change his mind: therein ſurely he ſhewed himſelfe an honeſt man, wiſe & conſtant. But when he ſaw plainly that he could by no perſwaſions remoue the people from the enterpriſe of this war, neither yet by ſute nor intreatie get himſelfe diſcharged from being a captaine therof, but that they would in any caſe make him one of the heads of the army: then was it out of time to be fearefull, and ſtil giuing backe, turning his head ſo oft like a child to looke vpon his gally behind him, and euer to be telling that no reaſon could be heard in determining of his iourney. For indeede this was inough to diſcourage his companions, and to marre all at the firſt ſetting out: where, to ſay truly, he ſhold ſuddenly haue ſet vpon his enemies, and haue gone to it with a luſty courage, to haue aſſayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary courſe. For when Lamachus thought good at their firſt coming to go ſtraight to SYRACVSA, and to giue them battell as neare the wals as might be, and that Alcibiades on the other ſide was of opinion, firſt of all to go about to win the cities that were in league with the SYRACVSANS, and after that they had made them rebell, then to go againſt the SYRACVSANS themſelues: Nicias to the contrarie ſpake in counſel, and thought it better to go on faire and ſoftly, deſcrying the coaſts of SICILE round about, to view their gallies and preparation, and ſo to returne ſtraight to ATHENS againe, leauing only a few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defend them. But this from the beginning maruellouſly cooled the courage of the ſouldiers, and quite diſcouraged them. Shortly after alſo the ATHENIANS hauing ſent for Alcibiades to anſwer to certaine accuſations, Nicias remaining captaine with Lamachus (the other captaine in ſight, but Nicias ſelfe in power and authority the Lieutenant generall of all the army) ſtill vſed delayes, running vp and downe, and ſpending time ſo long in conſultation, till the ſouldiers were left without both hope and courage: and the feare the enemie had of them at their firſt comming to ſee ſo great an armie, was now in maner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the army, before he was ſent for from ATHENS, they went with threeſcore gallies to SYRACVSA, of the which they placed fiftie in battell ray out of the hauen, and ſent the other ten into the hauen to diſcouer: which approaching neare the citie, cauſed an Herauld to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to reſtore the LEONTINES to their lands and poſſeſſions, and tooke a ſhippe of the enemies, in the which among other things they found tables, wherein were written the names of all the inhabitants of SYRACVSA, according to their tribes aud houſes. Theſe tables were kept farre from the city, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had ſent for them to know the number of men of ſeruice, and of age to beare weapon. The ſame tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the Generals of the army, the ſoothſayers ſeeing this long rolle of names, at the firſt miſliked it, fearing leſt the propheſie had bene fulfilled, which promiſed them, that the ATHENIANS one day ſhould take all the SYRACVSANS. Howbeit it is reported this prophecie came to paſſe in another exploit, when Calippus ATHENIAN hauing ſlaine Dion, wanne alſo the citie of SYRACVSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the ſway, and commaunded the whole armie. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a stout man, an honest man, and very valiant of his hands, and one that would not spare himselfe in time of need: neuertheless he was so poore and miserable, that euen when he was in state of a Generall, and gaue vp an account of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much for a gowne, and so much for a paire of pantophles. Where Nicias authoritie and reputation contrariwise was of another maner of cut, as well for other respects, as for his riches, and for the honour of many noble things which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and sitting in councell with his companions in the councell house at ATHENS, about the dispatch of certaine causes, he spake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then present amongst thē, and bade him speake first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of all the whole companie. Sophocles answered him againe: Indeed I confesse I am the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom euery man regardeth best. So hauing at that time Lamachus vnder him, a better Captaine and man of warre then himselfe was, yet by being so slow to imploy the army vnder his charge by deferring of time still, and houering about SICILE as farre from his enemies as he could: he first gaue the enemies time and leysure to be bold without feare of him. And thē going to besiege HYBLA, being but a pelting litle towne, and raising the siege without taking of it: he fell into so great a contempt with euery man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckening of him. At last, he retired to CATANA with his army, without any other exploit done, sauing that he tooke HYCCARA, a baggage village of the barbarous people, and where it is said Lais the curtisan was borne, and that being then a yong girle, she was sold among other prisoners, and afterwards caried into PELOPONNESVS. And in fine, the sommer being far spent, Nicias was informed that the SYRACVSANS had taken such courage to them, that they would come and enterprise the charge vpon them first: and that their horsemen were approched already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the ATHENIANS in mockerie, if they were come into SICILE to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to restore the LEONTINES to their lands againe. Hereupon with much ado, Nicias determined to go to SYRACVSA, and because he wold campe there in safetie, and at ease without hazard: he sent one of CATANA before to SYRACVSA, to tell them (as if he had bene a spie) that if they would suddenly come and set vpon the campe of the ATHENIANS and take all their cariage, he wished them to come with all their power to CATANA at a day certaine which he would appoint them. For the ATHENIANS (said he) for the most part are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens, which fauouring the SYRACVSANS, haue determined so soone as they heare of their comming, to keepe the gates of the citie, and at the same time also to set the ATHENIANS ships on fire: and how there were also a great number in the city of this confederacie, that did but look euery houre for their comming. And this was the noblest stratageme of warre, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in SICILE. For by this deuice he made the SYRACVSANS come into the field with all their power, so that they left their city without guard: and he himselfe departing in the meane time from CATANA with all his fleete, wanne the hauen of SYRACVSA at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his enemies could not hurt him: in the which he was both the stronger, and might without let or difficulty set vpon them with that wherein he most trusted. The SYRACVSANS returning straight from CATANA and offering him battell hard by the wals of SYRACVSA, he came out into the field, and ouerthrew them. There were not many of the SYRACVSANS slaine at this battell, because their horsmen did hinder the chase: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges vpon the riuer, gaue Hermocrates occasion to mocke him. For comforting and encouraging the SYRACVSANS, he told them Nicias deserued to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from ATHENS to SYRACVSA to fight. This notwithstanding, he made the SYRACVSANS quake for feare: for where they had then fifteene Captaines, they chose out three only, to whom the people were sworne, that they wold suffer them to haue full power and authoritie to commaund and take order for all things. The temple of Iupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS canipe, which they wold gladly haue taken, for that it was full of rich iewels and offerings of gold and siluer, giuen vnto the temple aforetime. But Nicias of purpose still draue off time, and delayed so long, till the SYRACVSANS at last sent a good garrison thither to keepe it safe: thinking with himselfe, that if his souldiers came to take and spoile the temple, his countrey should be nothing the richer by it, and himselfe besides shold beare all the blame of sacriledge. So, hauing obtained victorie without profit, (which ran ſtraight through SICILE) within few daies after he returned vnto the city of NAXOS, where he lay all the winter, conſuming a wonderfull maſſe of victuals with ſo great an army, for the doing of things of ſmall moment, vpon certaine SICILIANS that yeelded to him. The SYRACVSANS in the meane time being in hart againe, & couragious, returned to CATANA, where they ſpoiled and ouerran all the country, and burnt the campe of the ATHENIANS. Herefore euery man blamed Nicias much, becauſe through his long delay, and protracting of time to make all things ſure, he let ſlip ſundry occaſions of notable exploits, wherein good ſeruice might haue bene done. Yet when he would do a thing indeed, he did it ſo thoroughly as no man could take exception to his doings, for that he brought it to ſo good a paſſe: and once taking it in hand, he did execute it with all ſpeed, though he was both ſlow to determine and a coward to enterpriſe. Now when he remoued his army to returne to SYRACVSA, he brought it ſo orderly, and alſo with ſuch ſpeed and ſafetie: that he was come by ſea to THAPSVS, had landed and taken the fort of Epipolis, before the SYRACVSANS had any intelligence of it, or could poſſibly helpe it. For the choiſe men of the SYRACVSANS being ſet out againſt him, hoping to haue ſtopped his paſſage, he ouerthrew them, tooke three hundred priſoners, and made their horſemen flie, which before were thought inuincible. But that which made the SYRACVSANS moſt afraid, and ſeemed moſt wonderfull alſo to the other GRECIANS, was this: that in a very ſhort ſpace he had almoſt enuironed SYRACVSA with a wall, which was as much in compaſſe about, as the wals of ATHENS, and worſe to performe, by reaſon of the woody countrie, and for the ſea alſo that beateth vpon the wals, beſides that there were diuers mariſhes hard by it: and yet (ſicke as he was of the ſtone) he had almoſt finiſhed it. And ſure good reaſon it is that we attribute the fault of the not finiſhing of it, vnto his ſickneſſe. For mine owne part I wonder maruellouſly both of the care and diligence of the Captaine, and of the valiantneſſe and dexterity of the ſouldiers, which appeareth by the notable feates they did. For Euripides after their ouerthrow and vtter ruine, made a funerall Epitaph in verſe, and ſaith thus:

Nicias beſiegeth Syracuſa.

Nicias wall at the ſiege of Syracuſa.

Eight times our men did put the men of Syracuſe to flight,
So long as with indifferencie the gods did vſe their might.

But we find it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not only eight times, but many times more ouerthrowne by them: a time at length there was indeed, that both the gods and fortune fought againſt them, euen when the ATHENIANS were of greateſt power. Now Nicias in his owne perſon was euer in the greateſt and moſt waightie affaires, ſtriuing with his ſickly body. Howbeit one day when his diſeaſe grew ſore vpon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men: and Lamachus in the meane time alone hauing charge of the whole army, fought with the SYRACVSANS, who then had brought a wal frō the citie, vnto the wal with the which the ATHENIANS had purpoſed to haue ſhut them in, to keepe that they ſhould not compaſſe it round. And becauſe the ATHENIANS commonly were the ſtronger in theſe skirmiſhes, they many times ouer raſhly followed the chaſe of their enemies that fled: as it chanced one day, that Lamachus went ſo farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horſemen of the citie, before whom Callicrates marched foremoſt, a valiant man of his hands, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand. Lamachus abode him, and in the conflict was firſt hurt: but he gaue Callicrates alſo ſuch a wound therewithall, that they both fell downe dead preſently in the place. At that time the SYRACVSANS being the ſtronger ſide, tooke vp his body, and caried it away with them: but they ſpurred out for life to the ATHENIANS campe, where Nicias lay ſicke, without any guard or ſuccor at all: neuertheleſſe, Nicias roſe with ſpeed out of his bed, and perceiuing the daunger he was in, commaunded certaine of his friends to ſet the wood on fire which they had brought within the trenches of the campe, to make certaine deuices for battery, and the engines of timber alſo that were alreadie made. That deuice onely ſtayed the SYRACVSANS, ſaued Nicias, and the ſtrength of their campe, together with all the ſiluer and cariage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACVSANS perceiuing afarre off, betwixt them and the ſtrength of their campe, ſuch a great flame as roſe vp in the aire, vpon ſight of it turned taile ſtraight, and made towards their citie. Things falling out thus, Nicias being left ſole Captaine of the armie without any companion, in great hope notwithſtanding to do ſome good: diuerſe cities of SICILE yeelded vnto him, ſhips fraught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and many ſubmitted themſelues, for the good ſucceſſe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS alſo ſent to parle with him of peace, being out of hope that they were able to defend their city any longer against him. Gylippus also a Captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, comming to aide the SYRACVSANS, vnderstanding by the way how the city of SYRACVSA was shut in with a wall round about, and in great distresse: held on his voyage notwithstanding, not with any hope to defend SICILE (supposing the ATHENIANS had wonne the whole country) but with intent neuertheless to helpe the cities of ITALY if he could possibly. For it was a common rumour abroad, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all, and that their Captaine for his wisdome and good fortune was inuincible. Nicias himselfe now contrary to his wonted wisedome and foresight, trusting altogether to the good successe which he saw to follow him, but specially beleeuing the reports that were told him of SYRACVSA, and the newes that were brought him thence by some of themselues, which came secretly vnto him, perswading himselfe that within few daies he should haue SYRACVSA by composition: tooke no care to withstand Gylippus coming thither, neither sent any men to keepe him from landing in SICILE. By which negligence Gylippus landed in a passenger, without Nicias knowledge: so small reckening they made of him, and so much did they fondly despise him. Gylippus being thus landed farre from SYRACVSA, beganne to gather men of warre together, before the SYRACVSANS themselues knew of his landing, or looked for his comming: insomuch as they had alreadie appointed the assembly of a councell to determine the articles and capitulations of peace, which they should conclude vpon with Nicias. Moreouer, there were some that perswaded they should do well to make hast to conclude the peace, before the inclosure of Nicias wall was altogether finished, which then lacked not much to performe, hauing all the stuffe for the purpose brought euen ready to the place. But as these things were euen thus a doing, arriued one Gongylus at SYRACVSA, that came from CORINTH with a galley. At whose landing, the people vpon the peere flocking about him, to heare what newes: he told them that Gylippus would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other galleys after to their aide. The SYRACVSANS would hardly beleeue him, vntill there came another messenger also sent from Gylippus selfe of purpose, that willed them to arme, and come to him into the field. Thereupon the SYRACVSANS being maruellously reuiued, went all straight and armed themselues. And Gylippus was no sooner come into SYRACVSA, but he presently put his men in battell ray, to set vpon the ATHENIANS. Nicias for his part had likewise also set the ATHENIANS in order of battell, and ready to fight. When both the armies were now approached neare each to other, Gylippus threw downe his weapons, and sent a herauld vnto Nicias to promise them life and baggage to depart safely out of SICILE. But Nicias would make the herauld none answer to that message. Howbeit there were certaine of his souldiers that in mockerie asked the herauld, if for the comming of a poore cape and wand of LACEDÆMON, the SYRACVSANS thought themselues strengthened so much, that they should despise the ATHENIANS, which not long before kept three hundred LACEDÆMONIANS prisoners in irons, farre stronger and more haire on their heads, then Gylippus had, and had also sent them home to their citizens at LACEDÆMON. And Timæus writeth also, that the SICILIANS themselues, made no reckening of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, because they saw his extreme couetousnesse and misery: and then, for that he came so meanely apparelled, with a threed-bare cape, and a long bush of haire, which made thē scorne him. Yet in another place he saith, that so soone as Gylippus arriued in SICILE, many came to him out of euery quarter with very good wil, like birds wondering at an owle. This second report seemeth truer then the first: for they swarmed about him, because in this cape and wand they saw the tokens of the maiestie of the citie & seigniory of SPARTA. Thucydides also saith, that it was Gylippus only that did all there. And much like doth Philistus selfe a SYRACVSAN confesse, who was present then in person and saw all things that were done. Notwithstanding at the first battel the ATHENIANS had the vpper hand, & slue a nūber of the SYRACVSANS, among the which Gongylus the CORINTHIAN was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and experience of a wise Captaine. For, with the selfe same weapons, with the same men, with the same horses, and in the same places, chaunging onely the order of his battell, he ouerthrew the ATHENIANS: and (fighting with them still) hauing driuen them euen into their campe, he set the SYRACVSANS a worke to build vp a wall ouerthwart, (with the very selfe same stones and stuffe, which the ATHENIANS had brought and laid there for the finishing of their inclosure) to cut off the other, and to keepe it from going forward, that it ioyned not together. So, all that the ATHENIANS had done before vntill that present, was vtterly to no purpose. Things standing in these tearmes, the SYRACVSANS being being couragious againe, beganne to arme gallies, and running vp and downe the fields with their horſemen and ſlaues, tooke many priſoners. Gylippus on the other ſide, went in perſon too and fro through the cities of SICILE, perſwading and exhorting the inhabitants in ſuch ſort, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke armes by his procurement. Nicias ſeeing things thus fall out, fell to his old trade againe, and conſidering the chaunge of his ſtate and former good lucke, his heart beginning to faint, wrote ſtraight to the ATHENIANS to ſend another army into SICILE, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any caſe to giue him leaue to returne, and to diſcharge him of his office, for cauſe of his ſickneſſe. The ATHENIANS were indifferent before he wrote, to ſend aide thither: howbeit the enuie the nobility bare vnto Nicias good fortune, did euer cauſe ſome delay that they ſent not vntill then, and then they determined to ſend with ſpeede. So Demoſthenes was named to be ſent away immediatly after winter, with a great nauie. In the middeſt of winter Eurymedon went to Nicias, and caried him both money and newes, that the people had choſen ſome of them for his companions in the charge, which were already in ſeruice with him, to wit, Euthydemus and Menander. Now Nicias in the meane time being ſuddenly aſſailed by his enemies both by ſea and land: though at the firſt he had fewer gallies in number then they, yet he budged diuerſe of theirs and ſuncke them. But by land again, he could not aide his men in time, becauſe Gylippus at the firſt onſet had taken a fort of his called Plemmyrion, within the which lay the ſtore and tackle for many gallies, and a great maſſe of readie monie, which was wholly loſt. Beſides, in the ſame conflict alſo were many men ſlaine, and many taken priſoners. Yet further, the greateſt matter of weight was, that thereby he tooke from Nicias the great commoditie he had to bring his victuals ſafely by ſea to his campe. For while the ATHENIANS kept this fort, they might at their pleaſure bring victuals without daunger to their campe, being couered with the ſame: but when they had loſt it, then it was hard for them ſo to do, becauſe they were euer driuen to fight with the enemies that lay at anker before the fort. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS did not thinke that their armie by ſea was ouerthrowne, becauſe their enemies were the ſtronger, but for that their men had followed the ATHENIANS diſorderedly: and therfore were deſirous once againe to venture, in better ſort and order then before. But Nicias by no meanes would be brought to fight againe: ſaying, that it were a madneſſe looking for ſuch a great nauie and a new ſupply as Demoſthenes was comming withall, raſhly to fight with a fewer number of ſhips then they, and but poorely furniſhed. But contrarily, Menander and Euthydemus newly promoted to the ſtate of Captaines with Nicias, being pricked forwards with ambition againſt the two other Captaines (Nicias and Demoſthenes that was then coming) deſired to preuent Demoſthenes, in performing ſome notable ſeruice before his arriuall, & thereby alſo to excell Nicias doings. Howbeit the cloke they had to couer their ambition withal was, the honor and reputation of the city of ATHENS, the which (ſaid they) were ſhamed & diſhonored for euer, if they now ſhould ſhew themſelues afraid of the SYRACVSANS, who prouoked them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias againſt his will to battell, in the which the ATHENIANS were ſlaine and ouercome, by the good counſell of a CORINTHIAN pylot called Ariſton. For the left wing of their battell (as Thucydides writeth) was clearely ouerthrowne, and they loſt a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, conſidering on the one ſide that he had taken maruellous paines, whilſt he was ſole Captaine of the whole army: and on the other ſide, for that he had cõmitted a foule fault, when they had giuen him companions. But as Nicias was in this great deſpaire, they deſcried Demoſthenes vpon a peere of the hauen, with his fleet brauely ſet out and furniſhed, to terrifie the enemies. For he had threeſcore and thirteen gallies, and in them he brought 5 thouſand footmen well armed and appointed, & of darters, bowmen, and hurlers with ſlings about 3 thouſand, and the gallies trimmed and ſet forth with goodly armors, numbers of enſignes, and with a world of trumpets, howboies, and ſuch marine muſicke, and all ſet out in this triumphant ſhew, to feare the enemies the more. Now thought the SYRACVSANS themſelues againe in a pecke of troubles, perceiuing they ſtroue againſt the ſtream, and conſumed themſelues to no purpoſe, when by that they ſaw there was no likelihood to be deliuered from their troubles. And Nicias alſo reioyced, that ſo great aide was come, but his ioy held not long: for ſo ſoone as he began to talke with Demoſthenes of the ſtate of things, he found him bent forthwith to ſet vpon the SYRACVSANS, and to hazard all with ſpeed, that they might quickly take SYRACVSA, and ſo diſpatch away home againe. Nicias thought this more haſt then good ſpeed, and feared much this foole-hardineſſe. Whereupon he prayed him to attempt nothing rashly nor desperately: and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the warre against the enemies, who were without money, and therefore would soone be forsaken of their confederates. And besides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of victuals: that they would then quickly seeke to him for peace, as they had done aforetime. For there were many within SYRACVSA that were Nicias friends, who wished him to abide time: for they were wearie of warre, and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but straighted a litle more with want of victuals, they would yeeld straight. Nicias deliuering these perswasions somewhat darkely, and keeping somewhat also from vtterance, because he would not speake them openly: made his colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardlinesse, and that he returned againe to his former delaies to keepe all in securitie, by which manner of proceeding he had from the beginning killed the hearts of his armie, for that he had not at his first comming set vpon the enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the courage of his souldiers was cold and done, and himself also brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the other Captaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Euthydemus and Menander, stucke to Demosthenes opinion: whereunto Nicias was also forced against his will to yeeld. So Demosthnes the selfe same night taking the footmẽ, went to assault the fort of Epipolis: where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he slue many of them, and made the rest flie that offered resistance. But not content with this victory, he went farther, till he fell vpon the BOEOTIANS. They gathering themselues together were the first that resisted the ATHENIANS, basing their pikes with such fury and loud cries, that they caused the former to retire, and made all the rest of the assailants afraid and amazed. For the formost flying backe, came full vpon their companions: who taking them for their enemies, and their flight for a charge, resisted them with all their force, and so mistaking one another, both were wounded and slaine, and the hurt they meant vnto their enemies, did vnfortunatly light vpon their owne fellowes. For this multitude meeting thus confusedly together, what through their great feare, and what for that they could not discerne one another in the night, the which was neither so darke that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleare, as they might certainly iudge by sight what they were that met them: (for then the Moone declined apace, & the small light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran too and fro) the feare they had of the enemie, made them mistrust their friends. All these troubles and disaduantages had the ATHENIANS, and beside the Moone on their backs, which causing the shadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and glistring of armor: and contrarily, the enemies targets glaring in their eyes by the reflection of the Moone that shone vpon them, increased their feare, and made them seeme a greater number and better appointed then they were in deed. At last, the enemies giuing a lustie charge vpon them on euery side, after they once began to giue backe and turne taile: some were slaine by their enemies, others by their owne company, and others also brake their neckes falling from the rockes. The rest that were dispersed abroad in the fields, were the next morning euery man of them put to the sword by the horsemen. So the account made, two thousand ATHENIANS were slaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their armors backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwaies mistrusted it would thus come to passe, was marueilously offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashnesse. But he excusing himselfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes, and so to hoise saile homewards. For said he, we must looke for no new aide from ATHENS, neither are we strong enough with this army to ouercome our enemies: and though we were, yet must we of necessity auoid the place we are in, because (as it is reported) it is alwaies vnwholesome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, by reason of the autumne and season of the yeare, as they might plainely see by experience. For many of their people were already sicke, and all of them in maner had no mind to tary. Nicias in no case liked the motiõ of departing thence, because he feared not the SYRACVSANS, but rather the ATHENIANS, for their accusations & condemnation. And therefore in open councell he told them, that as yet he saw no such daunger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather dye of his enemies hands, then be put to death by his owne countrymen. Being therin of a contrarie mind to Leo BIZANTINE, who after that, said to his citizens: I had rather suffer death by you, then to be slaine with you. And furthermore, as for remouing their campe to some other place, they should haue leisure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in councell, Demosthenes hauing had ill lucke at his first comming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that Nicias ſtucke not ſo hard againſt their departure, but that he relyed vpon the truſt and confidence he had of ſome within the citie: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new ſupply come vnto the SYRACVSANS, & that they ſaw the plague increaſed more and more in their campe: then Nicias ſelfe thought it beſt to depart thence, and gaue notice to the ſouldiers to prepare themſelues to ſhip away. Notwithſtanding, when they had put all things in readineſſe for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemie, or ſuſpition thereof: the Moone began to eclipſe in the night, and ſodainly to loſe her light, to the great feare of Nicias and diuerſe others, who through ignorance and ſuperſtition quaked at ſuch ſights. For, touching the eclipſe & darkening of the Sunne, which is euer at any coniunction of the Moone, euery common perſon then knew the cauſe to be the darkeneſſe of the bodie of the Moone betwixt the Sunne and our ſight. But the eclipſe of the Moone it ſelfe, to know what doth darken it in that ſort, and how being at the full it doth ſodainely loſe her light, and chaunge into ſo many kinds of colours: that was aboue their knowledge, and therfore they thought it very ſtrange, perſwading themſelues that it was a ſigne of ſome great miſchiefes the gods did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras, the firſt that euer determined and deliuered any thing for certaine and aſſured, concerning the light and darkneſſe of the Moone, his doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquitie, nor was generally knowne but only to a few, who durſt not talke of it, but with feare euen to them they truſted beſt. And the reaſon was, for that the people could not at that time abide them that profeſſed the knowledge of naturall Philoſophie, and inquired of the cauſes of things: for them they called then Μετεωρολεσχης, as much to ſay, as curious inquirers, and tatlers of things aboue the reach of reaſon, done in heauen and in the aire. Becauſe the people thought they aſcribed that which was done by the gods only, vnto certaine naturall and neceſſarie cauſes, that worke their effects not by prouidence nor wil, but by force & neceſſary conſequences. For theſe cauſes was Protagoras baniſhed frō ATHENS, & Anaxagoras put in priſon: from whence Pericles had much ado to procure his deliuery. And Socrates alſo, though he did not meddle with that part of Philoſophie, was notwithſtanding put to death for the ſuſpition therof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being receiued and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as alſo for that he ſubmitted the neceſſity of naturall cauſes vnto the controlement and diſpoſition of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and ſupreme cauſe: tooke away all the ill opinion which the people had of ſuch diſputations, and gaue open paſſage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall ſciences. And therfore Dion, one of Platoes ſcholers and friends, an eclipſe of the Moone chancing euen at the very ſame time that he was weying vp his ankers to ſaile from ZAZYNTHE, to make war with the tyrant Dionyſius: being nothing afraid nor troubled therewithall, made ſaile notwithſtanding, and when he came to SYRACVSA, draue out the tyrant. But then it fell out vnfortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilfull ſoothſayer: for the party which he was wont to vſe for that purpoſe, and which tooke away much of his ſuperſtition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this ſigne of the eclipſe of the Moone (as Philochorus ſaith) was not hurtfull for men that would flie, but contrarily very good: for ſaid he, things that men do in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemie vnto them. But this notwithſtanding, their cuſtome was not to keepe thēſelues cloſe aboue three daies in ſuch eclipſes of the Moone and Sun, as Autoclides ſelfe preſcribeth in a book he made of ſuch matters: where Nicias bare them then in hand, that they ſhould tarie the whole and full reuolution of the courſe of the Moone, as though he had not ſeene her ſtraight cleare againe, after ſhe had once paſſed the ſhadow and darkneſſe of the earth. But all other things laid aſide and forgotten, Nicias diſpoſed him ſelfe to ſacrifice vnto the gods: vntill ſuch time as the enemies came again as well to beſiege their forts, and all their campe by land, as alſo to occupie the whole hauen by ſea. For they had not onely put men aboord into their galleys able to weare armor, but moreouer young boyes into fiſher boats and other light barkes, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and ſhamefully reuiled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble houſe, called Heraclides, whoſe boate being forwarder then his companions, was in daunger of taking by a gallie of the ATHENIANS, that rowed againſt him. Pollichus his vncle being afraid of it, lanched forward with ten gallies of SYRACVSA for his reſcue, of the which himſelfe was Captaine. The other galleys doubting alſo leſt Pollichus ſhould take hurt, came on likewiſe amaine: ſo that there fell out a great battell by ſea, which the SYRACVSANS wanne, and ſlue Eurymedon the Captaine, and many other. This made the ſouldiers of the ATHENIANS ſo afraid, that they began to cry out, it was no longer tarying there, and that there was none other way but to depart thence by land. For after the SYRACVSANS had won that battell, they had straight shut vp the hauens mouth. Nicias could not consent to such a retire: for, said he, it would be too great a shame for them to leaue their gallies and other ships to the enemie, considering the number not to be much lesse then two hundred: but he thought good rather to arme a hundred and ten gallies with the best and valiantest of their footmen, and darters, that were in the army, because the other galleys had spent their owers. And for the rest of the armie, Nicias forsaking their great campe and walles (which reached as farre as the temple of Hercules) did set them in battell ray vpon the peere of the hauen. Insomuch as the SYRACVSANS which vntill that day could not performe their wonted sacrifices vnto Hercules, did then send their Priests and Captaines thither to do them. The souldiers being imbarked into the galleys, the Priests and Soothsayers came and told the SYRACVSANS, that vndoubtedly the signes of the sacrifices did promise them a noble victorie, so that they gaue no charge, but onely stood vpon their defence: for so did Hercules euer ouercome, defending when he was assailed. With this good hope the SYRACVSANS rowed forward, and there was such a hote and cruell battell by sea, as had not bene in all this warre before: the which was as dreadfull to them that stood on the shore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, seeing the whole conflict, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as much hurt themselues by the order they kept in their fight, and by the rankes of their ships, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great ships together, fighting with the heauie, against the enemies that were light and swift, which came on on euery side of them, hurling stones at them, which were made sharpe to wound how euer they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS only casting their darts, and vsing their bowes and slings, by meanes of their rowing vp and downe, could not lightly aime to hit with the head. That maner of fight, Aristo a CORINTHIAN (an excellent ship-maister) had taught the SYRACVSANS, who was himselfe slaine valiantly fighting, when they were conquerors. The ATHENIANS thereupon being driuen to fight, hauing sustained a maruellous slaughter & ouerthrow, (their way to flie by sea being also clearely taken from them) and perceiuing moreouer that they could hardly saue themselues by land: were then so discouraged, as they made no longer resistance, when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their ships before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take vp their dead mens bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forsake their diseased & sore wounded companions, then to bury them that were already slaine. When they considered all these things, they thought their own state more miserable then theirs, which were to end their liues with much more crueltie, then was their miserie present. So they being determined to depart thence in the night, Gylippus perceiuing the SYRACVSANS through all the citie disposed themselues to sacrifice to the gods, and to be merrie, as well for the ioy of their victorie, as also for Hercules feast: thought it bootlesse to perswade them, and much lesse to compell them to take armes vpon a sudden, to set vpon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuising with himself how to deceiue Nicias, sent some of his friends vnto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from such as were wont to send him secret intelligence of all things during this warre: and willed him to take heed not to depart that night, lest he fell into the ambushes which the SYRACVSANS had laid for him, hauing sent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should passe. Nicias being ouerreached by Hermocrates craft and subtiltie, staied there that night, as though he had bene afraid to fall within the daunger of his enemies ambush. Thereupon the SYRACVSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoisted saile, got the straights of Nicias passage, stopped the riuers mouths, and brake vp the bridges: and then cast their horsemen in a squadron in the next plaine fields adioyning, so that the ATHENIANS had no way left to escape and passe by them without fighting. At last notwithstanding, hauing stayed all that day and the next night following, they put themselues in iourney, and departed with great cries and lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall countrie, and not out of their enemies land: as well for the great distresse and necessitie wherein they were (lacking all things needfull to sustaine life,) as also for the extreame sorrow they felt, to leaue their sore wounded companions and diseased kinsemen and friends behind them, that could not for their weakenesse follow the campe, but specially for that they looked for some worse matter to fall to themselues, then that which they saw present before their eyes to be happened vnto their fellowes. But of all the most pitifull sightes to behold in that campe, there was none more lamentable lamentable nor miſerable, then the perſon of Nicias ſelfe: who being tormented with his diſeaſe, and waxen very leane and pale, was alſo vnworthily brought to extreame want of naturall ſuſtenance, euen when he had moſt neede of comfort, being very ſickly. Yet notwithſtanding his weakeneſſe and infirmitie, he tooke great paines, and ſuffered many things which the ſoundeſt bodies do labour much to ouercome and ſuffer: making it appeare euidently to euery man, that he did not abide all that paines for any reſpect of himſelfe, or deſire that he had to ſaue his owne life, ſo much as for their ſakes, in that he yeelded not vnto preſent deſpaire. For where the ſouldiers for very feare and ſorrow burſt out into teares and bitter wailing, Nicias ſelfe ſhewed, that if by chaunce he were forced at any time to do the like, it was rather vpon remembrance of the ſhame and diſhonour that came into his mind, to ſee the vnfortunate ſucceſſe of this voyage, in ſteed of the honour and victorie they hoped to haue brought home, then for any other reſpect. But if to ſee Nicias in this miſerie, did moue the lookers on to pitie: yet did this much more increaſe their compaſſion, when they remembred Nicias words in his orations continually to the people, to breake this iourney, and to diſſwade them from the enterpriſe of this warre. For then they plainely iudged him not to haue deſerued theſe troubles. Yet furthermore, this cauſed the ſouldiers vtterly to deſpaire of helpe from the gods, when they conſidered with themſelues, that ſo deuout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing vndone that might tend to the honour and ſeruice of the gods) had no better ſucceſſe, then the moſt vile and wicked perſons in all the whole armie. All this notwithſtanding, Nicias ſtrained himſelfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull words, and his kind vſing of euery man: to let them know that he fainted not vnder his burden, nor yet did yeeld to this his misfortune and extreme calamitie. And thus trauelling eight daies iourny out right together, notwithſtanding that he was by the way continually ſet vpon, wearied and hurt: yet he euer maintained his bands, & led them whole in company, vntill that Demoſthenes with all his bands of ſoldiers was taken priſoner, in a certaine village called POLYZELIOS: where remaining behind, he was enuironed by his enemies in fight, and ſeeing himſelfe ſo compaſſed in, drew out his ſword, and with his owne hands thruſt himſelfe thorow, but died not of it, becauſe his enemies came ſtraight about him, and tooke hold of him. The SYRACVSANS thereupon went with ſpeed to Nicias, and told him of Demoſthenes caſe. He giuing no credit to them, ſent preſently certaine of his horſemen thither to vnderſtand the truth: who brought him word that Demoſthenes and all his men were taken priſoners. Then he beſought Gylippus to treate of peace, to ſuffer the poore remaine of the ATHENIANS to depart out of SICILE with ſafetie, and to take ſuch hoſtages for the ſure payment of all ſuch ſummes of money the SYRACVSANS had diſburſed by meanes of this warre, as ſhould like himſelfe: which he promiſed he would cauſe the ATHENIANS to performe and ſatisfie vnto them. Howbeit the SYRACVSANS would in no wiſe hearken to peace, but cruelly threatening and reuiling them that made motion hereof, in rage gaue a new onſet vpon him, more fiercely then euer before they had done. Nicias being then vtterly without any kind of victuals, did notwithſtanding hold out that night, and marched all the next day following (though the enemies darts ſtil flew about their eares) vntill he came to the riuer of Aſinarus, into the which the SYRACVSANS did forcibly driue them. Some others of them alſo dying for thirſt, entred the riuer of themſelues, thinking to drinke. But there of all others was the moſt cruell ſlaughter of the poore wretches, euen as they were drinking: vntill ſuch time as Nicias falling downe flat at Gylippus feete, ſaid thus vnto him: Since the gods haue giuen thee (Gylippus) victorie, ſhew mercy, not to me that by theſe miſeries haue won immortall honor and fame, but vnto theſe poore vanquiſhed ATHENIANS: calling to thy remembrance, that the fortunes of warre are common, and how that the ATHENIANS haue vſed you LACEDÆMONIANS courteouſly, as often as fortune fauoured them againſt you. Gylippus beholding Nicias, & perſwaded by his words, tooke cõpaſſion of him (for he knew he was a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS at the laſt peace concluded betwixt them, & furthermore thought it great honor to him, if he could cary away the two Captains or Generals of his enemies priſoners) ſhewed him mercy, gaue him words of comfort, and moreouer commanded beſides that they ſhould take all the reſidue priſoners. But his commandement was not knowne in time to all: inſomuch as there were many mo ſlaine then taken, although ſome priuate ſoldiers ſaued diuers notwithſtanding by ſtealth. Now the SYRACVSANS hauing brought all the priſoners that were openly taken into a troupe together, firſt vnarmed them, then taking their weapons from them, hung them vp vpon the goodlieſt young trees that ſtood vpon

the riuers ſide in token of triumph. And ſo putting on triumphing garlands vpon their heads, and hauing trimmed their owne horſes in triumphant manner, and alſo ſhorne all the horſes of their enemies: in this triumphing ſort they made their entrie into the city of SYRACVSA, hauing glorioufly ended the moſt notable warre that euer was amongſt the GREEKES one againſt another, and attained alſo the nobleſt victorie that could be atchieued,& that only by force of armes and valiancie. So at their returne, a councell and aſſembly was holden at SYRACVSA, by the citizens and their confederates: in the which, Eurycles one of the Oratours (a practiſer in publike cauſes) firſt made petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for euer thenceforth be kept holy-day, without any maner of worke, or labour, but only to do ſacrifice to the gods, and that the feaſt ſhould be called, Aſinarus feaſt, after the name of the riuer where the ouerthrow was giuen. This victorie was had the ſixe and twentieth day of the moneth of Iuly. And as touching the priſoners, that the confederates of the ATHENIANS and their ſlaues ſhould be openly ſold by the drumme: and that the natural ATHENIANS which were free-men and their confederates of the country of SICILE, ſhould be clapped in irons, and laid in priſon, the Captaines onely excepted, whom they ſhould put to death. The SYRACVSANS confirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perſwade them, that to be mercifull in victory, would be more honor vnto them, then the victory it ſelfe: they thruſt him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made ſute that for the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, he might cary them aliue with him to SPARTA: he was not only ſhamefully denied, but moſt vilely abuſed, ſo luſty were they growne vpon this victorie, beſide alſo that in the time of the war they were offended with him, & could not endure his ſtreight ſeuere LACONIAN gouernment. Timæus ſaith moreouer, that they accuſed him of couetouſnes and theft, which vice he inherited from his father. For Cleandridres his father was conuict for extortion, and baniſhed ATHENS. And Gylippus ſelfe hauing ſtolen thirtie talents out of a thouſand which Lyſander ſent to SPARTA by him, and hauing hid them vnder the eauings of his houſe, being bewrayed, was compelled with ſhame to flie his countrey, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lyſander. So Timæus writeth, that Nicias & Demoſthenes were not ſtoned to death by the SYRACVSANS, as Thucydides & Philiſtus report, but that they killed themſelues, vpon word ſent them by Hermocrates (before the aſſembly of the people was broken vp) by one of his men whom the keepers of the priſon let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were caſt out at the iayle doore, for euery man to behold. I haue heard there is a target at this preſent to be ſeene in a temple at SYRACVSA, which is ſaid to be Nicias target, couered all ouer with gold and purple ſilke, paſſing finely wrought together. As for the other priſoners of the ATHENIANS, the moſt of them dyed of ſickneſſe, and of ill handling in the priſon: where they had no more allowed them to liue withall but two diſhfuls of barley for their bread, and one of water for each man a day. Indeed many of them were conueyed away, and ſold for ſlaues: and many alſo that ſcaped vnknowne as ſlaues, were alſo ſold for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the print of a horſe, who notwithſtanding beſides their bondage endured alſo this paine. But ſuch, their humble patience and modeſty did greatly profit them: for either ſhortly after they were made freemen, or if they ſtill continued in bondage, they were gently intreated, and beloued of their maiſters. Some of them were ſaued alſo for Eurypides ſake. For the SICILIANS liked the verſes of this Poet better, then they did any other GRECIANS verſes of the midſt of GRECE. For if they heard any rimes or ſongs like vnto his, they would haue them by hart, & one would preſent them to another with great ioy. And therfore it is reported, that diuers eſcaping this bondage, & returning againe to ATHENS, went very louingly to ſalute Eurypides, & to thank him for their liues: and told him how they were deliuered from ſlauery, only by teaching them thoſe verſes which they remembred of his works. Others told him alſo, how that after the battell, they ſcaping by flight, and wandering vp and downe the fields, met with ſome that gaue them meate and drinke to ſing his verſes. And this is not to be maruelled at, weighing the report made of a ſhip of the city of CAVNVS, that on a time being chaſed in thither by pyrats, thinking to ſaue themſelues within their ports, could not at the firſt be receiued, but had repulſe: howbeit being demanded whether they could ſing any of Eurypides ſongs, and anſwering that they could, were ſtraight ſuffered to enter, and come in. The newes of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleeued at the firſt, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a ſtranger that landed in the hauen of PIRÆA, went and ſate him downe (as the maner is) in a Barbers ſhop, and thinking it had bene commonly known there, began to talk of it.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Craſſus.

Marcus Craſſus was the ſonne of a Cenſor, who had alſo receiued the honour of triumph: but himſelfe was brought vp in a litle houſe with two other of his brethren, which were both maried in their fathers & mothers life time, and kept houſe together. Whereupon it came to paſſe, that he was a man of ſuch ſober and temperate diet, that one of his brethren being deceaſed, he maried his wife by whom he had children. For women, he liued as continent a life, as any ROMAINE of his time: notwithſtanding, afterwards being of riper yeares, he was accuſed by Plotinus to haue defloured one of the Veſtall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cauſe of that ſuſpition grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleaſant garden hard by the ſuburbes of the city, wherewith Craſſus was maruellouſly in loue, and would faine haue had it good cheape: & vpon this onely occaſion was often ſeene in ſpeech with her, which made the people ſuſpect him. But for as much as it ſeemed to the Iudges that his couetouſneſſe was the cauſe that made him follow her, he was cleared of the inceſt ſuſpected, but he neuer left following of the Nunne, till he had got the garden of her. The ROMAINES ſay there was but that onely vice of couetouſneſſe in Craſſus, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine owne opinion, me thinkes he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, ſince it grew ſo great, as the note of that onely did hide and couer all his other vices. Now to ſet out his extreme couetous deſire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifeſt reaſons.

Marcus Craſſus kinred, and youth.

Craſſus couetouſneſſe.

Craſſus riches.

The firſt, his manner and meanes he vſed to get: and the ſecond, the greatneſſe of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worth, then three hundred talents. And during the time that he dealt in the affaires of the common wealth, he offered the tenths of all his goods wholly vnto Hercules, kept open houſe for all the people of ROME, and gaue alſo to euery citizen of the ſame as much corne as would keepe him three moneths: and yet when he went from ROME to make warre with the PARTHIANS, himſelfe being deſirous to know what all he had was worth, found that it amounted to the ſumme of ſeuen thouſand one hundred talens. But if I may with licence vſe euill ſpeech, writing a troth: I ſay he got the moſt part of his wealth by fire and bloud, raiſing his greateſt reuenew of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had taken the citie of ROME, he made portſale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to thoſe that gaue moſt, terming them his booty, onely for that he would the nobilitie, and greateſt men of power in the citie ſhould be partakers with him of this iniquitie: and in this open ſale Craſſus neuer left taking of gifts, nor buying of things of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Craſſus perceiuing that the greateſt decay commonly of the buildings in ROME came by fire, and falling downe of houſes, through the ouermuch weight by numbers of ſtories built one vpon another: bought bondmen that were maſons, carpenters, and theſe deuiſours and builders, and of thoſe he had to the number of fiue hundred. Afterwards, when the fire tooke any houſe, he would buy the houſe while it was a burning, and the next houſes adioyning to it, which the owners ſold for litle, being then in danger as they were, and a burning: ſo that by proceſſe of time, the moſt part of the houſes in ROME came to be his. But notwithſtanding that he had ſo many ſlaues to his workemen, he neuer built any houſe from the ground, ſauing his owne houſe wherein he dwelt: ſaying, that ſuch as delighted to build, vndid themſelues without helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mines of ſiluer, many ploughs, and a number of hinds and ploughmen to follow the ſame: yet all that commodity was nothing, in reſpect of the profit his ſlaues and bondmen brought him daily in. As readers, ſcriueners, goldſmiths, bankers, receiuers, ſtewards of houſhold, caruers, and other ſuch officers at the table, taking paines himſelfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to inſtruct them what they ſhould do: and to be ſhort, he thought the greateſt care a good houſholder ought to haue, was to ſee his ſlaues or ſeruants well taught, being the moſt liuely cattell and beſt inſtruments of a mans houſe. And ſurely therein his opinion was not ill, at the leaſt if he thought as he ſpake: that all things muſt be done by ſeruants, and his ſeruants muſt be ruled by him. For we ſee that the art and skill to be a good husband, when it conſiſteth in gouernement of things without life or ſence, is but a baſe thing, only tending to gaine: but wen it dependeth vpon good order and gouernement of men, me thinkes then it is to know how to gouerne well a common wealth. But as his iudgement was good in the other, ſo was it verie bad in this: that he thought no man rich and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole armie with his owne proper goods. For the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to ſay) is not made with any certaintie of expence: and therefore there muſt no ſufficiencie of riches be limited for the maintenance of the ſame. But herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion: who hauing allowed euerie ROMAINE fourteene acres land (called with them, Iugera) vnderſtanding that ſome were not pleaſed, but would haue more, made them this anſwer: The gods forbid any ROMAINE ſhould thinke that land litle, which indeed is inough to ſuffiſe for his maintenance. This notwithſtanding, Craſſus was courteous to ſtrangers, for his houſe was open to them all, and he lent his friends money without intereſt: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he roundly demaund his money of them. So, his courteſie to lend many times without intereſt, did more trouble them, than if he had taken very great vſury. Indeed when he bad any man to come to his table, his fare was but euen ordinarie, without all exceſſe: but his fine and cleanly ſeruice, and the good entertainement he gaue euery man that came to him, pleaſed them better, than if he had bene more plentifull of diet and diſhes. As for his learning and ſtudie, he chiefly ſtudied eloquence, and that ſort ſpecially that beſt would ſerue his turne to ſpeake in open preſence: ſo that he became the beſt ſpoken man in ROME of all his time, and by his great induſtry and diligent indeuour excelled all them that euen by nature were moſt apt vnto it. For ſome ſay, he had neuer ſo ſmall nor litle a cauſe in hand, but he alwayes came prepared, hauing ſtudied his caſe before for pleading: and oftentimes alſo when Pompey, Cæſar, and Cicero refuſed to riſe and ſpeake to matters, Craſſus would defend euerie cauſe, if he were requeſted. And therefore was he generally beloued & well thought of, becauſe he ſhewed himſelfe painfull, and

and willing to helpe euery man. Likewiſe was his gentleneſſe maruellouſly eſteemed, becauſe he ſaluted euery body curteouſly, and made much of all men: for, whomſoeuer he met in the ſtreets that ſpake to him as he paſſed and ſaluted him, were he neuer ſo meane, he would ſpeake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is ſayd alſo he was very well ſtudied in ſtories, and indifferently ſeene in Philoſophy, ſpecially in Ariſtotles workes, which one Alexander did reade vnto him, a man that became very gentle and patient of nature, by vſing of Craſſus company: for it were hard to ſay, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Craſſus, or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his friends he would euer haue Alexander abroad with him, and while they were abroad, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way: but ſo ſoone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man! to ſee that he making profeſſion of Philoſophy as he did, the poore man being in great pouerty, did not place pouerty in things indifferent. But hereof we will ſpeake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greateſt power, & comming on directly towards Rome, euery man ſuſpected ſtraight their comming was for no good to the commonwealth, but as appeared plainly, for the death and deſtruction of the nobleſt men of Rome. For it ſo fell out indeed, that they ſlue all the chiefe men they found in the city, among whom Craſſus father and his brother were of the number, and himſelfe being at that time but yong, eſcaped the preſent danger only by flight. Furthermore, Craſſus hearing that they layed waite to take him, and that the tyrants ſought him in euery place, tooke three of his friends in his company, and ten ſeruants onely, and fled into Spaine with all poſſible ſpeed, where he had bene with his father before, and had got ſome friends when he was Prætor, and ruled the country. Neuertheleſſe, ſeeing euery body afraid, and miſtruſting Marius crueltie as if he had bin at their doores, he durſt not bewray himſelfe to any man, but went into the fields, and hid him in a great caue being within the land of one Vibius Piciacus by the ſea ſide, from whence he ſent a man of his to this Piciacus, to feele what goodwill he bare him, but ſpecially for that his victuals began to faile him. Vibius hearing that Craſſus was ſafe, and had ſcaped, became very glad of it: and vnderſtanding how many perſons he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not himſelfe to ſee him, but called one of his ſlaues (who was his receiuer and occupied that ground for him) and bringing him neare the place where Craſſus was, commanded him euery night to prouide meate for ſupper, to bring it ready dreſſed to this rocke whereunder was the caue, & make no words of it, neither be inquiſitiue for whō it was, for if he did, he ſhould die for it: and otherwiſe, for keeping the thing ſecret as he commanded, he promiſed to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the ſea ſide, and is cloſed in round about with two rockes that meet together, which receiue a ſoft coole wind into them. When ye are entred into the caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollowneſſe thereof are many other caues of great receipt one within another, & beſides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a well of paſſing good water running hard by the rocke, and the naturall rifts of the rocks alſo receiuing the light without, where they meet together, do ſend it inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruellous light, & hath no dampe aire, but very pure and dry, by reaſon of the thickneſſe of the rocke, which ſendeth all the moiſtneſſe and vapour into that ſpringing well. Craſſus keeping cloſe in this caue, Vibius receiuer brought victuals thither daily to relieue him and his company, but ſaw not them he brought it to, nor could vnderſtand what they were: and yet they ſaw him plainly, obſeruing the houre and time of his comming when he brought the ſame. He prouided them no more then would euen neceſſarily ſerue their turne, and yet plenty ſufficient to make good cheare withall: for Vibius was bent to entertaine Craſſus as honourably as he could poſſible, in ſo much as he conſidered he was a young man, and therefore reaſon would he ſhould offer him ſome occaſion to take ſuch pleaſure and delight as his youth required. For to relieue his neceſſitie onely, he thought that rather a part of feare, than anie ſhew of loue towards him. One day he tooke two faire young damſels, and brought them with him to the ſea ſide: and when he came to the caue, ſhewed them where they ſhould get vp, and bad them not be afraid. Craſſus at the firſt, when he ſaw the young wenches, was affraid he had bene betrayed: yet he aſked them what they were, and whom they ſought. They being inſtructed by Vibius what they ſhould ſay, aunſwered, that they ſought their maiſter that was hidden there. Then Craſſus knew this was Vibius mirth to ſhew him courteſie: ſo he receiued them into his caue, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderſtand by them what he lacked. Feneſtella writeth, that he ſaw one of them when ſhe was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this tale

many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyen hidden in this caue eight moneths) vnderstanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so soone as he made himselfe to be knowne, there repaired a great number of souldiers vnto him, of whom he only chose two thousand fiue hundred, and with them passed by many cities, and sacked one called MALACA, as diuerse do write, but he flatly denied it, and stoutly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwards hauing gotten ships together, went into AFRICKE, to Metellus Pius, a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great armie together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring with him, went vnto Sylla, who welcomed and honoured him as much, as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwards arriuing in ITALY, intending to imploy all the yong nobilitie he had in his company, gaue euery one of them charge vnder him, and sent Crassus into the countrey of the MARSIANS, to leauy men of warre there. Crassus desiring certaine bands of Sylla to aide him, being driuen to passe by his enemies: Sylla answered him angerly againe: I giue thee thy father, thy brother, thy friends and kinsmen to aide thee, whom they most wickedly haue slaine and murthered, and whose deaths I pursue with hot reuenge of maine army, vpon those bloudy murtherers that haue slaine them. Crassus being netled with these words, departed thence presently, and stoutly passing through his enemies, leauied a good number of souldiers: and was euer after ready at Syllaes commaundement in all his warres. Here began first (as they say) the strife and contention betwixt him and Pompey. For Pompey being yonger than Crassus, and borne of a wicked father in ROME, whom the people more hated than euer they did man: came yet to great honor by his valiancy, and by the notable acts he did in the warres at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honour many times, which he seldome did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto those that were his equals: as to rise vp when he came towards him, to put of his cap, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieutenant generall. And this galled Crassus to the hart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of war at that time, and also because these two vices that were bred in him, misery and couetousnesse, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the sacke of the city of TYDER, which he tooke, he priuily got the most part of the spoile to himselfe, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the last battell of all this ciuill warre (which was the greatest and most dangerous of all other) euen before ROME it selfe, the wing that Sylla led, was repulsed and ouerthrowne: but Crassus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent Sylla word of his victory, and demaunded victuals for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging the confiscate goods of the outlawes appointed to be slaine, for litle or nothing. And it is sayd also, that he made one an outlaw in the countrey of the BRVTIANS, without Syllaes priuitie or commandement, only to haue his goods. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vse him in any open seruice. Surely this is a strange thing, that Crassus selfe being a great flatterer of other, and could creepe into any mans fauor, was yet himselfe easie to be won through flattery, of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is sayd of him that he had this property: that though himselfe was as extremely couetous as might be, yet he bitterly reproued and vtterly misliked them that had his owne humor of auarice. Pompeyes honour that he attained vnto daily, by bearing great charge and rule in the warres, did greatly trouble Crassus: both because he obtained the honour of triumph before he came to be Senator, and also for that the ROMAINES commonly called him, Pompeius Magnus, to say, Pompey the great. Crassus being in place on a time when one sayd that saw Pompey comming, See, Pompey the great is come. And how great I pray ye, sayd he scornefully? howbeit despairing that he could not attaine to match him in the warres, he gaue himselfe vnto the affaires of the city: and by his paines and industrie of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that sued for any office, or demaunded any thing else of the people, he attained in the end to the like estimation and authority that Pompey was come vnto, by his many noble victories. And there was one notable thing in either of them. For Pompeyes fame and power was greater in ROME, when himselfe was absent: and contrariwise when he was there present, Crassus oftentimes was better esteemed than he. Pompey caried a great maiesty and grauity in his maner of life, would not be seene often of the people, but kept from repairing to open places, and would speake but in few mens causes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauour and credit whole for himselfe, when he stood in need to employ the same. Where Crassus diligence was profitable to manie, because he kept continually in the market

market place, and was easie to be repaired vnto by any man that required his helpe, daily following those exercises, indeuouring himselfe to pleasure euerie man: so that by this easie accesse and familiaritie, for fauour and goodwill, he grew to exceed the grauity any maiesty of Pompey. But as for the worthinesse of their persons, their eloquence of speech, and their good grace and countenance: in all those (it is sayd) Pompey and Crassus were both alike. And this enuy and emulation neuer caried Crassus away, with any open malice or ill will. For though he was sory to see Pompey and Cæsar honoured aboue him: yet the worme of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Cæsar when he was taken by pyrates in Asia (as he was once) and being kept prisoner cried out aloud: O Crassus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou shalt heare I am in prison! This notwithstanding, they were afterwards good friends, as it appeareth: for Cæsar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prætor into Spaine, and not being able to satisfie his creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to stay and arrest his cariage: Crassus in that time of need forsooke him not, but became his surety for the summe of eight hundred and thirtie talents. In fine, all Rome being deuided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Cæsar, and Crassus (for as for Cato, the estimation they had of his fidelitie was greater than his authoritie: and his vertue more wondred at then practised) in so much as the graueſt and wiſeſt men tooke part with Pompey. The liueliest youths, and likeliest to runne into desperate attempts, they followed Cæsars hope. Crassus keeping the middest of the streame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes chaunged his mind and purpose. For in matters of gouernement in the commonweale, he neither shewed himselfe a constant friend, nor a daungerous enemy: but for gaine, was easily made friend or foe. So that in a moment they saw him praise and reproue, defend and condemne, the same lawes, and the same men. His estimation grew more, through the peoples feare of him: then for any goodwill they bare him. As appeareth by the answer that one Sicinius (a very busie headed man, and one that troubled euerie gouernor of the commonweale in in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not busie with Crassus amongst the rest: and how it happened that he so scaped his handes? O, sayd he, he caries hay on his horne. The manner was then at Rome, if any man had a curst bullocke that would strike with his horne, to wind hay about his head, that the people might beware of him when they met him. The commotion of fencers, which some call Spartacus warre, their wasting and destroying of Italie came vpon this occasion. In the citie of Capua, there was one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fencers at vnrebated foiles, whom the Romaines call Gladiatores, whereof the most part were Gaules and Thracians. These men were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had committed, but onely for the wickednesse of their maister that had bought them, and compelled them by force, one to fight with another at the sharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to steale away: but their conspiracie being bewrayed, three score and eighteene of them entred into a cookes house, and with the spits and kitchin-knives, which there they got, went quite out of the citie. By the way they fortuned to meete with cartes loden with fencers weapons, that were brought from Capua going to some other city: those they also tooke by force, and arming themselues therewith, got them then to a strong place of situation. Where amongst themselues they choose three Captaines, and one Spartacus a Thracian borne (and of those countrymen that go wandring vp and downe with their heardes of beasts neuer staying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not onely valiant, but strong made withall, and endued with more wisdome and honesty, than is commonly found in men of his state and condition: and for ciuilitie & good vnderstanding, a man more like to the Grecians, than any of his country men cõmonly be. It is reported, that when Spartacus came first to Rome to be sold for a slaue, there was found as he slept, a snake wound about his face. His wife seeing it, being his owne country woman, and a wise woman besides, possest with Bacchus spirit of diuination: said plainly that it did signifie, that one day he should be of great power, much dread, and haue very good successe. This same woman propheteſſe was then with him, and followed him likewise when he fled. Now first they ouerthew certaine souldiers that came out of Capua against them, thinking to take them: and stripping them of their armor and weapons, made them glad to take the fencers weapons, which they threw away as vile & vnseemly. After that, the Romaines sent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thousand men. Who besieged them in their fort, situate vpon a hill that had a very steepe and narrow ascent vnto it, and kept the passage vp to them: all the rest of the ground round about it, was nothing but high rockes hanging ouer, and vpon them great ſtore of wild vines. Of them the bondmen cut the ſtrongeſt ſtrips, and made therof ladders, like to theſe ſhip ladders of ropes, of ſuch a length and ſo ſtrong, that they reached from the top of the hill euen to the verie bottome: vpon thoſe they all came ſafely downe, ſauing one that taried aboue to throw downe their armour after them, who afterwards by the ſame ladder ſaued himſelfe laſt of all. The Romaines miſtruſting no ſuch matter, theſe bondmen compaſſed the hill round, aſſailed them behind, and put them in ſuch a feare with the ſudden onſet, as they fled vpon it euerie man, and ſo was their campe taken. Thereupon diuerſe heardmen and ſhepheards that kept cattell hard by the hill, ioyned with the Romaines that fled, being ſtrong and hardy men: of which ſome they armed, and others they vſed as ſcouts and ſpials to diſcouer. Vpon this ouerthrow was ſent another Captaine from Rome, called Publius Varinus, againſt theſe bondmen: who firſt ouercame Furius, the Lieutenant of Varinus in battell, and two thouſand of his men: and after that againe they ſlue one Coſsinius, and ouerthrew a great armie of his, being ioyned with Publius Varinus, as his fellow and counſellor. Spartacus hauing intelligence that Coſsinius was bathing himſelfe at a place called the ſalt pits, had almoſt taken him tardy, hauing much ado by flight to ſaue himſelfe: notwithſtanding, Spartacus wan all his cariage at that time, and hauing him hard in chaſe, tooke his whole campe with great ſlaughter of his men, among whom Coſsinius ſelfe was ſlaine. Spartacus hauing thus now in ſundry battels and encounters ouercome the Prætor himſelfe, Publius Varinus, and at the length taken his ſergeants from him that caried the axes before him, and his owne horſe whereon he rode himſelfe: was growne then to ſuch a power, as he was dreaded of euery man. Yet all this notwithſtanding, Spartacus wiſely conſidering his owne force, thinking it not good to tarie till he might ouercome the power of the Romaines, marched with his army towards the Alpes, taking it their beſt way after they had paſſed them ouer, euery man to repaire home to his owne countrey, ſome into Gavle, the reſt into Thracia. But his ſouldiers truſting to their multitude, & perſwading themſelues to do great things, would not obey him therein, but went againe to ſpoile and ouerrun all Italy. The Senate of Rome being in a great perplexity, not onely for the ſhame and diſhonour that their men ſhould be ouercome in that ſort by ſlaues and rebels, but alſo for the feare and danger all Italy ſtood in beſides: ſent both the Conſuls together, Gellius and Lentulus, as vnto as difficult and dangerous a warre, as any that could haue happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Conſuls, ſetting ſuddenly vpon a band of the Germaines, which in a brauery & contempt as it were, diſpearſed themſelues from their campe, put them to the ſword euery man. Lentulus, his colleague and fellow Conſull on the other ſide, compaſſed in Spartacus round with a great army: but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led the army, gaue thē battell, ouerthrew them, and tooke all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on ſtill with his army towards the Alpes, Caſsius the prætor, and gouernor of Gavle about the Po, came againſt him with an army of ten thouſand men. Spartacus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him. Caſsius hauing loſt a great number of his men, with great difficulty ſaued himſelfe by flying. The Senate hearing of Caſsius ouerthrow, were maruellouſly offended with the Conſuls, and ſent commaundement vnto them, to leaue off the warre: and thereupon gaue the whole charge thereof vnto Marcus Craſſus, who was accompanied in this iourney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houſes, both for that he was maruellouſly eſteemed, and alſo for the goodwill they bare him. Now went Craſſus from Rome, and camped in Romania, tarying Spartacus comming, who was marching thitherward. He ſent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two legions, to fetch a compaſſe about to intrap the enemy behind: ſtraightly commaunding him to follow Spartacus rereward, but in no caſe to offer him skirmiſh nor battell. But Mummius notwithſtanding this ſtraight commaundement, ſeeing ſome hope giuen him to do good, ſet vpon Spartacus, who gaue him the ouerthrow, ſlue numbers of his men, and moe had ſlaine, ſauing that certaine of them ſaued themſelues by flight, hauing onely loſt their armour and weapons. Hereupon Craſſus was grieuouſly offended with Mummius, and receiuing his ſouldiers that fled, gaue them other armour and weapons: but yet vpon ſureties, that they ſhould keepe them better thenceforth, than they had before done. Now Craſſus of the fiue hundred that were in the firſt rankes, and that firſt fled, them he deuided into fiftie times ten, and out of euery one of thoſe he put one of them to death, as the lot fell out: renewing againe the ancient diſcipline of the Romaines to puniſh cowardly ſouldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vſe. For it is a kind of death that bringeth open ſhame withall: and becauſe it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the reſidue afraid afraid to ſee the terrour of this puniſhment. Craſſus hauing done execution in this ſort vpon his men, led his armie againſt Spartacus: who ſtill drew backe, vntill he came to the ſea ſide through the countrey of the LVCANIANS, where he found in the ſtraight of the Far of MESSINA, certaine pyrats ſhips of CILICIA, and there determined to go into SICILIA. And hauing put two thouſand men into SICILE, he then reuiued the warre there of the ſlaues, which was but in manner newly ended, and lacked ſmall prouocation to begin it againe. But theſe pyrats hauing promiſed Spartacus to paſſe him ouer thither, and alſo taken gifts of him, deceiued him, and brake their promiſe. Whereupon Spartacus returning backe againe from the ſea ſide, went and camped within a litle Ile of the RHEGIANS. Craſſus comming thither to ſecke him, and perceiuing that the nature of the place taught him what he ſhould do: determined with a wall to choke vp the barre or channell entring into this litle Iland, both to keepe his men occupied from idleneſſe, and his enemies alſo from victuall. This was a maruellous hard and long peece of worke, notwithſtanding Craſſus finiſhed it beyond all mens expectation in a very ſhort time, and brought a trench from one ſide of the ſea to the other ouerthwart this barre, which was three hundred furlongs in length, fifteene foote broad, and ſo many in height: and vpon the top of this trench built a high wall, of a maruellous ſtrength, whereof Spartacus at the firſt made light account, and laughed at it. But when pillage began to faile him, and trauelling all about the Ile for victuals, perceiuing himſelfe to be ſhut in with this wall, and that there was no kind of victuals to be had within all the compaſſe of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boiſterous night, the wind being very great, when it ſnowed exceedingly, ſet his men on worke, and filled vp a peece of the trench (being a ſmall breadth) with earth, ſtones, and boughes of trees, whereupon he paſſed ouer the third part of his army. Craſſus at the firſt then became afraid, leaſt Spartacus would haue taken his way directly toward ROME: but he was ſoone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling againſt Spartacus, went and camped by themſelues by the lake of LVCANIA, which water by report hath this variable propertie, that at certaine times it changeth and becommeth very ſweete, and at ſome other times againe ſo ſalt and brackiſh, as no man can drinke it. Craſſus going to ſet vpon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great number of them, nor follow them very farre: becauſe Spartacus came preſently to the reſcue with his armie, who ſtayed the chaſe. Craſſus had written letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, and Pompey out of SPAINE, whereof he then repented him, and made all the poſſible ſpeed he could to end this warre, before either of them came thither: knowing, that which of them ſo euer came to his helpe, to him would the people giue the honour of ending this warre, and not to himſelfe. Wherefore he firſt determined to aſſaile them that had reuolted from Spartacus, and camped by themſelues: who were led by Caius Canicius, and another called Caſtus. So Craſſus ſent ſixe thouſand footmen before to take a hill, commaunding them to lie as cloſe as they could, that their enemies might not diſcouer them: and ſo they did, and couered their morians and head-peeces as well as might be, from being ſeene. Neuertheleſſe they were diſcouered by two women doing ſacrifice for the ſafetie of their armie: and thereupon were all in great hazard of caſting away, had not Craſſus bene, who came in time to their aide, and gaue the enemies the cruelleſt battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were ſlaine of the ſlaues at that battell, twelue thouſand and three hundred, of which, two onely were found hurt in the backes, and all the reſt ſlaine in the place of their rankes, valiantly fighting where they were ſet in battell ray. Spartacus after this ouerthrow, drew towards the mountaines of Petelie, whither Quintus one of Craſſus Lieutenants, & Scroſa his treaſurer followed him, ſtill skirmiſhing with his rereward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned ſuddenly vpon them, made the ROMAINES flie that ſtill harried his men in that ſort, and hurt Scroſa Craſſus treaſurer ſo ſore, that he hardly eſcaped with life. But the vantage they had of the ROMAINES by this ouerthrow, fell out in the end to the vtter deſtruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the moſt of them fugitiue bondmen, grew to ſuch a ſtoutneſſe and pride of themſelues, that they would no more flie from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their leaders and Captaines: but by the way as they went, they compaſſed them in with their weapons, and told them, that they ſhould go backe againe with them whether they would or not, and be brought through LVCANIA againſt the ROMAINES. All this made for Craſſus as he wiſhed, for he had receiued newes that Pompey was comming, and that diuerſe were ſuters for him at ROME to be ſent in this iourney, saying, that the last victorie of this warre was due to him, and that he would dispatch it at a battell, as soone as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight, lodged as neare the enemie as he could, and made his men one day cast a trench, which the bondmen seeking to preuent, came with great furie, and set vpon them that wrought. Whereupon fell out a hot skirmish, and still supplies came on of either side: so that Spartacus in the end perceiuing he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had set them in order, and that they brought him his horse he was wont to fight on: he drew out his sword, and before them all slue the horse dead in the place, saying: If it be my fortune to win the field, I know I shall haue horse enow to serue my turne: and if I chaunce to be ouercome, then shall I need no more horses. After that, he flew in among the Romaines, thinking to attaine to fight with Crassus, but he could not come neare him: yet he slue with his owne hands two Romaine Centurions that resisted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forsooke him and fled, so as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies: who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Crassus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had shewed himselfe a noble and valiant Captaine, venturing his person in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honour of ending this warre: for the slaues that scaped from this last battell where Spartacus was slaine, fell into Pompeys hands, who made an end of all those rebellious rascals. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassus had ouercome the slaues in battell, but that he himselfe had pulled vp that warre euen by the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into Rome, and triumphed for his victory of Sertorius, and the conquest of Spaine. Crassus also sued not for the great triumph, neither thought he the small Ouation triumph on foote, which they graunted him, any honour vnto him, for ouercommiug a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this small triumph, whereby it was called Ouatio, how much it differeth from the great triumph, see Marcellus life, where we haue at large discoursed thereof. Now Pompey being called to be Consull: Crassus, though he stood in good hope to be chosen Consull with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer desirous to make Crassus beholding to him: whereupon he dealt friendly for him, and spake openly in the assembly of the citie, that he would no lesse thanke the people to appoint Crassus his companion and fellow Consull with him, then for making himselfe Consull. But notwithstanding they were both Consuls together in office, their friendship held not, but were euer at iarre, and the one against the other. So by meanes of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulship, without any memorable act done: sauing that Crassus made a great sacrifice to Hercules, and kept an open feast for the people of Rome of a thousand tables, and gaue to euery citizen corne to find him three moneths. But in the end of their Consulship, at a common councell holden, there was a knight of Rome called Onatius Aurelius (a man not greatly knowne, for that he had no dealings in the state, and kept most in the countrey,) who getting vp to the pulpit for orations, told the people what a vision he had seene in his dreame. Iupiter, sayd he, appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye should not put Crassus and Pompey out of their office, before they were reconciled together. He had no sooner spoken the words, but the people commaunded them to be friends. Pompey sate still, and sayd neuer a word to it. But Crassus rose, and tooke Pompey by the hand, and turning him to the people, told them aloud: My Lords of Rome, I do nothing vnworthie of my selfe, to seeke Pompeys friendship and fauour first, since you your selues haue called him the Great before he had any haire vpon his face, and that ye gaue him the honour of triumph before he was Senator. And this is all that Crassus did of any account in his Consulship. When he was Censor also, he passed it ouer without any act done. For he reformed not the Senate, mustered not the men of warre, nor tooke any view or estimate of the peoples goods: although Lutatius Catulus was his colleague and fellow Censor, as gentle a person as any of that time that liued in Rome. Now Crassus at the first entry into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent act, to bring Egypt to pay tribute to the Romaines, Catulus did stoutly withstand him: wherby dissention falling out betweene them, they both did willingly resigne their office. In that great conspiracy of Catiline, which in maner ouerthrew the whole state and commonwealth of Rome, Crassus was had in some iealousie and mistrust: because there was one of the confederates that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credit vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainely accuse Crassus and Cæsar, as confederates with Catiline: howbeit this oration oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made alſo, when his office and authority of Conſull ceaſed, he ſayd: that Craſſus came one night to him, and ſhewed him a letter touching Catiline, certainely confirming the conſpiracie then in examination. For which cauſe Craſſus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by meane of his ſonne. For Publius Craſſus much fauoring eloquence, and being giuen to his booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero: in ſuch ſort, that vpon his baniſhment he put on changed garments as Cicero did, and procured many other youths to do the like alſo, and in fine, perſwaded his father to become his friend. Cæſar now returning to ROME from the prouince he had in gouernement, intended to ſue for the Conſulſhip: and perceiuing that Pompey and Craſſus were againe at a iarre, thought thus with himſelfe, that to make the one of them his friend to further his ſute, he ſhould but procure the other his enemy: and minding therefore to attaine his deſire with the fauour of them both, ſought firſt the meanes to make them friends, and perſwaded with them, that by their controuerſie the one ſeeking the others vndoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus, and Cato, of the greater authoritie, who of themſelues were of no power, if they two ioyned in friendſhip together: for making both their friends and factions one, they might rule the ſtate and commonwealth euen as they would. Cæſar hauing by his perſwaſion reconciled Craſſus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made themſelues vnuincible, which afterwards turned to the deſtruction of the people and Senate of ROME. For he made them not only greater than they were before, the one by the others meanes: but himſelfe alſo of great power through them. For when they began to fauour Cæſar, he was ſtraight choſen Conſull without any deniall: and ſo behaued himſelfe in the Conſulſhip, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then ſent him to gouerne the GAVLES: which was, as a man may ſay, euen themſelues to put him into the caſtell that ſhould keepe all the city in ſubiection: imagining that they two ſhould make ſpoile and good booty of the reſt, ſithence they had procured him ſuch a gouernement. Now for Pompey, the cauſe that made him commit this error was nothing elſe, but his extreme ambition. But as for Craſſus, beſides his old vice of couetouſneſſe rooted in him, he added to that a new auarice and deſire of triumphs and victories, which Cæſars fame for proweſſe and noble acts in warres did throughly kindle in him, that he being otherwiſe his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferiour: which furie tooke ſuch hold as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the commonwealth to great miſerie. Thus Cæſar being come out of his prouince of GAVLE vnto LVCA, diuerſe ROMAINES went thither to ſee him, and among other Pompey and Craſſus. They hauing talked with him in ſecret, agreed among them to deuiſe to haue the whole power of ROME in their hands: ſo that Cæſar ſhould keepe his armie together, and Craſſus and Pompey ſhould take other prouinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Craſſus ſhould againe ſue the ſecond time to be Conſuls, and that Cæſars friends at ROME ſhould ſtand with them for it, ſending alſo a ſufficient number of his ſouldiers to be there at the day of chuſing the Conſuls. Thereupon Pompey and Craſſus returned to ROME to that end, but not without ſuſpition of their practiſe: for there ranne a rumour in the citie, that their meeting of Cæſar in LVCA, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he meant to make ſute to be Conſull. Pompey aunſwered them: peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the ſame queſtion: he aunſwered, he would ſue for the good men, not for the euill. Pompeys aunſwers were thought very proud and haughty. Howbeit Craſſus aunſwered more modeſty, that if he ſaw it neceſſarie for the common wealth, he would ſue to be Conſull: if not, that he would not ſtand for it. Vpon theſe words, ſome were ſo bold to make ſute for the Conſulſhip, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and Craſſus ſtanding openly for it, all the reſt left off their ſute for feare of them, Domitius onely excepted: whom Cato ſo prayed and intreated, as his kinſman and friend, that he made him to ſeeke it. For he perſwaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their libertie, and how that it was not the Conſulſhip Craſſus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyrannie: and that they ſued not for the office, but to get ſuch prouinces and armies into their hands as they deſired, vnder colour and countenance of the Conſulſhip. Cato ringing theſe words into their eares, and beleeuing it certainely to be true as he ſaid, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honeſt men ioyned with them: becauſe they wondred what the matter meant, that theſe two noble men ſhould ſue

the second time to be Consuls, and why they made sute to be ioyned together, and not to haue any other with them, considering there were so many other worthie men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey fearing he should be preuented of his purpose, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongst other, when the day came to chuse the Consuls, Domitius going early in the morning before day, accompanied with his friends to the place where the election should be: his man that caried his torch before him was slaine, by some whom Pompey had layd in waite, and many of the company hurt, and among others, Cato. And hauing thus dispersed them, he beset a house round about whither they fled for succour, and inclosed them there, vntill they were both chosen Consuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the pulpit for orations, and draue Cato out of the market place, and slue some of them that resisted and would not flie. They also then prolonged Cæsars gouernement of the Gavles for fiue yeares more, and procured for themselues by decree of the people, the countries of Syria and Spaine. Againe, when they drew lots together, Syria fell to Crassus, and Spaine to Pompey. Euerie man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one side were loth Pompey should go farre from Rome: and himselfe also louing his wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so neare her, that he might remaine the most of his time at Rome. But Crassus of all other reioyced most at his hap, that he should go into Syria: and it appeared plainely that he thought it was the happiest turne that euer came to him, for he would euer be talking of the iourney, were he in neuer so great or strange company. Furthermore, being among his friends and familiars, he would giue out such fond boasts of it, as no young man could haue made greater vaunts: which was cleane contrarie to his yeares & nature, hauing liued all his life time as modestly, and with as small ostentation as any man liuing. But then forgetting himselfe too much, had such fond conceipts in his head, as he not only hoped after the conquest of Syria, and of the Parthians, but flattered himselfe that the world should see all that Lucullus had done against king Tigranes, and Pompey against king Mithridates, were but trifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the Bactrians, the Indians, and the great Ocean sea toward the East, though in the decree passed by the people, there was no mention made of any warres against the Parthians. Now euery man saw Crassus ambition and greedie desire of honour: in so much as Cæsar selfe wrote vnto Crassus out of Gavle, commending his noble intent and forwardnesse, and wished him to go through therewith. But Atteius one of the Tribunes being bent against Crassus to withstand his departure: (hauing diuerse other confederates with him to further his purpose, who much misliked that any man of a brauery and lustinesse should make warre with any nation or people that had no way offended the Romains, but were their friends and confederates) Crassus fearing this conspiracy, prayed Pompey to assist and accompany him out of the city, because he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then. For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpose to let Crassus of his departure, and to cry out vpon him: yet when they saw Pompey go before him, with a pleasant smiling countenance, they quieted themselues, and made a lane for them, suffering them to passe on, and sayd nothing. This notwithstanding, Atteius the Tribune stepped before them, and commaunded Crassus he should not depart the city, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Crassus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commaunded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, and to arrest him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not suffer the officer to do it. So the sergeant dismissed Crassus. Then Atteius running towards the gate of the city, got a chafingdish with coles, and set it in the middest of the street. When Crassus came against it, he cast in certaine perfumes, and made sprinklings ouer it, pronouncing horrible curses, and calling vpon terrible and straunge names of gods. The Romaines say that those maner of curses are very auncient, but yet very secret, and of so great force, as he that is once cursed with that curse can neuer escape it, nor he that vseth it doth neuer prosper after it. And therefore few men do vse it, and neuer but vpon vrgent occasion. But then they much reproued Atteius, for vsing these dreadfull ceremonies and extreme curses, which were much hurtfull to the common wealth, although he for his countries sake had thus cursed Crassus. Crassus setting forward notwithstanding, sailed on, and arriued at Brvndvsivm, when winter stormes had not left the seas, and he had lost many of his ships: howbeit he landed his army, and marched through the country of Galatia. There he found king Deiotarus, a very old man, and yet building a new city: and to taunt him pretily, sayd vnto him:

Pompey made himselfe and Crassus Consuls by force.

Deiotarus, king of Galatia.

What,

What, ô King, begin you to build now in the afternoone? To whom the king of the GALATIANS againe ſmiling made aunſwer: And truly Sir Captaine, you go not very early (me thinkes) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For indeed Craſſus was three ſcore and vpward, and yet his face made him ſeeme elder then he was. But to our ſtorie againe. Craſſus being come into the countrey, had as good lucke as he looked for: for he eaſily built a bridge vpon the riuer of Euphrates, and paſſed his armie ouer it without any let or trouble. So entring into MESOPOTAMIA, he receiued many cities, that of good will yeelded themſelues vnto him. Howbeit there was one city called ZENODOTIA, whereof Appolonius was tyrant, where Craſſus loſt a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thither, tooke it by force, ſacked their goods, and ſold the priſoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this citie ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the ſame Craſſus ſuffered his men to call him Imperator, to ſay, ſoueraigne Captaine: which turned to his ſhame and reproch, and made him to be thought of a baſe mind, as one that had ſmall hope to attaine to great things, making ſuch reckoning of ſo ſmall a trifle. Thus when he had beſtowed ſeuen thouſand of his footmen in garriſon, in thoſe cities that had yeelded vnto him, and about a thouſand horſemen, he returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his ſonne Publius Craſſus to him out of GAVLE from Iulius Cæſar, who had giuen him ſuch honours, as Generals of ROME did vſe to giue to valiant ſouldiers for reward of their good ſeruice: and brought vnto his father a thouſand men of armes, all choiſe men. This me thinkes was the greateſt fault Craſſus committed in all his enterpriſe of that warre. For when he ſhould preſently haue gone on ſtill, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) he tracted time, and gaue them leiſure to prepare to encounter his force when he ſhould come againſt them. Againe they found great fault with him for ſpending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, ſeeming rather to leade a merchants life, than a chiefetaines. For he neuer ſaw his armie, nor trained them out to any marſhiall exerciſe, but fell to counting the reuenew of the cities, and was many dayes buſily occupied weying of the gold and ſiluer in the temple of the goddeſſe Hierapolis. And worſe then that: he ſent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furniſh him with a certaine number of men of warre, and then he would diſcharge them for a ſumme of money. All theſe things made him to be both ill ſpoken of, and deſpiſed of euerie bodie. The firſt token of his ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddeſſe Hierapolis, whom ſome ſuppoſe to be Venus, other ſay Iuno, and others, that ſhe is the mother and chiefe cauſe that giueth beginning of moiſture to euerie thing that commeth foorth and hath a being, and taught men the originall cauſe alſo of euerie good thing. For as Craſſus the father, and ſonne both, were comming out of the temple: Craſſus the yonger fell firſt on his face, and the father afterwards vpon his ſonne. Likewiſe as he was gathering his garriſons together, calling them out of the cities into the field, there came Ambaſſadours vnto him from Arſaces king of the PARTHIANS: who deliuered him their meſſage in few words, and told him, that if this armie he brought came from the ROMAINES to make warre with their maiſter, then that he would haue no peace nor friendſhip with them, but would make mortall warres againſt them. Further, if it were (as he had heard ſay) that Craſſus againſt the peoples minds of ROME, for his owne couetous deſire, and peculiar profite was come in a iolity to make warre with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their countrey: then in that reſpect Arſaces would deale more fauourably, in conſideration of Craſſus yeares, and was contented alſo to ſuffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in priſon, then in garriſon within his cities. Thereto Craſſus couragiouſly aunſwered, that he would make them aunſwer in the citie of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagiſes, one of the eldeſt Ambaſſadours fell a laughing, and ſhewing Craſſus the palme of his hand, told him thus: haire will ſooner grow in the palme of my hand, Craſſus, then you will come to SELEVCIA. In this ſort the Ambaſſadours tooke their leaue of Craſſus, and returned to their king Hyrodes, telling him he was to prepare for warre. In the meane ſpace, certaine of Craſſus ſouldiers whom he had left in garriſon in the cities of MESOPOTAMIA, hauing ſcaped maruellous daungerouſly and with great difficultie, brought him newes of importance, hauing themſelues ſeene the wonderfull great campe of the enemie, and their maner of fight in the aſſaults they made to the cities where they lay in garriſon. And, as it falleth out commonly among men eſcaped from any daunger making things more fearefull and daungerous then they be indeed: they reported that it was vnpoſſible by flying to ſaue themſelues, if they did follow in chaſe: neither to ouertake them alſo if they fled. And further, that they had ſuch kind of arrowes as would flie ſwifter, then a mans eye could diſcerne them, and would pierce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who ſhot them. Beſides, for the horſemens weapons they vſed, that they were ſuch, as no armour could poſſibly hold out: and their armours on the other ſide made of ſuch a temper and mettall, as no force of any thing could pierce them through. The Romaines hearing theſe newes, fell from their former ſtoutneſſe and courage, being borne in hand before, that the Parthians differed nothing at all from the Armenians and Cappadocians, whom Lucullus had ouercome and ſpoiled ſo oft, that he was wearie withall: and they had already made account, that their greateſt paines in this warre, was but the tediouſneſſe of the iourney they had to make, and the trouble they ſhould haue to follow thoſe men that would not abide them. But then contrary to expectation, they looked to come to ſtrokes, and to be luſtily fought withall. Herupon, diuerſe Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Caſſius the treaſurer was one) aduiſed Craſſus to ſtay, and to deliberate in councel to know whether he were beſt to go on, or to remaine where he was. The ſoothſayers themſelues did partly let Craſſus vnderſtand, that the gods ſhewed no good tokens in all their ſacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Craſſus gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only liſtned to them that counſelled him to make haſte. Yet Craſſus chiefeſt comfort and incouragement, was of Artabazes king of Armenia, who came to his campe with ſix thouſand horſe, which were but onely the kings cornet and gard. Againe he promiſed him other ten thouſand horſemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thouſand footmen which he kept continually in pay, and counſelled Craſſus to enter the Parthians countrey vpon Armeniaes ſide: becauſe his campe ſhould not onely haue plentie of victuals, which he would ſend him out of his countrey, but for that he ſhould alſo march in more ſafety, hauing a countrey full of mountaines and woods before him very ill for horſemen, which was the onely ſtrength and force of the Parthians. Craſſus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, and all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iourney through Mesopotamia, where he had left many good ſouldiers of the Romaines. And thus departed the king of Armenia from him. But now as Craſſus was paſſing his armie vpon the bridge he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, there fell out ſudden ſtraunge and terrible crackes of thunder, with fearefull flaſhes of lightning full in the ſouldiers faces: moreouer, out of a great blacke cloud came a wonderfull ſtorme and tempeſt of wind vpon the bridge, that the maruellous force thereof ouerthrew a great part of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Beſides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twiſe ſtriken with two great thunder-clappes. One of his great horſe in like caſe, being brauely furniſhed and ſet out, tooke the bit in his teeth, leapt into the riuer with his rider on his backe, who were both drowned, and neuer ſeene after. They ſay alſo, that the firſt Eagle and enſigne that was to be taken vp when they marched, turned backe of it ſelfe, without any hands layed vpon it. Further it fortuned that as they were diſtributing the victuals vnto the ſouldiers, after they had all paſſed ouer the bridge, the firſt thing that was giuen them, was ſalt and water lintels, which the Romaines take for a token of death and mourning, becauſe they vſe it at the funerals of the dead. After all this, when Craſſus was exhorting his ſouldiers, a word ſcaped his mouth that troubled the armie maruellouſly. For he told them that he had broken the bridge which he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, of purpoſe, becauſe there ſhould not a man of them returne backe again. Where indeed when he had ſeene that they tooke this word in ill part, he ſhould haue called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, ſeeing his men ſo amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was ſo wilfull. In the end he made ordinarie ſacrifice for the purging of his armie: and when the Soothſayer gaue him the intrailes of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, they fell out of his hands. Craſſus perceiuing that the ſtanders by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them, you ſee what age is: yet ſhall you not ſee my ſword fall out of my hand. So hauing ended his ſacrifice, he began to march forward into the countrey by the riuers ſide, with ſeuen legions of footmen, and litle lacke of foure thouſand horſe, and in manner as many ſhot and ſlings lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his ſcours that had viewed the country, and told him there was not an enemie to be ſeene in the field, howbeit that they had found the tracke of a maruellous number of horſe, which ſeemed as they were returned backe. Then Craſſus firſt of all beganne to hope well: and his ſouldiers alſo, they fell to deſpiſe the Parthians, thinking certainely that they would not come to battell with them.

Yet

Yet Cassius his treasurer euer perswaded him the contrarie, and thought it better for him to refresh his army a litle in one of the cities where he had his garrison, vntill such time as he heard more certaine newes of the enemies: or else that he would march directly towards SELEVCIA by the riuers side, which lay fit for him to victuall himselfe easily by boats that wold alwaies follow his campe, & should be sure besides that the enemies could not enuiron him behind, so that hauing no way to set vpon them but before, they should haue none aduantage of them. Crassus going about then to consult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine subtill fellow, which was the greatest mischiefe and euill, that fortune could send to Crassus at that present time, to bring him to vtter ruine and destruction. For there were some of Crassus soldiers that had serued Pompey before in that country, who knew him very wel, and remembred that Pompey had done him great pleasures: whereupon they thought that he bare great goodwill to the ROMAINS. But Ariamnes had bene laboured at that time by the king of PARTHIAES Captaines, and was won by them to deceiue Crassus, and to entice him all he could, to draw him from the riuer and the wooddy countrey, and to bring him into the plaine field, where they might compasse him in with their horsemen: for they meant nothing lesse then to fight with the ROMAINES at the swords point. This barbarous Captaine Ariamnes coming to Crassus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Crassus armie, reprouing him that he came so slowly forward, tracting time in that sort as he did, preparing himselfe as though he had neede of armour and weapon, and not of feet and hands swift & ready against the enemies: who (for the chiefest of thē) had of long time occupied thēselues to flie with their best moueables, towards the deserts of SCYTHIA & HYRCANIA. Therfore if you determine (said he) to fight, it were good you made hast to meet them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For now you haue but Surena and Sylaces, two of his Lieutenants against you, whom he hath sent before to stay you, that you follow him not: & for the king himself, be bold, he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lyed in all. For king Hyrodes had deuided his army in two parts at the first, whereof himself tooke the one, and went to spoile the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king Artabazes: and with the other he sent Surena against the ROMAINES, not for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not likely he would disdaine to come to battell with him, being one of the chiefest noblemē of ROME, and to thinke it more honorable to make war with king Artabazes in ARMENIA) but I thinke rather he did it of purpose to auoide the greater daunger, and to keepe farre off, that he might with safetie see what would happen, and therefore sent Surena before to hazard battell, and to turne the ROMAINES backe againe. For Surena was no meane man, but the second person of PARTHIA next vnto the king: in riches, reputation, valure and experience in wars, the chiefest of his time among all the PARTHIANS, and for execution, no man like him. Surena when he did but remoue into the countrey onely with his houshold, had a thousand camels to cary his sumpters, and 200 coaches of Curtisans, a thousand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many mo besides lightly armed: so that his whole traine and court made aboue 10000 horse. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by succession from his ancestors, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the royall crown or diademe vpon the kings head. Moreouer, he had restored king Hyrodes that then raigned, to his crowne, who had bene before driuen out of his realme: and had won him also the great city of SELEVCIA, himselfe being the first man that scaled the wals, and ouerthrew them with his owne hands that resisted him. And though he was vnder thirty yeares of age, yet they counted him a wise man, as well for his counsell, as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Crassus: who through his rashnesse and folly at the first, and afterwards for very feare & timerousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any pollicie or deceit. Now this barbarous captaine Ariamnes hauing then brought Crassus to beleeue all that he said, and drawne him by perswasion from the riuer of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plaine country, meeting at the first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sands where their feet sunke deep, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could discern by eye, so that not onely extreme thirst, and miserable way maruellously amazed the ROMAINS, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight vpon: that aboue all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For, neither farre nor neare any sight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, grasse, or greene hearbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endleſſe ſea of deſert ſands on euery ſide round about their campe. Then began they to ſuſpect that they were betrayed. Againe, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept in his countrey with a great warre king Hyrodes made vpon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promiſe come to aide him, yet that he wiſhed him to draw towards ARMENIA, that both their armies being ioyned together, they might the better fight with king Hyrodes, if not, that he would alwaies keepe the woody countrie, marching in thoſe vallies and places where his horſmen might be ſafe, and about the mountaines: Craſſus was ſo wilfull, as he would write no anſwer to it, but angrily told the meſſenger, that he had no leyſure then to hearken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwards he would be reuenged well enough of Artabazes treaſon. Caſsius his treaſurer was much offended with Craſſus for this anſwer: howbeit perceiuing he could do no good with him, and that he tooke euery thing in euill part, he ſaid vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithſtanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARMENIANS aſide, he rebuked him roundly, and ſaid: O thou wretch, what curſed diuell hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly haſt thou bewitched and charmed Craſſus: that thou haſt made him bring his army into this endleſſe deſert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captaine of theeues, then for a Generall and Conſull of the ROMAINES? Ariamnes being craftie and ſubtill, ſpeaking gently vnto Caſsius, did comfort him, and prayed him to haue patience, and going and comming by the bands, ſeeming to helpe the ſoldiers, he told them merily: O my fellowes, I beleeue you thinke to march through the countrie of NAPLES, and looke to meet with your pleaſant ſprings, goodly groues of wood, your naturall baths, and the good Innes round about to refreſh you, and do not remember that you paſſe through the deſerts of ARABIA and ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMAINES awhile: but afterwards he diſlodged betimes, before he was openly knowne for a traitour, and yet not without Craſſus priuity, whom he bare in hand, that he would go ſet ſome broile and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Craſſus the very ſame day came out of his tent not in his coate armour of ſcarlet, (as the manner was of the ROMAINE Generals) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembring himſelfe, he ſtraight chaunged it againe. It is ſaid moreouer, that the enſigne-bearers when they ſhould march away, had much ado to plucke their enſignes out of the ground, they ſtucke ſo faſt. But Craſſus ſcoffing at the matter, haſtened them the more to march forward, compelling the footmen to go as faſt as the horſemen, till a few of their skouts came in, whom they had ſent to diſcouer: who brought newes how the enemies had ſlaine their fellowes, and what ado they had themſelues to ſcape with life, and that they were a maruellous great armie, and well appointed to giue them battell. This newes made all the campe afraid, but Craſſus ſelf more then the reſt, ſo as he began to ſet his men in battell ray, being for haſt in maner beſides himſelfe. At the firſt following Caſsius mind, he ſet his rankes wide, caſting his ſouldiers into a ſquare battell, a good way aſunder one from another, becauſe he would take in as much of the plaine as he could, to keepe the enemies from compaſſing them in, and ſo deuided the horſemen into the wings. Yet afterwards he chaunged his mind againe, and ſtraighted the battell of his footmen, faſhioning it like a bricke, more long then broad, making a front and ſhewing their faces euery way. For there were twelue cohorts or enſignes imbattelled on either ſide, and by euery cohort a company of horſe, becauſe there ſhould be no place left without aide of horſemen, and that all his battel ſhould be alike defended. Then he gaue Caſsius the leading of one wing, his ſonne Publius Craſſus the other, and himſelfe led the battell in the middeſt. In this order they marched forward, till they came to a litle brooke called Baliſſus, where there was no great ſtore of water, but yet happily lighted on for the ſouldiers, for the great thirſt and extreame heate they had abidden all that painefull way, where they had met with no water before. There the moſt part of Craſſus Captaines thought beſt to campe all night, that they might in the meane time find meanes to know their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Craſſus yeelding to his ſons and his horſemens perſwaſion, who intreated him to march on with his armie, and to ſet vpon the enemie preſently: commaunded, that ſuch as would eate, ſhould eate ſtanding, keeping their rankes. Yet on the ſodaine, before this commaundement could runne through the whole armie, he commaunded them againe to march, not faire and ſoftly as when they go to giue battell, but with ſpeed, till they ſpied the enemies, who ſeemed not to the ROMAINES at the firſt to be ſo great a number, neither ſo brauely armed as they thought they had bene. For, concerning their great number, Surena had of purpoſe poſe hid them, with certaine troupes he ſent before: and to hide their bright armors, he had caſt cloakes and beaſts skins vpon them, but when both the armies approached neare the one to the other, and that the ſigne to giue charge was lift vp in the aire: firſt they filled the field with a dreadful noiſe to heare. For the PARTHIANS do not encourage their men to fight with the ſound of a horne, neither with trumpets nor howboies, but with great kettle drums hollow within, and about them they hang litle bels and copper rings, and with them they all make a noiſe euery where together, and it is like a dead ſound, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of a wild beaſt, and a fearefull noiſe as if it thundred, knowing that hearing is one of the ſences that ſooneſt moueth the heart and ſpirit of any man, and maketh him ſooneſt beſides himſelfe. The ROMAINS being put in feare with this dead ſound, the PARTHIANS ſtraight threw the cloths and couerings from them that hid their armor, & then ſhewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempered ſteele, that glared like fire, & their horſes barbed with ſteele & copper. And Surena alſo, generall of the PARTHIANS, who was as goodly a perſonage, and as valiant, as any other in all his hoaſt, though his beautie ſomewhat effeminate, in iudgement ſhewed ſmall likelihood of any ſuch courage: for he painted his face, and ware his haire after the faſhion of the MEDES, contrarie to the maner of the PARTHIANS, who let their haire grow after the faſhion of the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of thē, to appeare more terrible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS at the firſt thought to haue ſet vpon the ROMAINES with their pikes, to ſee if they could breake their firſt ranks. But when they drew neare, & ſaw the depth of the ROMAINS battel ſtanding cloſe together, firmly keeping their ranks: then they gaue back, making as though they fled, and diſperſed themſelues. But the ROMAINS maruelled when they found it contrarie, and that it was but a deuice to enuiron them on euery ſide. Wherupon Craſſus commanded his ſhot and light armed men to aſſaile thē, the which they did: but they went not far, they were ſo beaten in with arrowes, and driuen to retire to their force of the armed men. And this was the firſt beginning that both feared and troubled the ROMAINES, when they ſaw the vehemencie and great force of the enemies ſhot, which brake their armors, and ran through any thing they hit, were it neuer ſo hard or ſoft. The PARTHIANS thus ſtill drawing backe, ſhot all together on euery ſide, not aforehand, but at aduenture: for the battel of the ROMAINES ſtood ſo neare together, as if they would, they could not miſſe the killing of ſome. Theſe bowmen drew a great ſtrength, & had big ſtrong bowes, which ſent the arrowes frō them with a wonderfull force. The ROMAINS by means of theſe bowes were in hard ſtate. For if they kept their ranks they were grieuouſly wounded: again, if they left thē, and ſought to run vpon the PARTHIANS to fight at hand with them, they ſaw they could do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harme themſelues. For as faſt as the ROMAINES came vpon them, ſo faſt did the PARTHIANS flie from them, and yet in flying continued ſtill their ſhooting: which no nation but the SCYTHIANS could better do then they, being a matter indeed moſt greatly to their aduantage. For by their flight they beſt do ſaue themſelues, and fighting ſtill, they thereby ſhun the ſhame of that their flying. The ROMAINES ſtill defended themſelues, and held it out, ſo long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leaue fighting when they had ſpent their arrowes, or would ioyne battell with them. But after they vnderſtood that there were a great number of camels loden with quiuers ful of arrowes, where the firſt that had beſtowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiuers: then Craſſus ſeeing no end of their ſhot, began to faint, and ſent to Publius his ſon, willing him in any caſe to charge vpon the enemies, and to giue an onſet, before they were compaſſed in on euery ſide. For it was on Publius ſide, that one of the wings of the enemies battell was neareſt vnto them, and where they rode vp and downe to compaſſe them behind. Wherupon Craſſus ſonne taking thirteene hundred horſemen with him (of the which, a thouſand were of the men of armes whom Iulius Cæſar ſent) and fiue hundred ſhot, with eight enſignes of footmen hauing targets, moſt neare to the place where himſelfe then was: he put them out in breadth, that wheeling about they might giue a charge vpon them that rode vp and downe. But they ſeeing him comming, turned ſtraight their horſe and fled, either becauſe they met in a mariſh, or elſe of purpoſe to beguile this yong Craſſus, inticing him thereby as farre from his father as they could. Publius Craſſus ſeeing them flie, cryed out, theſe men will not abide vs, & ſo ſpurred on for life after thē: ſo did Cenſorinus & Megabacchus with him (the one a Senator of ROME a very eloquent man, the other a ſtout couragious valiant man of war) both of them Craſſus well approued friends, and in maner of his owne yeares. Now the horſemen of the ROMAINES being trained out thus to the chase, their footemen also would not abide behind, nor shew themselues to haue lesse hope, ioy and courage, then their horsemen had. For they thought all had bene won, and that there was no more to do, but to follow the chase: till they were gone farre from the armie, and then they found the deceipt. For the horsemen that fled before them, sodainly turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set vpon them. Wherupon they stayed, thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were so few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they set out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, and made their light horsemen wheele round about them, keeping no order at all: who galloping vp and downe the plaine, whirled vp the sand hils from the bottome with their horse feete, which raised such a wonderfull dust, that the ROMAINES could scarce see or speake one to another. For they being shut vp into a litle roome, and standing close one to another, were sore wounded with the PARTHIANS arrowes, and died of a cruell lingring death, crying out for anguish and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting themselues vpon the sand, they brake the arrowes sticking in them. Againe, striuing by force to plucke out the forked arrow heads, that had pierced farre into their bodies through their veines and sinewes, thereby they opened their wounds wider, and so cast themselues away. Many of them died thus miserably martyred: and such as died not, were not able to defend themselues. Then when Publius Crassus prayed and besought them to charge the men at armes with their barbed horse, they shewed him their hands fast nailed to the targets with arrowes, and their feet likewise shot through and nailed to the ground: so as they could neither flie nor yet defend themselues. Thereupon himselfe encouraging his horsemen, went and gaue a charge, and did valiantly set vpon the enemies, but it was with too great disaduantage, both for offence, and also for defence. For himselfe and his men with weake and light staues, brake vpon them that were armed with curaces of steele, or stiffe leather iackes. And the PARTHIANS in contrarie maner with mighty strong pikes gaue charge vpon these GAVLES, which were either vnarmed, or else but lightly armed. Yet those were they in whom Crassus most trusted, hauing done wonderfull feates of warre with them. For they receiued the PARTHIANS pikes in their hands, and tooke them about the middles, and threw them off their horse, where they lay on the ground, and could not stirre for the waight of their harnesse: and there were diuerse of them also that lighting from their horse, lay vnder their enemies horse bellies, and thrust their swords into them. Their horse flinging and bounding in the aire for very paine threw their maisters vnder feete, and their enemies one vpon another, and in the end fell dead among them. Moreouer, extreame heate and thirst did maruellously comber the GAVLES, who were vsed to abide neither of both: and the most part of their horse were slaine, charging with all their power vpon the men at armes of the PARTHIANS, and so ranne themselues in vpon the points of their pikes. At the length, they were driuen to retire towards their footmen, & Publius Crassus among them, who was very ill by reason of the wounds he had receiued. And seeing a sand hill by chaunce not farre from them, they went thither, and setting their horse in the middest of it, compassed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defend themselues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they found it contrary. For the country being plaine, they in the foremost rankes did somewhat couer them behind, but they that were behind, standing higher then they that stood foremost (by reason of the nature of the hill that was highest in the middest) could by no meanes saue themselues, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miserie and misfortune, that must needes dye without reuenge, or declaration of their valiancie. At that present time there were two GRECIANS about Publius Crassus, Hieronymus, and Nichomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the city of CARRES: they both counselled Publius Crassus to steale away with them, and to flie to a citie called ISCHNES, that was not farre from thence, and tooke the ROMAINES part. But Publius answered them, that there was no death so cruell as could make him forsake them that died for his sake. When he had so said, wishing them to saue themselues, he embraced them, and tooke his leaue of them: and being very sore hurt with the shot of an arrow through one of his hands, commaunded one of his gentlemen to thrust him through with a sword, and so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Censorinus did the like. But Megabacchus slue himselfe with his owne hands, and so did the most part of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left aliue, the PARTHIANS got vp the sand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their speares and pikes, and tooke but fiue hundred prisoners. After that, they stroke off Publius Crassus

Craſſus head, and thereupon returned ſtraight to ſet vpon his father Craſſus, who was then in this ſtate. Craſſus the father, after he had willed his ſon to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, and purſued the chaſe: and perceiuing alſo that they that remained in their great battell, did not preaſe vpon him ſo neare as they did before, becauſe that a great number of them were gone after the other for reſcue: he then began to be liuely againe, and keeping his men cloſe, retired with them the beſt he could by a hils ſide, looking euer that his ſonne would not be long before that he returned from the chaſe. But Publius ſeeing himſelf in danger, had ſent diuerſe meſſengers to his father, to aduertiſe him of his diſtreſſe, whom the PARTHIANS intercepted and ſlue by the way: and the laſt meſſengers he ſent, ſcaping very hardly, brought Craſſus newes, that his ſonne was but caſt away, if he did not preſently aide him, and that with a great power. Theſe newes were grieuous to Craſſus in two reſpects: firſt for the feare he had, ſeeing himſelfe in daunger to loſe all: and ſecondly, for the vehement deſire he had to go to his ſons helpe. Thus he ſaw in reaſon all would come to nought, and in fine determined to go with all his power, to the reſcue of his ſonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his ſons ouerthrow, with a more dreadfull noiſe and crie of victory, then euer before: and thereupon their deadly ſounding drummes filled the aire with their wonderfull noiſe. The ROMAINES then looked ſtraight for a hote alarme. But the PARTHIANS that brought Publius Craſſus head vpon the point of a launce, comming neare to the ROMAINES, ſhewed them his head, and asked them in deriſion, if they knew what houſe he was of, and who were his parents: for it is not likely (ſaid they) that ſo noble and valiant a young man, ſhould be the ſon of ſo cowardly a father, as Craſſus. The ſight of Publius Craſſus head killed the ROMAINES hearts more, then any other daunger they had bene in at any time in all the battel. For it did not ſet their harts on fire as it ſhould haue done, with anger, and deſire of reuenge: but far otherwiſe, made them quake for feare, & ſtroke them ſtarke dead to behold it. Yet Craſſus ſelfe ſhewed greater courage in this misfortune, then he before had done in all the war beſide. For riding by euery band he cried out aloud: The griefe and ſorrow of this loſſe (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine only: but the noble ſucceſſe and honor of ROME remaineth ſtill vnuincible, ſo long as you are yet liuing. Now if you pitie my loſſe of ſo noble and valiant a ſon, my good ſouldiers, let me intreate you to turne your ſorrow into furie: make them dearely buy the ioy they haue gotten: be reuenged of their crueltie, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why: aſpiring minds ſometime muſt needes ſuſtaine loſſe. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio Antiochus, but their bloud did pay for it. Our auncеſtors in old time loſt a thouſand ſhips, yea in ITALIE diuers armies and chiefetaines for the conqueſt of SICILIA: yet for all the loſſe of them, at the length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanquiſhed. For the Empire of ROME came not to that greatneſſe it now is at, by good fortune only, but by patience and conſtant ſuffering of trouble and aduerſitie, neuer yeelding or giuing place vnto any danger. Craſſus vſing theſe perſwaſions to encourage his ſouldiers for reſolution, found that all his words wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commanded them to giue the ſhoute of battell, he plainely ſaw their hearts were done, for that their ſhout roſe but faint, and not all alike. The PARTHIANS on the other ſide their ſhout was great, and luſtily they rang it out. Now when they came to ioyne, the PARTHIANS archers on horſebacke compaſſing in the ROMAINES vpon the wings, ſhot an infinite number of arrowes at their ſides. But their men at armes giuing charge vpon the front of the ROMAINES battell with their great lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a few excepted, that valiantly, and in deſperate manner ran in among them, as men rather deſiring ſo to die, then to be ſlaine with their arrowes, where they could do the PARTHIANS almoſt no hurt at all. So were they ſoone diſpatcht, with the great launces that ranne them through, head, wood and all, with ſuch a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, ſaying: they would giue Craſſus that nights reſpit, to lament and bewaile his ſonnes death: vnleſſe that otherwiſe he wiſely looking about him, thought it better for his ſafetie to come and offer himſelfe to king Arſaces mercy, then to tarie to be brought vnto him by force. So the PARTHIANS camping hard by the ROMAINES, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The ROMAINS on the other ſide had a maruellous ill night, making no reckening to bury their dead, nor to dreſſe their wounded men, that died in miſerable pain: but euery man bewailed his hard fortune, when they ſaw not one of them could eſcape, if they taried till the morning. On the other ſide, to depart in the night through that desert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Because, to carie them so away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them so behind, their pitifull cries would giue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Now though they all thought Crassus the only author of their miserie, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went aside without light, and laid him downe with his head couered, because he would see no man, shewing thereby the common sort an example of vnstable fortune: and the wise men, a good learning to know the fruites of ill counsell, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to commaund so many thousands of men, but thought (as a man would say) himselfe the meanest of all other, and one that possest nothing, because he was accounted inferior vnto two persons onely, Pompey and Cæsar. Notwithstanding, Octauius one of his chieftaines, and Cassius the treasurer, made him rise, and sought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, seeing him so ouercome with sorrow, and out of heart, that he had no life nor spirit in him: they themselues called the Captaines and Centurions together, and sate in councell for their departure, and so agreed that there was no longer tarying for them. Thus of their owne authoritie at the first they made the armie march away without any sound of trumpet or other noise. But immediatly after, they that were left hurt and sicke, and could not follow, seeing the campe remoue, fell a crying out and tormenting themselues in such sort, that they filled the whole campe with sorrow, and put them out of all order with the great mone and loud lamentation: so as the foremost ranke that first dislodged, fell into a maruellous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and set vpon them. Then turning oft, and setting themselues in battell ray, one while loading their beasts with the wounded men, another while vnloading them againe, they were left behind, sauing three hundred horsemen that scaped, who came about midnight to the citie of Carres. Ignatius their Captaine called to the watch on the wals, and spake in the Latine tongue. Who answering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouernour of the towne, that Crassus had fought a great battell with the Parthians, and said no more, neither told what he was: but rode on still, till he came to the bridge which Crassus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Ignatius gaue to the watch to tell Coponius, serued Crassus turne very well. For Coponius thought by this great hast of his, and the short confused speech he made, passing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he straight armed his souldiers, and vnderstanding that Crassus was returning backe, went to meet him, and brought him and his armie into the citie of Carres. The Parthians knew well enough of the remouing of the Romaines campe, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entring into their campe where they lay, slue all that were left behind, which were aboue foure thousand men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many stragglers in the plaine. Among them there was Barguntinus, one of Crassus Lieutenants, who strayed in the night out of the army with foure whole ensignes, and hauing lost his way, got a hill, where the Parthians besieged him, slue him and all his company, though he valiantly there defended himselfe: yet twenty of them onely escaped, who with their swords drawne in their hands, running forward with their heads, thrust in among the thickest of the Parthians. They wondering at their desperation, opened of themselues, and suffered them to march on towards the city of Carres. In the meane time false newes was brought to Surena, how Crassus with all the chiefest men of his host was fled, and that the great number that were receiued into the citie of Carres were men of all sorts gathered together, and not a man of any qualitie or estimation. Surena thereupon thinking he had lost the honour of his victorie, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would know the troth, that he might either besiege the city of Carres, or pursue after Crassus: sent one of his interpreters to the wals of the citie, charging him to call for Crassus, or Cassius, and to tell them that Surena would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commanded. Word was brought to Crassus, and he accepted parlance. Shortly after also, thither came certaine souldiers of the Arabians from the campe of the Parthians, who knew Crassus and Cassius very well by sight, hauing diuers times seene them in their camp before the battell. These Arabians seeing Cassius vpon the wals, told him, that Surena was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go safely, as his maisters good friends, so that they would surrender Mesopotamia into the king of Parthiaes hands, and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather then to be enforced vnto it by extremitie. Cassius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day and place, where Crassus and Surena should ſhould meet to talke together of the matter. The ARABIANS made anſwer they would do it, and ſo departed. Surena hearing this, was glad he had them at ſuch aduantage, where he might beſiege them. The next day he brought all his army before the city of CARRES. There the PARTHIANS maruellouſly reuiled the ROMAINES, and told them, they muſt deliuer them Craſſus and Caſſius bound hands and feete, if they would haue any grace or peace with them. The ROMAINES were maruellouſly offended that they were thus deceiued, and told Craſſus that it was no boote any longer to looke for aide of the ARMENIANS, but preſently to flie: howbeit to keepe it ſecret in any wiſe from any of the CARRENIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Craſſus ſelfe had told it to Andromachus, the verieſt traitor and villaine in all the city, whom he had choſen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertiſed the enemies in euery point, of their purpoſe and departure. But becauſe the PARTHIANS do neuer vſe to fight in the night, and that it was a hard matter to bring them to it, and againe that Craſſus departed in the night time: Andromachus was afraid leſt the ROMAINS would win ſuch ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not poſſibly ouertake them the next day. Therfore of purpoſe he ſometime brought them one way, other while another way, and at the laſt, brought them into a great bogge or mariſh, full of deepe holes and ditches, and where they muſt needes make many turnes and returnes before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, ſome in the armie began to miſtruſt, that Andromachus meant no good to turne and toſſe them vp and downe in that ſort, and therefore would follow him no more: inſomuch as Caſſius among others, returned towards the citie of CARRES againe, from whence they came. And when his guides (who were ARABIANS) counſelled him to tarie there till the Moone were out of the ſigne of Scorpio, he anſwered them: I feare the ſigne of Sagittarie more. So as ſoone as he could, he tooke his way towards ASSYRIA with fiue hundred horſemen. And other of the armie alſo hauing faithfull guides, recouered a country of the mountaines, called Sinnaca, & retired into a ſafe place before the break of day: and they were about fiue hundred men, whom Octauius a noble man had in charge. But the day ſtale vpon Craſſus, hunting vp & downe yet in the mariſh, in thoſe ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpoſe brought him, hauing with him 4 enſignes of footmen all with targets, and very few horſemen, & fiue ſergeants that caried the axes and rods before him: with whom, with much ado and great labour, he got into the right way, when the enemies were almoſt vpon him, & that he was within twelue furlongs of ioyning with Octauius. There in haſt he had gotten a hill, which was not ſo ſteepe for horſemen, neither of ſuch ſtrength as the other hils were, called Sinnaces, yet vnder them, & ioyning to them by a long hill that runneth alongſt the plaine, ſo as Octauius plainly ſaw the danger Craſſus was in. Thereupon he firſt ran downe the hils with a few of his men that followed him: but after alſo came all the reſt, ſaying they were cowards if they ſhould tarie behind. At their comming they gaue ſuch a hote onſet vpon the PARTHIANS, that they made them giue backe from that hill: and compaſſing Craſſus in the middeſt of them, couering him round with their targets, they ſpake nobly, that neuer arrow of the PARTHIANS ſhould touch the bodie of their Generall, before they were ſlaine one after another, and that they had fought it out to the laſt man in his defence. Herupon Surena perceiuing the PARTHIANS were not ſo couragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came vpon them, and that the ROMAINES did once recouer the high mountaines, they could neuer poſſibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Craſſus once more by this deuice. He let certain priſoners go of purpoſe, before whom he made his men giue out this ſpeech: That the king of PARTHIA would haue no mortall war with the ROMAINES: but far otherwiſe, he rather deſired their friendſhip, by ſhewing them ſome notable fauour, as to vſe Craſſus very courteouſly. And to giue colour to this brute, he called his men from fight, and going himſelfe in perſon towards Craſſus, with the chiefeſt of the nobilitie of his hoaſt, in quiet maner, his bow vnbent: he held out his right hand, and called Craſſus to talke with him of peace, and ſaid vnto him: Though the ROMAINES had felt the force and power of their king, it was againſt his will, for he could do no leſſe but defend himſelf: howbeit that now he was very willing and deſirous to make them taſt of his mercy and clemency, & was contented to make peace with them, and to let them go ſafely where they would. All the ROMAINES beſides Craſſus were glad of Surenaes words. But Craſſus that had bene deceiued before by their crafty fetches & deuices, conſidering alſo no cauſe apparant to make them change thus ſodainly: would not harken to it, but firſt conſulted with his friends. Howbeit the ſoldiers they cried out on him to go, and fell at words with him, saying: that he cared not though they were all slaine, and that himselfe had not the heart only to come downe and talke with the enemies that were vnarmed. Crassus proued first to pacifie them by faire meanes, perswading them to haue a litle patience but till night, which was at hand, and then they might safely depart at their pleasure, and recouer the mountaines & streight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint hearted, nor to despaire of their safetie, seeing they were so neare it. But in the end Crassus perceiuing they fell to mutinie, and beating of their harnesse, did threaten him if he went not: fearing then they would do him some villanie, went towards the enemie, and comming backe a litle, said onely these words: O Octauius, and you Petronius, with all you ROMAINE gentlemen that haue charge in this armie: you all see now how against my will I am enforced to go to the place I would not, & can witnes with me, how I am driuen with shame and force. Yet I pray you if your fortunes be to escape this daunger, that ye will report wheresoeuer you come, that Crassus was slaine, not deliuered vp by his owne souldiers into the hands of the barbarous people, as I am: but deceiued by the fraud and subtilty of his enemies. Octauius would not tary behind on the hill, but went downe with Crassus: but Crassus sent away his officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHIANS vnto Crassus were two mongrell GRECIANS, who dismounting from their horse saluted him, and prayed him to send some of his men before, and Surena would shew them, that both himselfe and his traine came vnarmed towards him. Crassus thereto made them answer, that if he had made any account of his life, he would not haue put himselfe into their hands. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before, called the ROSCIANS, to know what number of men, and to what end they met so many together. These two brethren came no sooner to Surena, but they were staid: and himselfe in the meane time kept on his way a horsebacke, with the noblest men of his army. Now when Surena came neare to Crassus: why, how now (quoth he) what meaneth this? a Consull & Lieutenant generall of ROME on foot, and we on horsebacke? Therwithall he straight commaunded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus answered Surena againe: In that they neither of both offended, following the vse and maner of their country, when any meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replyed: As for the treatie of peace, that was already agreed vpon between the king Hyrodes, and the ROMAINES: howbeit that they were to go to the riuer, and there to set downe the articles in writing. For you ROMAINES, said he, do not greatly remember the capitulations you haue agreed vpon. With those words he gaue him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse, you shall not need, said Surena, for looke, the king doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a steele saddle richly gilt, vpon the which his gentlemen mounted Crassus immediatly, and following him behind, lashed his horse to make him run the swifter. Octauius seeing that, first laid hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thousand footmen: and after them, all the rest of the ROMAINES also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, and to take him from them by force, that pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at another at the first very angrily, and at the last fell to blowes. Then Octauius drew out his sword, and slue one of the barbarous noblemens horsekeepers: and another came behind him and slue Octauius. Petronius had no target, and receiuing a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no hurt: and on the other side came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and slue Crassus. Some say notwithstanding, that Pomaxathres slue him not, but another, yet that he cut off his head and his hand after he fell dead to the ground. But all these reports are rather coniectures, then any certainty. For as for them that were there, some of them were slaine in the field fighting for Crassus, & other saued themselues by flying to the hill. The PARTHIANS followed them, and told them that Crassus had paid the paine he had deserued: & for the rest, that Surena bad them come down with safetie. Then some of them yeelded to their enemies: and other dispersed themselues when night came, and of them very few escaped with life. Other being followed and pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the sword. So as it is thought there were slaine in this ouerthrow, about twenty thousand men, and ten thousand taken prisoners. Surena had now sent Crassus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes, the king his maister, into ARMENIA: and gaue out a brute as farre as the citie of SELEVCIA, that he brought Crassus aliue, and that he had prepared a sight to laugh at, which he called his triumph. Among the ROMAIN prisoners there was one called Caius Pacianus who was very like Crassus: him they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to answer, when any called him Crassus, or Lord captaine. Him they put a horsebacke, and

and had many trumpets before him, and Sergeants vpon camels backes, that caried axes before him, and bundels of rods, and many purſes tyed to the bundels of rods, and ROMAINES heads newly cut off, tyed to the axes: and after him followed all the ſtrumpets and women minſtrels of SELEVCIA, who went ſinging of ſongs of mockerie and deriſion of Craſſus womanniſh cowardlineſſe. Now for theſe open ſhewes, euery one might ſee them: but beſides that ſight, Surena hauing called the Senate of SELEVCIA together, laid before them Ariſtides bookes of ribaldrie, intituled the Mileſians, which was no fable, for they were found in a ROMAINES fardle or truſſe, called Ruſtius. This gaue Surena great cauſe to ſcorne and deſpiſe the behauiour of the ROMAINES, which was ſo farre out of order, that euen in the wars they could not refraine from doing euill, and from the reading of ſuch vile bookes. Then the Senators of SELEVCIA found that Æſope was a wiſe man, who ſaid, that euery man caried a ſacke on his neck, and that they put other mens faults at the ſackes mouth, and their owne towards the bottome of the ſacke. When they conſidered that Surena had put the booke of the laſciuiouſneſſe of the MILESIANS at the ſackes mouth, and a long taile of the PARTHIANS vaine pleaſures and delights in the bottome of the ſacke, carying ſuch a number of carts loden with naughtie packes in his armie as he did, which ſeemed an armie of ermites and field miſe. For in the voward and foremoſt rankes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being only launces, pikes, bowes, and horſe: but all they ended afterwards in the rereward with a traine of harlots, inſtruments of muſicke, dauncing, ſinging, banquetting, and ryoting all night with curtiſans. I will not deny but Ruſtius deſerued blame: but yet withall, I ſay, that the PARTHIANS were ſhameleſſe to reproue theſe bookes of the vanities of the MILESIANS, conſidering that many of their kings, and of the royall bloud of the Arſacides, were borne of the IONIAN and MILESIAN curtiſans. Things paſſing thus in this ſort, king Hyrodes had made peace and league with Artabazes king of ARMENIA, who gaue his ſiſter in mariage vnto Pacorus, king Hyrodes ſon, and made great feaſts one to another: in the which were many Greeke verſes ſung, Hyrodes ſelfe vnderſtanding well the Greeke tong, and Artabazes was ſo perfect in it, that he himſelfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and ſtories, whereof ſome are yet extant at this day. The ſame night Craſſus head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Iaſon a common player of enterludes (borne in the city of TRALLES) came before the kings, and recited a place of the tragedie of the BACCHANTES of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of Agaue, who ſtrake off his ſons head. And as euery man took great pleaſure to heare him, Syllaces coming into the hall, after his humble dutie firſt done to the king, deliuered him Craſſus head before them all. The PARTHIANS ſeeing that, fell a clapping of their hands, and made an outcry of ioy. The gentlemen Vſhers by the kings commandement, did ſet Syllaces at the table. Iaſon caſting off his apparell repreſenting Pentheus perſon, gaue it to another player to put it on him, and counterfeiting the BACCHANTES poſſeſt with fury, began to rehearſe theſe verſes, with a geſture, tune and voice of a man mad and beſide himſelfe:

Behold, we from the foreſt bring a ſtag now newly ſlaine,
A worthy bootie and reward, beſeeming well our paine.

This maruellouſly pleaſed the company: and ſpecially ſinging theſe verſes afterwards, where the Chorus both asked and anſwered himſelfe:

Who ſtrake this ſtag?
None elſe but I thereof may brag.

Pomaxathres hearing them diſpute about the matter, being ſet at the table with others, roſe ſtraight, and went and tooke the head himſelfe, to whom of right it belonged to ſay thoſe words, and not vnto the player that ſpake them. King Hyrodes liked this ſport maruellouſly, and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the maner of the countrey in ſuch a caſe: and to Iaſon he alſo gaue a talent. Such was the ſucceſſe of Craſſus enterpriſe and voyage, much like vnto the end of a tragedie. But afterwards Hyrodes crueltie, and Surenaes foule periurie and craft, were in the end iuſtly reuenged vpon them both, according to their deſerts. For king Hyrodes enuying Surenaes glory, put Surena to death. And Hyrodes fell into a diſeaſe that became a dropſie, after he had loſt his ſonne Pacorus, who was ſlaine in a battell by the ROMAINES. Phraates his ſecond ſonne, thinking to ſet his father forwards, gaue him drinke of the iuyce of Aconitum. The dropſie receiued the poiſon, and one draue the other out of Hyrodes body, and ſet him a foot againe. Phraates perceiuing his father to amend vpon it, to make ſhort worke, with his owne hands, ſtrangled him.

THE COMPARISON OF Craſſus with Nicias.

Nicias and Craſſus riches.

BVt now to proceed to the compariſon: firſt, Nicias goods were more iuſtly gotten, and with leſſe reproch, then Craſſus wealth, for otherwiſe a man cannot giue any great praiſe to minerall workes, the which are wrought by lewde and ill diſpoſed barbarous fellowes kept in irons, and toiled to death in vnwholeſome and peſtilent places. But being compared vnto Craſſus buying of confiſcate goods at Syllaes hands, and vngentlemanly bargaines of houſes on fire, or in daunger thereof: ſurely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of getting: for as openly did Craſſus auow vſurie, as tillage. And againe for other faults, wherwith Craſſus many times was burthened, and which he ſtoutly denyed: as, that he tooke money of men hauing matters before the Senate at Rome, to winne fauour for their ſide: and that he preferred matters to the preiudice of the confederates of the Romaines, onely for his priuate profite: and therfore curried fauor with Ladies, and generally ſought to cloke all foule offenders: of all theſe faults, was Nicias neuer ſo much as once ſuſpected. For he to the contrarie, was mocked of euery body, becauſe for feare he maintained wicked doers by gifts: which perhaps would not haue becommed Pericles, nor Ariſtides, and yet was meet for Nicias, who was borne a timerous natured man, and neuer had courage in him. Wherof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunt afterwards to the people, being accuſed that he redeemed detractors with mony: I am glad, ſaid he, that hauing dealt thus long in affaires of the ſtate, it is found I haue rather giuen then taken. And now touching expences: Nicias was thought the better and more ciuill citizen. For his charge and coſt was, in dedicating ſome goodly image to the gods, or in making of publike playes or paſtimes to recreate the people. But all the money he ſpent that way, and all that he was woorth beſides, was nothing comparable, and but a ſmall part of that Craſſus beſtowed in an open feaſt he made at Rome: feaſting ſo many thouſands at one time, and did find and maintaine them alſo for a certaine time after. Now I cannot but wonder at thoſe men, that deny vice to be an inequalitie and diſagreement of maners, repugnant in it ſelfe, ſeeing men may honeſtly ſpend that which is naughtily gotten. Thus much for their goods. For Nicias doings in the commonweale he did nothing maliciouſly, cruelly, nor vniuſtly, neither any thing of ſelfe-will or ſtomacke, but rather dealt plainely and ſimply. For he was deceiued by truſting of Alcibiades, and neuer came to ſpeake before the people, but with great feare. Craſſus on the other ſide was reproued for his vnconſtancie and lightneſſe, for that he would eaſily change friends or enemies: and he himſelfe denyed not, that he came to be Conſull the ſecond time by plaine force and crueltie, hauing hired two murtherers to kill Cato and Domitius. And in the aſſembly the people held for deuiding of the prouinces, many men were hurt, and foure were ſlaine in the market place: and more then that, Craſſus himſelfe (which we haue forgotten to write in his life) gaue one Lycurgus ſaying.

Nicias and Craſſus acts in the common wealth.

Lucius Annalius ſo ſore a blow on the face with his fiſt, for ſpeaking againſt him, that he ſent him going with bloud about his eares. But as Craſſus in thoſe things was very fierce and cruell: ſo Nicias womanniſh behauiour on the other ſide, and faint heart in matters of the common wealth, humbling himſelfe to the meaneſt and moſt vile perſons, deſerueth great reproch. Where Craſſus in this reſpect ſhewed himſelfe aſſuredly of a noble mind, not contending with men of ſmall account, as with Cleon, or Hyperbolus, but would giue no place to Cæſars fame and glorie, nor yet to Pompeys three triumphs, but ſought to go euen with them in power and authoritie: and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeys power, in the dignitie of Cenſor. For Magiſtrates, and Gouernours of the commonweale, ſhould make themſelues to be honored, but not enuied, killing enuie by the greatneſſe of their power. But if it were ſo that Nicias preferred quietneſſe, and the ſafetie of his perſon aboue all things elſe, and that he feared Alcibiades in the pulpit for orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the fort of Pyle, and Perdiccas in THRASIA: he had libertie and ſcope enough to repoſe himſelfe in the citie of ATHENS, and might haue forborne the dealing in matters, and (as Rhetoricians ſay) haue put a hood of quietnes vpon his head very well. For doubtleſſe, concerning his deſire to make peace,, it was a godly mind in him, and an act worthie of a noble perſon, to bring that to paſſe he did, appeaſing all warre: wherein Craſſus certainely was not to be compared to him, though he had ioyned all the prouinces to the empire of ROME, that reach vnto the Caſpian ſea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIAES. But on the other ſide alſo, when one hath to deale with people that can diſcerne when a man ruleth according to equitie and iuſtice, and that he ſeeth he is in the prime of his credit and authoritie: he muſt not then for lacke of courage ſuffer wicked men to ſtep in his roome, nor giue occaſion to prefer ſuch to authoritie in the commonweale, as are vnworthy for that place and countenance: neither ſhould allow ſuch any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor truſt, as Nicias did: who was the only occaſion that Cleon, being before but a pratling Orator, was choſen Generall. Neither do I alſo commend Craſſus, for that in the warre againſt Spartacus, he made haſt to giue him battell, more raſhly then ſafely or conſideratly. For his ambition ſpurred him forward, becauſe he was afraid leſt Pompeys coming ſhould take from him the glory of all that he had done in that war: as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honor of the winning of CORINTH. But beſides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compaſſe of reaſon, and can no way be excuſed. For he did not reſigne his honour and office of Generall to Cleon his enemie, when there was hope of good ſucceſſe, or litle perill: but fearing the danger of the iorney, he was contented to ſaue one, and tooke no care beſides for the commonwealth. Which Themiſtocles ſhewed not, in the time of the warre againſt the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epycides an Orator (a man of no reckening beſide his eloquence, and extreamely couetous) from being choſen Generall of ATHENS, leſt he ſhould haue ouerthrowne the commonweale: ſecretly bribed him with money to leaue off his ſute. And Cato alſo when he ſaw the ſtate of ROME in greateſt danger, ſued to be Tribune of the people for the commonwealths ſake. And Nicias in contrary maner, reſeruing himſelfe to make warre with the citie of MINOA, or with the Ile of CITHERA, or with the poore vnfortunate MELIANS, if there fell out afterwards occaſion to fight againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Captaines cloke, and he left the ſhips, the armie and munition to the charge and gouernment of Cleons raſhneſſe and ſmall experience of war, when the neceſſitie of the ſeruice required the wiſeſt and moſt expert captaine. The which he did not, deſpiſing the means to make him honored: but it was a plaine drawing back, at time of need to defend his country. Wherfore afterwards he was compelled againſt his will to be general, to make wars in SICILIA with the SYRACVSANS: becauſe the people thought he was not ſo earneſt to diſſwade the iorny, for that he thought it not meet for the cõmonwealth, but becauſe through his ſloth & cowardlines he wold make his country loſe ſo good an oportunity to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great teſtimony of his honeſty & truſt they had in him: who though he euer hated war, and did fly from the offices of honor & charge in the cõmonwealth, his countrimen notwithſtanding did alwaies chuſe him, as the moſt experienced perſon & meeteſt man of the city. Now Craſſus in contrary maner deſiring nothing elſe but to be generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the war of the bondmen, and yet was it for lack of another: (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abrode in the warres) although he was otherwiſe of great eſtimation and authority. Howbeit it ſeemeth to me, that his friends that loued him beſt, thought him (as the comicall Poet ſaith)

The diuersitie betwixt Nicias & Crassus.

His ambition notwithstanding, and couetous desire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMAINS. For the ATHENIANS sent Nicias to the war against his will: but Crassus led the ROMAINES thither against their wils. So that the commonwealth fell into miserie by the one, and the other through the commonwealth was brought into miserie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, then to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wise man, and a Captaine of great experience, could neuer so much as be brought to thinke they should conquer SICILE: and therefore disswaded his countrimen from the iourney: and would giue no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking vpon him to make wars with the PARTHIANS, as though it had bene an easie matter to ouercome them, found himselfe deceiued, yet did he aspire to great things. For as Iulius Cæsar had conquered and subdued to the imperiall crowne of ROME, all the countries of the West parts, to say, the GAVLES, the GERMAINES, and ENGLAND: euen so did Crassus desire to go towards the East parts, to conquer all to the great West sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the regions of ASIA, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, and such as euer courteously behaued themselues to all men: notwithstanding, prouoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had. For when the charge of the wars in the East parts was assigned to Pompey by decree and order of the people, the Senate vtterly misliked it, and were against it all they could. When newes were brought to ROME that Iulius Cæsar in battell had ouerthrowne and slaine three hundred thousand GERMAINES, Cato perswading with the Senate, was yet still of this mind, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the hands of his enemies whom he had ouercome, for to be punished: therby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrath of the gods from ROME, vpon him onely, that was the vniust breaker of peace. This notwithstanding, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feasts and processions fifteene dayes together, and open sacrifices to the gods with great ioy through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victorie. How glad may we thinke would they haue bene, and how many daies would they haue feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had written from BABYLON of his victorie, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of SVSE, and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new gouernments and prouinces to the Empire of ROME?

If a man will needes do wrong and iniustice,

As Eurypides saith to them that cannot liue in peace, and be contented with their owne: he must not then sticke at trifles, (as the razing of a castell of Scandia, or of a citie of MENDA, or chasing of the ÆGINETES being out of their owne natural country, and hiding themselues like birds without nests, in another birds holes) but must dearely sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemne iustice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the Great in his voyage, for the conquests he made in the East, and do dispraise Crassus voyage: do not well to iudge of the beginning, by the euents and successe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble exploits: for he ouerthrew his enemies in diuerse battels, and had almost taken the city of SYRACVSA: and sure they cannot iustly blame him for all the misfortunes that chaunced in the warre of SICILIA, but partly the plague was cause of it, and partly also the enuie of those towards him that remained at ATHENS. Whereas Crassus ranne into so many errors, and committed such foule parts in all his voyage, that he gaue fortune no leysure to do him good: so that I wonder not so much that his folly was ouercome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could ouercome the good fortune of the ROMAINES. Sithence it so falleth out then, that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognosticating before what things should happen by art and rule of diuination, and Crassus contrarily disdaining to obserue any thing: sure it falleth out hard in iudgement, which of them two proceeded with most safetie. Yet according to the best approued opinions, a fault committed of feare is more excusable, then of rashnesse and folly to breake any auncient law or custome. For their deaths, Crassus end deserued least reproch. For he against his will did yeeld himselfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but onely perswaded by his friends, and through his enemies fraud and treason most traiterously deceiued: where Nicias cowardly and dishonorably hoping to saue his life, trusting to the mercy of his enemies, made his death more infamous.

Sertorius.

PEraduenture it is not to be maruelled at, if in long proceſſe of time (fortune altering her effects daily) theſe worldly euents fall often out one like another. For whether it be that the variety of things are infinite, fortune hath ſtore of matter apt inough to worke to likeneſſe: or be it that worldly matters be comprehended within determinate number: of neceſſitie one thing muſt fall out like another, ſince they proceed from one cauſe, tyed to the ſame meanes it before did vſe. But becauſe men do delight to compare ſuch chaunces together, as they haue ſeene or heard to haue happened ſo like, as if they had bene done of purpoſe, the one by the example of the other (as that of two men being both named Attis, both of them come of noble houſes, the one in Syria, and the other in Arcadia, both the one and the other were ſlaine with a wild bore. That of two called Actæon, the one was torne in peeces by his dogges, the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipioes, the Carthaginians were firſt ouercome by the one, and afterwards vtterly deſtroyed by the other. That the city of Troy was firſt taken by Hercules, for the horſes that Laomedon had promiſed him: the ſecond time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great woodden horſe: and the third time by Charidemus, by meanes of a horſe that fell within the gate, and kept the Troyans that they could not ſhut it in time. And that of two ſweete ſmelling plants, Ios, and Smyrna, two cities were named, the one ſignifying the Violet, and the other Mirre: it is ſuppoſed that the Poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he died in the other. We may alſo adde to this example, that amongſt the auncient Captaines, the greateſt warriers (and that haue done the nobleſt exploits by wit and warlike ſtratagemes) had but one eye: as Phillip, Antigonus, Hanniball and Sertorius alſo, whom we write of at this preſent. Whom we may truly report to haue bene more chaſt than Phillip: more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus: more courteous to his enemies than Hanniball: and for wiſedome and iudgement to giue place to none of them, but in good fortune to them all. The which, though ſhe ſhewed her ſpite more to him, than to his enemies that were all great men: yet in experience he was equall with Metellus, in proweſſe and valiancie with Pompey, and in fortune with Sylla. So that being baniſhed his country, a ſtranger in another realme, and hauing to gouerne a barbarous nation, he notwithſtanding maintained warres for a time, againſt the power of the Romaines. Me thinkes therefore, that of all the

The praiſe of Sertorius.

GRECIAN Captaines I can liken none ſo well vnto him as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to command, both were very valiant and politicke in wars, both were baniſhed men out of their countrey, both were Captaines ouer ſtrangers, and both of them were traiterouſly and villainouſly ſlaine by them, through whom they had before ouercome their enemies. Now for Sertorius, he came of worſhipfull parents, and was borne in the city of NVRSIA in the country of the SABINES. His father left him a very child with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he ſingularly loued and reuerenced. Her name as they ſay was Rhea. His firſt riſing and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well: in ſo much as being a young man he came to ROME, and wan ſome name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honour and eſtimation he atchieued afterwards by his valiant acts, made him imploy all his ſtudie and ambitious care, to armes and warres. The firſt time of his ſouldierfare was, when the CIMBRES and TEVTONS inuaded GAVLE with a mighty army: where, when the ROMAINES had bene ouercome vnder the leading of Cæpio, his horſe being ſlaine vnder him, and himſelfe hurt, he notwithſtanding ſwam ouer the riuer of Rone, with his corſlet and target vpon him, breaking the fury and rage of the riuer with meere ſtrength, ſo able and luſty a body he had to brooke all paines and hardneſſe. The ſecond time that theſe barbarous CIMBRES returned with an infinite number of fighting men, and with proud and dreadfull threats, the ROMAINES were then ſo afraid that they thought him a ſtout man that had but the courage to keepe his rancke, and obey his Captaine. At that time was Marius Generall of the ROMAINE armie, and then did Sertorius vndertake to go and diſcouer the enemies campe. And for the purpoſe, apparelled himſelfe like a GAVLE, and learned the common words and phraſes of their language, to ſalute one another when they met, and in this ſort went among them: and hauing partly by ſight and report learned that he ſought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him ſuch honourable reward, as was due to his deſert. All the time of the warres after, he did ſuch valiant acts and deeds of armes, that his captaine had him in great eſtimation, and committed the chiefeſt matters to his charge. Whereupon the warres being ended with the TEVTONS and CIMBRES, Sertorius was ſent into SPAINE, vnder Didius the Prætor, with charge of a thouſand footmen, with whom he wintered in the citie of CASTVLO, in the marches of the CELTIBERIANS: where the ſouldiers finding plentie of victuals, fell to gluttony and drunkenneſſe, and committed great inſolency, being ouercome with wine. In ſo much as the barbarous people of the city grew to ſuch a miſliking and diſdaine of them, that they ſent one night to their next neighbours the GYRISÆNIANS for aide, and as they came by the ROMAINS lodgings, ſlue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noiſe, went immediatly out of the city with a few of his men, and gathering them together alſo that fled one after another to ſaue themſelues, went round about the wals of the city, and finding the gate open where the GYRISÆNIANS came in, there entred he alſo: who being more carefull than they had ſhewed themſelues, left the gates, and all the parts of the city well garded, and then put all to the ſword within that were of age to carie weapon. Now when he had executed this reuenge, he commaunded all his ſouldiers to leaue off their owne apparell and weapons, and to take thoſe of the barbarous people whom they had ſlaine, and to folow him to the city of the GYRISÆNIANS, from whence they came that had on ſuch a ſudden aſſailed them in the night. The GYRISÆNIANS ſeeing the garments and weapons of their ſuppoſed men farre of, thinking certainely they had bene they, opened their gates, and a number of people went out, as to meete their friends and citizens, whom they thought had happily ſped of their purpoſe. Thus were a maruellous number of them ſlaine by the ROMAINES, euen hard at the gates of their citie: and the reſt putting themſelues to Sertorius mercy, he ſold for ſlaues. After this exploit, Sertorius wanne great fame through all SPAINE, and returning to ROME, was made Quæſtor or treaſurer Generall of GAVLE, on this ſide of the mountaines, by the riuer of PO. A happy chance for ROME: for euen at that very preſent time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARSIANS warre, in the which he had commiſſion to preſt ſouldiers, and to make armour. And therein he ſhewed ſuch diligence and expedition for quicke diſpatch of that ſeruice, in reſpect of the long delay and careleſſe regard other young men had of the ſame before: that he won the name to be a carefull man of his charge, and one that afterwards would atchieue great enterpriſes. Furthermore, when he came to be a Captaine himſelfe, he would not let to venture his perſon as valiantly, as any other priuate ſouldier whatſoeuer, but did maruellous acts with his owne hands, euen in greateſt perils and

and conflicts: in so much as at the length he lost one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing ashamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, sayd he, do not alwayes cary the markes about them of their valiant seruice, but leaue them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carcanets, iauelins, and crownes, giuen them by their Captaines for testimonie of their valiancy: howbeit that he alwayes caried the markes about him (whersoeuer he went) of his seruice, so that such as saw the blemish of his eye, did therewithall witnesse his valiantnesse and courage. The people also did honour him as became them. For when he came into the Theater, they welcomed him with clapping of their hands, and great praises, which the Romaines did scantly vse vnto their oldest Captaines, and which were most honoured for their great and noble seruice. Neuertheless, when he sued to be Tribune, he was reiected by Syllaes practise, who hindred him: whereupon grew as it seemeth, that grudge and malice which he euer after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Marius was fled being ouercome by Sylla, and that Sylla was gone out of Italie to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Consuls, Octauius tooke part with Sylla, and Cinna the other Consull (which sought change and alteration) was gathering men together to set vp Marius faction, that was in maner vnder foote: Sertorius tooke his part, because he saw that Octauius was but a slow and lither man, and did not besides trust any of Marius friends. So was there a cruell conflict betweene them, euen in the market place within the city selfe, where Octauius had the vpper hand: and Cinna and Sertorius scaped by flying, hauing lost few lesse then ten thousand men in this onely ouerthrow. Neuertheless, afterwards through practise and pollicy, they got those souldiers together againe that were dispersed here and there through Italie, so as in short time they made their power equall with Octauius force. Marius also being aduertised of the same, tooke the sea incontinently, and returned into Italy out of Africke, and came to Cinna to serue as a priuate souldier, vnder his Captaine and Consull. Now they all liked well, that Marius should be receiued, sauing Sertorius, who was against him all he could: fearing that either his credit and estimation should diminish, Cinna hauing a worthier Captaine then himselfe to serue him, or else that Marius cruelty and seuerity (who pardoned none offence) would marre all together, hauing no stay in his anger, but bent vterly to all kind of crueltie to his enemies, if Cinna fortuned to haue the victory. And thereunto he added this further: that now they had the victorie in maner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would rob them of all the honour of ending this warre, and being also in authority, he was neither to be trusted nor commaunded. Whereunto Cinna aunswered thus: that he thought the words he had alleadged to be true, howbeit that he was ashamed, and besides, could not see with honesty how he might refuse Marius, or send him backe, sithence he had purposely sent for him, to commit part of the charge of these warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied: Sure I thought Marius had come of his owne goodwill vnsent for, and therefore (as for the best in mine owne opinion) I gaue aduise not to receiue him: but sithence it is so that you sent for him before, and that he is now come vpon your commandement, you were much to blame to aske counsell whether you should now receiue him, or not. And therefore you must needs accept his seruice, that is come vpon your word: for, the bond of your promise past you, doth now cut off all counsell or other resolution. Thereupon Marius was called for: and when he came, they deuided their whole armie into three parts, and then began to charge vpon their enemies of all hands, so as they obtained victorie. Howbeit Cinna and Marius committed as horrible crueltie in this victorie, as could possibly be shewed: in so much as the Romaines thought all the miseries they had endured in time of this war nothing, and but a play as it were, in respect of the great calamities they fell into afterwards. Now Sertorius on the other side neuer caused man to be slaine for any priuate malice, or quarrell he had with any person, neither did he hurt any man when he had ouercome, but was much offended with Marius insolency and cruell murthers: and when he had good oportunity to speake with Cinna apart, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more mild and tractable through his perswasion. In fine, Sertorius seeing Marius garded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other souldiers in this warre, whom he vsed as executioners of his slaughter and butcherie, alwayes attending about his person as a gard, and suffering them also to make themselues rich, partly with that he gaue them, or commaunded them to spoile, and partly also with that they violently tooke without his commaundement of their owne maisters, killing them when they had done, rauishing their mistresses, and defiling their children: he could no longer abide such wickednesse and villainy, but made them all to be slaine in their campe where they lay together, being no lesse then foure thousand persons. Afterwards when he saw that the elder Marius was dead, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marius his sonne (against his counsell, and contrarie to the lawes of Rome) had by force made himselfe Consull: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had bene ouercome by Sylla) were come out of Greece to Romewards, partly through the cowardlinesse of their Captaines, and partly also becausse they were betrayed and sold of their owne men: and further, considering therewithall, that his person could do no good in those affaires which waxed worse and worse, by meanes of the authority of such as had least wit and vnderstanding, and specially also seeing Sylla campe hard by Scipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whilst vnderhand he wanne his souldiers from him, notwithstanding that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly despairing of Romes prosperity and welfare, departed from Rome to go towards Spaine, thinking that if he could get the first possession and gouernment of that realme, it would at the least be a refuge and receipt for all those of their tribe, that should chance to be banished out of their country. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with foule and rough weather: and passing through a country of mountaines, the barbarous people inhabiting the same, demanded tribute of him, for licence to passe through their territories. Thereat the souldiers of his company were maruellously offended, saying: that it were too much shame and dishonor for a Proconsull of Rome, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithstanding, Sertorius passed not for the shame they sayd it would be to him, but answered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he should not reckon of, that aspireth to haughty enterprises: and so pleased the barbarous people with mony. And thus he made such speed, as he quickly recouered Spaine, which he found greatly replenished with people, and specially of young men able to weare armour. But now Sertorius perceiuing that they had bene hardly dealt withall before, through the insolency, pride, and couetousnesse of the Romaine gouernours, whom they ordinarily sent from Rome, and that therefore they hated all maner of gouernment: first of all sought to win the goodwils of all the whole countrimen one and other. Of the noblemen, by being familiar and conuersant with them: and of the common people, by easing them of their taxe and subsidies. But that which bred him most loue of all men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of souldiers, and receiuing of any garrison within their cities, compelling his souldiers to set vp their tents, and to make their cabines without the suburbes of great cities to winter there, and causing also his owne pauillion to be first set vp, and lay in it himselfe in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauour: for he armed all the Romaine citizens of age to cary weapon that dwelt in Spaine, and made them make all sorts of engines for battery, and a number of galleys besides, so that he had all the cities at commaundement, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very dreadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius vnderstood that Sylla kept Rome, and that the most part of the tribe of Marius and Carbo was vtterly ouerthrowne, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some captaine with a great army against him: he sent Iulius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaines Pirenei, with six thousand men well armed. Immediatly after Caius Annius also came thither, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibilitie to distresse Salinator in a place of such aduantage, was driuen to stay at the foote of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune one Calphurnius surnamed Lanarius, traiterously slue Salinator: whereupon his souldiers forthwith forsooke the top of the mountaines, and by this meanes Annius had easie passage with his army which was very great, and ouerthrew them that resisted his farther comming on into the country. Sertorius finding himselfe not strong inough to fight with him, marched away with three thousand men vnto the city of new Carthage, & there tooke sea: from thence he coasted ouer into Africke, and fell with the coast of the Mavrvsians, where his souldiers landed immediatly for fresh water, dispersing themselues without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous people gaue a charge vpon them, and slue numbers of them: insomuch as Sertorius was driuen to imbarke againe, and to take his course towards Spaine, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driuen to take certaine pyrats botes of the Cilicians, & to saile towards the Ile of Pityvsa, where he landed in despite of Annius garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annius thither himselfe with a good number of ships, and fiue thousand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by sea, though he had but

but ſmall barkes, purpoſely made for ſwift ſailing, and of no ſtrength for fight. But now the Weſt wind riſing very big, did ſwell the ſea in ſuch ſort, that it caſt the moſt part of Sertorius ſhips (being weake and very light) vpon rockes in the ſea, and himſelfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the ſea by ſtorme, was driuen to ride ten dayes together at anker, working ſtill for life againſt the danger of the ſurging waues and boiſterous winds, which continued rough all that time: yet in the end when it calmed againe he wayed anker, and ran into certaine deſolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoyſing ſaile from thence, he paſſed the ſtraight of Gilbratar, and turning on his right hand, landed vpon the coaſt of SPAINE, lying towards the great Weſterne ſea, a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Bætis, the which falling into the ſea Atlanticum, gaue name in old time to that part of SPAINE, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine ſailers met with him that were newly arriued from the Iles of the Ocean Atlanticum, which the ancients called, the fortunate Ilands. Theſe two Ilands are not farre one from another, being but a litle arme of the ſea betweene them, and are from the coaſt of AFRICKE onely ten thouſand furlongs. They haue raine there very ſeldome, howbeit a gentle wind commonly that bloweth in a litle ſiluer deaw, which moiſtneth the earth ſo finely, that it maketh it fertile and luſty, not onely to bring forth all that is ſet or ſowne vpon it, but of it ſelfe without mans hand it beareth ſo good fruit, as ſufficiently maintaineth the inhabitants dwelling vpon it, liuing idly, and taking no paines. The weather is faire and pleaſant continually, and neuer hurteth the body, the climate and ſeaſons of the yeare are ſo temperate, and the aire neuer extreme: becauſe the winds that blow vpon that land from the other ſide of the coaſt oppoſite to it, as the North and Eaſterly wind comming from the maine, what with their long comming, and then by diſperſing themſelues into a wonderfull large aire and great ſea, their ſtrength is in maner ſpent and gone before their comming thither. And for the winds that blow from the ſea (as the South and Weſterly) they ſometime bring litle ſhowers with them, which commonly do but moiſt the ground a litle, and make the earth bring forth all things very trimly: inſomuch as the very barbarous people themſelues do faithfully beleeue, that there are the Elyſian fields, the aboad of bleſſed creatures, which Homer hath ſo much ſpoken of. Sertorius hearing report of theſe Ilands (vpon a certaine deſire now to liue quietly out of tyranny and warres) had ſtraight a maruellous mind to go dwell there. But when the pyrats of CILICIA (who were no men of peace, but giuen altogether to ſpoile and pillage) heard that, they by and by forſooke Sertorius and went into AFRICKE, to reſtore Aſcalius the ſon of Iphtha to his realme of MAVRITANIA againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made warre againſt Aſcalius, and all to the end that his ſouldiers ſeeing matter of new hope and meanes to be imployed, ſhould not ſo leaue him, as being forced to be diſcharged of very neceſſity. The MAVRVSIANS being very glad of his arriuall, he preſently went on with his enterpriſe, ouercame Aſcalius it battell, and beſieged the city whereinto vpon the ouerthrow of his army he was fled for refuge. Sylla being aduertiſed thereof, ſent Paccianus thither with an army to ayd Aſcalius. Sertorius gaue him battell, ſlue him in the field, and wan the reſt of his army, which yeelded vnto him: then tooke he the city of TINGIS, whereinto Aſcalius was fled with his brethren. The LYBIANS write that Antæus is buried there. But Sertorius giuing no credit to the tales of the barbarous people of that countrey, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the tombe they ſhewed: made it to be broken open round, and finding there the body of a man (as they ſay) of threeſcore cubits long, he maruelled at it, and ſo finiſhing his ſacrifice to honour the memory thereof, cauſed the tombe to be well cloſed vp againe. By this act he did greatly increaſe the honour of Antæus memory, which the city did vnto him, and therby confirmed the countrimens report of Antæus. For the TINGIANS do report, that after Antæus death, his wife Tinga lay with Hercules, and had a goodly ſon by him called Sophax, who was king of that country, and there built this city, giuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is ſayd alſo that this Sophax had a ſonne called Diodorus, who conquered the moſt part of AFRICKE with an army of the GRECIANS, OLBIANIANS and MYCENIANS, which Hercules brought thither to inhabite thoſe parts. We were willing to imbrace the occaſion offred vs to ſpeake of this matter as we went, for the honor of Iuba, the nobleſt hiſtoriographer that euer came of royall bloud: for it is thought his anceſtors were lineally diſcended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorius as conqueror now, hauing the whole country in ſubiection, did in no wiſe hurt them that yeelded vnto him, & put truſt in him, but reſtored them their goods, cities, and gouernement againe, contenting himſelfe with that they offered him of their goodwils. But then ſtanding doubtfull what way to determine: the LVSITANIANS ſent Ambaſſadors vnto him, to intreate him to be their chiefetaine: for they ſtood in great need of a worthy perſonage, and a man expert in warres to defend them againſt the fury of the ROMAINES: and therefore they only truſted him, hearing of his honorable behauiour, by them that were conuerſant with him. Whoſe qualities as we find written, were theſe. He was neuer greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a reſolute man without feare in moſt danger, ſo was he moſt temperate in greateſt proſperity. In valiantneſſe inferiour to no Captaine of his time, and very quicke of execution in euery imminent daunger. For where any preſent exploit was to be done, any ſtrong place of aduantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to paſſe ouer any riuer, or ſcape any inſtant danger, where it ſtood vpon ſpeedy execution, and to ſhew ſome ſtratageme or pollicy in time and place to ſupplant the enemie: in thoſe matters he paſſingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good ſeruice, and mercifull in puniſhing of offenders: but this notwithſtanding, the foule murther he did in his latter dayes vpon certaine young children that were pledges with him (which doubtleſſe was an act of great cruelty and anger that could not forgiue) doth manifeſtly proue, that he was neither mercifull nor courteous of nature: but that he many times did finely counterfeit it, when both the time and occaſion did ſo require it. But for mine opinion, ſure I am perſwaded that no misfortune can haue power to make perfect vertue, grounded vpon good reaſon, to worke in any ſort contrarie to it ſelfe: neither do I thinke it impoſſible alſo, but that mens goodwils and gentle natures being iniured without cauſe, may peraduenture chaunge their naturall diſpoſitions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrarie vnto him, and his good hap changed into ill, grew ſo crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell reuenge of them which had villanouſly betrayed him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of AFRICKE vpon the LVSITANIANS offer, who choſe him for their Generall, giuing him abſolute power and authority: and ſo ſoone as he arriued, he ſtraight leauied men of warre, and with them ſubdued the people of SPAINE fronting vpon their marches, of which the more part did willingly ſubmit themſelues, vpon the brute that ran of him to be mercifull and courteous, and a valiant man beſides in preſent danger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuiſes and ſubtilties to win their goodwils: as among others, the pollicy and deuiſe he had of the hynd, which was this. There was a poore man of the countrey called Spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a hynd in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters: he let the damme go, not being able to take her, and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a yong hind, and of a ſtraunge haire, for ſhe was all milke-white. It chaunced ſo, that Sertorius was at that time in thoſe parts, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him ſuch manner of preſents: as fruits, foule, or veniſon, and would make very much of them that brought them to him, and alſo reward them well for the ſame. So, this poore man preſented Sertorius with his young hynd, which he gladly receiued, and which with time he made ſo tame, that ſhe would come to him when he called her, and follow him where euer he went, being nothing the wilder for the daily ſight of ſuch a number of armed ſouldiers together as they were, nor yet affraid of the noiſe and tumult of the campe. Inſomuch as Sertorius by litle and litle made it a miracle, making the ſimple barbarous people beleeue that it was a gift that Diana had ſent him, by the which ſhe made him vnderſtand of many and ſundrie things to come: knowing well inough of himſelfe, that the barbarous people were men eaſily deceiued, and quickly caught by any ſubtill ſuperſtition, beſides that by art alſo he brought them to beleeue it as a thing very true. For when he had any ſecret intelligence giuen him, that the enemies would inuade ſome part of the countries and prouinces ſubiect vnto him, or that they had taken any of his forts from him by any intelligence or ſudden attempt: he ſtraight told them that his hynd ſpake to him as he ſlept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put himſelfe in ſtrength. In like manner if he had heard any newes that one of his Lieutenants had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, he would hide the meſſenger, and bring his hynd abroad with a garland and coller of noſegayes: and then ſay it was a token of ſome good newes comming towards him, perſwading them withall to be of good cheare, and ſo did ſacrifice to the gods, to giue them thankes for the good tidings he ſhould heare before it were long. Thus by putting this ſuperſtition into their heads, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, in ſo much as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a ſtraunger wiſer than themſelues, but were ſtedfaſtly perſwaded perſwaded that they were rather led by ſome certaine god: and ſo much the more, becauſe that his deeds confirmed their opinions, ſeeing his power ſo dayly to increaſe beyond the hope and expectation of man. For with two thouſand and fiue hundred ſouldiers, which he called Romaines (although the moſt of them indeed were Africans, which came ouer with him out of Africke into Spaine) and foure thouſand Lvsitanians, with ſeuen hundred horſemen alſo, he made warre againſt foure great Captaines of Rome, which had the leading of ſixe ſcore thouſand footmen, two thouſand archers and ſling-men, with a world of cities and countries beſides. Where Sertorius at the firſt had not aboue twentie at the moſt, and yet with this ſmall power to maintaine this warre withall, he did not onely conquer great countries and many goodly cities, but tooke ſome of the Captaines priſoners alſo, whom the Romaines ſent againſt him. Of which companie Cotta was one, whom he ouerthrew in battell by ſea, not farre from the citie of Mellaria. He alſo ouercame Fidius in battell, being gouernor of Spaine Bætica, by the riuer of Bætis, where he ſlue two thouſand Romaines. By his treaſurer likewiſe he ouercame Lucius Domitius, Proconſull of the other prouince of Spaine. And another time he diſcomfited Toranius another Captaine, one of Metellus Lieutenants, whom he ſlue in fight with all his armie. And Metellus ſelfe, being taken at that time for one of the moſt expert men of warre, and chiefeſt Captaines among the Romaines: him he put alſo ſo oft to diſtreſſe, that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of Gavle Narbonensis (now Languedocke) to his aide. And they were furthermore driuen to ſend Pompey the great with all ſpeed frō Rome with a new armie: becauſe Metellus knew not what courſe to take, hauing to fight with a moſt valiant man, and one whom he could neuer either bring to any ſet battell, nor yet intrap in the plaine field (ſo eaſily could he caſt himſelfe into all kind of formes) by reaſon of the dexteritie and ſwiftneſſe of his Spaniſh ſouldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foote, and to leade an armie heauie armed, which could keepe their rankes, and fighting ſteadily could ouerthrow their enemies with hand-ſtrokes, and march vpon their bellies. But to clime vp the mountaines, and to be continually (as they were) charged in the rereward with theſe men armed as light as the wind, and to purſue them in chaſe that fled ſtill, and neuer kept place: it was vnpoſſible for them to do it, and much leſſe to abide hunger and thirſt, to liue without a kitchin and fire, and likewiſe to lie on the bare ground without tents or pauilions, as Sertorius ſouldiers did. Furthermore, Metellus being growne an old man (hauing ſpent all his youth in ſeruice of the warres, and taken and ſuffered great paines and troubles, giuing himſelfe now to quiet and pleaſure) was matched with Sertorius, being then euen at his beſt age, and luſtieſt of body, beſides that nature had made him both ſtrong, actiue, and temperate withal. For he was neuer giuen to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at moſt quiet, and out of wars, he was likewiſe acquainted with paines and hardnes from his youth, could away with long iournies, watch many dayes and nights without ſleepe, eate litle, and content himſelf with any meate that came to hand. And had he neuer ſo litle leyſure, he would continually be on horſebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fields, which made him very ready and expert to know how to wind himſelfe out of danger when he was diſtreſſed, and contrarily alſo to compaſſe in his enemy vpon any aduantage: and beſides, to ſee where he might enter, and where not. For this cauſe was Metellus driuen (who was ſtill deſirous to fight) to abide the loſſes and diſcommodities which they ſuffer that be vanquiſhed: and Sertorius on the other ſide refuſing battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they haue, which chaſe their enemies whom they haue ouercome. For he cut off his victuals on euery ſide, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to march further forward, Sertorius ſtayd him: and when he lay ſtill in his campe, Sertorius came and gaue him alarums, and draue him to diſlodge. If Metellus laid ſiege to any place, Sertorius ſtraight beſieged him for want of victuals: ſo that his ſouldiers were euen wearie of altogether. Whereupon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: Oh, well ſaid, cried all the ſouldiers, let Captaine fight againſt Captaine, and Romaine againſt Romaine. Howbeit Metellus refuſed him, and the ſouldiers laughed him to ſcorne. Neuertheleſſe he did but ſmile at them, and therein ſhewed himſelfe a wiſe man: for as Theophraſtus ſaith, a Captaine muſt die as a Captaine, not like a priuate ſouldier. Furthermore, Metellus conſidering that the Langobrites (who gaue aide vnto Sertorius in all ſeruices) were eaſie to be taken for lacke of water (hauing but one onely well in all their citie) and that whoſoeuer did beſiege that ſame, ſhould ſtraight be maſter of all the ſpring heads of the ſuburbes about it, hoping thereby to make the citie yeeld vnto him within two dayes at the vtmost, he commaunded his souldiers to victuall themselues for fiue daies onely. But Sertorius hauing intelligence thereof, gaue good direction and speedie order to preuent him. For he caused two thousand goats skins to be filled with water, and promised round summes of money for euery skin brought thither. Many SPANIARDS and MAVRVSIANS straight tooke vpon them the enterprise. Thereupon Sertorius chusing the lustiest men among them, sent them away through the mountaine, commaunding them withall, that when they deliuered their goates skins with water vnto the citizens, they should cause them forthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might last thē the longer which defended the citie. Metellus receiuing aduertisement hereof, was much agrieued withall, because his souldiers victuals were wel-neare spent, which they had brought according to his commandement: and therefore he sent Aquinus one of his Lieutenants, with six thousand men to get victuals. Sertorius hauing intelligence of his purpose, presently laid an ambush for his returne in a valley full of wood, and bestowed there three thousand men to set vpon the rereward, whilest he himselfe gaue charge on the voward. Thus made he Aquinus flie, slue the most part of his men, and tooke the rest prisoners. Howbeit Aquinus selfe the Captaine, hauing lost his weapons and horse, by flying recouered Metellus campe: who thereupon was driuen with shame to raise his siege, being mocked of all the SPANIARDS. For these valiant deeds, was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honoured of all the barbarous people, and specially because he had made them good souldiers, brought them from their former rude and beastly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the ROMAINE fashion, to keepe their rankes when they fought, to follow their ensigne, and to take the signall and word of the battel: insomuch as he made them then appeare a goodly armie, wel taught and trained, being before a confused multitude of theeues and robbers. Furthermore, he deuided great store of gold and siluer among them, shewing them how they should gild their head-pecces, set out their shields and targets with fine workmanship, and also brauely apparell themselues with rich clokes, and sleeueless cassocks vpon their armour, teaching them to be fine, and furnishing them with mony, whereby he maruellously wan the hearts of the barbarous people. Yet did he farther bind them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children: for he sent generally for all the noble mens yong sons, through all the countries and prouinces subiect vnto him: and brought them to the goodly citie of OSCA, where he prouided them of schoolemaisters to teach them the Greeke and Latine tongue: bearing their parents in hand, that it was to no other end, but to make them (when they came to be men) meete to be employed in the seruice of the common-weale, albeit indeede it was but a fine deuise of him, to haue them as hostages for their faith and loyaltie towards him. Then were the fathers of these children glad men to see their sons apparelled like ROMAINES, in faire long gownes garded with purple, to go ciuilly to the schools: that Sertorius payd for their learning: and that oftentimes he went thither to appose them, to see how they profited: and how he gaue rewards vnto them that were the best scholers, hanging iewels about their neckes, which the ROMAINES call Bulla. Insomuch as they hauing a custome at that time in SPAINE, that such as were about the Prince or their Chiefetaine should die with him when he died, that custome of voluntarie vow to die with their Lord, being called by the barbarous people, deuotion: there were very few of their followers and familiars that would vow to die with other Captaines, but on the other side, thousands commonly followed Sertorius, hauing vowed to loose their liues with him. And for proofe hereof it is reported, that when his armie on a time was ouerthrowne by a certaine citie of SPAINE, the enemies eagerly pursuing him, the SPANIARDS not regarding their owne liues to saue his, tooke him vpon their shoulders, and so passed him from man to man vpon them, till they put him into the citie, who being safe & out of danger, they then looked by running to saue themselues the best they could. Thus was Sertorius not onely beloued of the SPANIARDS, but of other souldiers also that came out of ITALY. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same faction, arriued in SPAINE full of money, and with a good number of souldiers, intending to make warre in his behalfe against Metellus: his souldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his campe but of Sertorius. The which spited Perpenna to the heart, being proud and stately by meanes of his wealth and estate, comming of a noble house. Newes being come that Pompey was past ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, the souldiers armed themselues, & plucked vp their ensignes that were fast in the ground and cried out vpō Perpenna to leade them to Sertorius, threatning him that if he would not, they would leaue him alone, and seeke them a Captaine, that could both saue himselfe and them.

Perpenna ioyned with Sertorius.

So

So was Perpenna forced againſt his will to follow their minds, and to leade the three and fiftie enſignes he had with him, to ioyne with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius armie very great, and ſpecially after all the cities on this ſide the riuer of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then came ſouldiers to him out of all parts, howbeit they were a raſh confuſed multitude of Omnigatherum together, hauing no reaſon nor patience to abide time, but cried out in furie, to ſet vpon their enemies. This troubled Sertorius much, ſeeking firſt to quiet them by reaſon and perſwaſion. But when he ſaw they fell to mutinie, and would needs haue their wils, and both without reaſon and all good order would ſo go ſet vpon their enemies: he gaue them the head, and let them go as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their folly, but yet tooke ſuch order and direction, as they ſhould not vtterly be caſt away, hoping after that to haue them the more obedient vnto him. And indeed they had their payment as he coniectured: notwithſtanding he went to reſcue them, and ſo brought them ſafe into his campe. Now to take away the feare and perplexitie from them, which this ouerthrow perhaps had ſtriken into them: immediatly after he cauſed his whole armie to aſſemble, as purpoſing to vſe ſome ſpeech vnto them. At which time he cauſed two horſes to be brought and ſet in the middeſt among them, the one an old and feeble iade, and the other a goodly luſty horſe, which beſides other things, had a maruellous faire thicke taile. Behind the old leane iade, he ſet a luſty tall fellow: and behind the goodly horſe alſo, he placed a litle weariſh man, and ſeeming to ſight to haue but ſmall ſtrength. Now vpon a ſigne giuen them which he had made them priuie to, the ſtrong man tooke the leane horſe by the taile with all his might, as if he would haue pluckt it off by the ſtumpe: and the other weariſh man fell to plucking off haire by haire from the great horſe taile. So when the ſtrong man had tugged and ſwet a great while in vaine at the leane horſe taile, thinking to haue plucked it off, and in the end did nothing elſe but make the lookers on laugh: and that the weariſh wretch on the other ſide in a ſhort ſpace (and at eaſe) had left the great horſe taile with neuer a haire on it: Sertorius then riſing vp, ſpake in this ſort to his ſouldiers: Do ye not ſee (my friends & companions) ſaid he, how time and perſeuerance exceedeth force? and that things vnlikely at the firſt to be ouercome by force, are yet in time by litle and litle obtained? For continuance ouercommeth all things, and there is no force nor power, but proceſſe of time conſumeth & bringeth to nought, being a moſt certaine help to them that can take oportunitie, and abide time: as in contrariwiſe haſte and raſhnes is as dangerous an enemie as may be, to thē that do things of a head without regard. By theſe common deuiſes wherewith Sertorius daily acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportunitie of time. But of all the ſtratagemes he vſed in warre, that onely exceeded all other, which he ſhewed vnto a people called the CHARACITANIANS. The people do dwel on the other ſide of the riuer of Tagus, and haue neither cities nor villages for their common abode, but only a great high hil, ful of hollow caues and deepe holes among the rockes, looking towards the North. At the foote of this mountaine the valley is a great ſlimie ground, and ſo rotten, that it is not able to beare a man, but being troden on, crūmeth like white lime, and turneth to duſt vnder his feet. And therefore by meanes of the ſame, when thoſe people were afraid of any enemies, or that they had conueyed the goods they had robbed and ſtolne from their neighbours into thoſe caues, they thought themſelues ſafe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was impoſſible to compel them to come out. Now it chanced that Sertorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which theſe barbarous people inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrown him. But Sertorius being in a rage with them, and becauſe he would ſhew that he fled not: tooke his horſe-back the next morning, and rode as neare to the hill as he could, to view the nature and ſituation of the place: and when he ſaw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, & walked vp & downe, vainely threatning them to no purpoſe. Yet going and coming to & fro, he perceiued the wind raiſed a great duſt, of that brittle earth we haue ſpoken of, and caried it ful into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes whereof as we ſaid before, lay full vpon the North. This Northren wind which ſome call Cæcias, is the onely wind of all other that moſt keepeth in that quarter, and riſeth from the moores and mountaines thereabouts, which be continually couered with ſnow, and then in the heart of ſommer is nouriſhed and inforced by the melting of the yce and ſnow, and ſo bloweth a iolly coole wind, which refreſheth the barbarous people and beaſtes all the day long. Sertorius marking this with himſelf, and vnderſtanding by the inhabitants thereabouts, that this wind blew commonly among them: commaunded his ſouldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light brittle earth together, and to raiſe a mount of it, right againſt the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockerie of it at the firſt, thinking Sertorius would haue made a mount to haue fought with them vpon it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his ſouldiers backe againe into his camp. The next morning by breake of day there was a pretie litle wind ſtirring, that only blew off the top of his forced mount, and the higheſt part of that maſſe of earth, as chaffe when they winnow corne: and as the Sun began to haue any power, the North wind alſo roſe, which forthwith filled all the hill with duſt. And withall, came Sertorius ſouldiers who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all thoſe drie clods of clay in peeces. The horſemen on the other ſide, they ſtill managed their horſes vp and downe in it, to raiſe vp the greater duſt, which the wind caried as ſoone as it roſe, and blew into the caues of theſe barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes and riftes of the rockes. So they hauing no other vents nor ayre any way, but there where the wind blew in vpon them: it did ſo blindfold their eyes, and filled their caues with ſuch a hot ſtuffing ayre, that they were almoſt choked withall, not able to take breath. For when they ſhould draw their breathes, this ſtuffing ayre and duſt came in at their mouthes ſo faſt, that they had much a do to hold out two dayes, and on the third yeelded themſelues vnto Sertorius mercie: the which thing did not ſo much increaſe his power, as it wanne him honour; by policie to haue wonne ſuch an vnlikely conqueſt, which by force could neuer haue bene gotten, and where to fight was a matter impoſſible. So long therefore as he made warre with Metellus alone, he commonly had the aduantage of him, becauſe Metellus was an old man and heauie, and could not reſiſt Sertorius luſtie youth, that led a light armie, like rather to a companie of theeues and robbers, than to an armie of men of warre.

Sertorius deeds againſt Pompey.

But afterwards when Pompey was come ouer the mountaines Pyrenei, and that both of them were encamped each before other, and that Pompey had ſhewed him all the ſtratagemes and policies of warre poſſible for a good captaine to deuiſe, and he the like vnto Pompey, and found that Sertorius had the better of him, both in laying his ambuſhes, and alſo in foreſeeing to intrap him: then grew the fame of Sertorius to be ſo great, that euen in Rome it ſelfe he was thought to be the nobleſt Captaine, and of beſt conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwards alſo waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Sylla, who gaue him the ſurname of Pompey the great, for that he deſerued the honor of triumph, before his beard was growne. So, when he was come thus into Spaine, diuers townes and cities ſubiect vnto Sertorius, were halfe in mind to yeeld vnto Pompey: but afterwards they altered againe, vpon the chaunce that happened vnto the citie of Lavron, beyond all expectation.

Sertorius goeth to lay ſiege to the citie of Lauron.

For Sertorius being gone to lay ſiege to it, Pompey in haſte went thither with his armie to raiſe the ſiege. Neare vnto the citie there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a campe in, and alſo to diſtreſſe them of the citie: whereupon the one made haſte to get it, and the other to keepe him from it. Notwithſtanding, Sertorius was the firſt man, and got the hill: and Pompey came euen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had ſo fallen out, thinking to haue made Sertorius ſure at that time, being kept in on the one ſide with the citie of Lavron, and with his armie on the other. Thereupon he ſent vnto the citizens, and bade them care for nothing, more then to ſtand vpon their walles at their pleaſure, to ſee Sertorius ſtraightly beſieged, who thought to haue beſieged them. This meſſage being brought to Sertorius, he ſmiled at it, and ſaid, that he would teach Sillaes young ſcholler (for ſo in mockerie he called Pompey) that a wiſe Captaine ſhould rather ſee behind then before him: and therewithall he ſhewed the Lavronitans ſixe thouſand footmen well armed, which he had left in his campe when he came to take the hill where he was, to the end that if Pompey came by chaunce to aſſayle him, they ſhould giue a charge vpon his rereward. Pompey hauing found this too late, durſt not offer Sertorius battell, fearing to be compaſſed in behind: and on the other ſide he was aſhamed to forſake the Lavronitans, whom he was driuen in the end to ſee vtterly ſpoyled and deſtroyed before his eyes, and durſt not once ſtirre to helpe them. The barbarous people of the contrarie part ſeeing no hope of aide by him, yeelded ſtraight vnto Sertorius, who did not onely pardon them, but alſo ſuffered them to go whither they would. Howbeit he burnt the citie, for no anger or crueltie (being a Captaine that neuer ſhewed crueltie in anger) but to ſhame Pompey withall, and to ſtop their mouthes that made ſuch account of him: and that this brute might runne among the barbarous people, that Pompey himſelfe being preſent, and might in manner haue warmed him by the fire that burnt a goodly citie of his confederates, neither durſt nor could helpe them.

Sertorius worthy ſaying of a Captaine.

Sertorius burnt the citie of Lauron in Pompeyes ſight.

Indeed

Indeed Sertorius in continuance of this warre ſuſtained much loſſe and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the fault of his Lieutenants: for, as touching himſelfe, he was neuer ouerthrowne, nor thoſe he led. And yet he euer wan more honor in recouering of thoſe battels which his Captaines loſt, than his enemies did that had put them to the worſe. As in the battell he wan againſt Pompey, by the citie of SVCRON: and in another he wanne againſt Pompey and Metellus both, by the citie of TVTTIA. And as for the ouerthrow of SVCRON, it is thought it came through Pompeys ambition, making the more haſte for feare Metellus ſhould be partaker of the honour of his victorie: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioyne with him, and therefore he fought the battell with Pompey towards night, ſuppoſing the darknes of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to ſaue themſelues if they were ouercome, and alſo to chaſe the enemies if it ſo happened they had the vpper hand, becauſe they were ſtrangers, and knew not the country. When both battels came to giue charge, Sertorius at the firſt was not directly againſt Pompey, but againſt Afranius who led the left wing of Pompeys battell, and himſelfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howbeit Sertorius being aduertiſed that the left wing of his owne armie againſt which Pompey fought, was in ſuch diſtreſſe as they gaue backe and could abide no longer, if they were not preſently ayded: ſtraight left the leading of the right wing, which he aſſigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all ſpeed poſſible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as flying. And firſt he gathered them together againe which had turned their backes, and after put thoſe alſo in good order that were yet a fighting: and ſo hauing encoraged them, both with his words and the preſence of his perſon, he gaue a new charge againe vpon Pompey, more couragiouſly then before, (who thinking he had alreadie wonne the field, was then a chaſing ſuch as fled) and came ſo fiercely vpon him, that he put all the whole armie of the ROMAINES to flight: inſomuch as Pompey himſelfe eſcaped killing in the field very hardly, being ſore hurt, and ſaued by a ſtrange meane. For the AFRICANS of Sertorius hauing taken Pompeys horſe (which was richly trapped with harneſſe of gold and other precious furniture) falling out among themſelues, and fighting for diuiſion of the ſame: in the meane time let Pompey go, and neuer followed after him. Afranius againe on the other ſide, whileſt Sertorius was gone to helpe the other wing of his battell, made them all flie that ſtood before him, and folowed killing of them euen into the trenches of their campe, entring in amongeſt them that fled, and ſpoiled the campe being darke night, knowing nothing of Pompeys ouerthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from ſpoile. Sertorius alſo comming thither vpon the inſtant, finding Pompeys men in diſorder, ſlue a number of them: and the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them out into the field, to fight once more with Pompey. But receiuing intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he ſounded the retraite, and diſlodged from the place he encamped, ſaying: had not that old woman come, I would haue whipped that yong boy to ROME with rods. Now was Sertorius very heauie, that no man could tell him what was become of his white hynd: for thereby all his ſubtiltie and fineneſſe to keepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, and then ſpecially, when they ſtood in neede of moſt comfort. But by good hap, certaine of his ſouldiers that had loſt themſelues in the night, met with the hynd in their way, and knowing her by her colour, tooke her and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her, promiſed them a good reward, ſo that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be ſecretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroade among them, and with a pleaſant countenance told the noble men and chiefe Captaines of theſe barbarous people, how the gods had reuealed it to him in his dreame, that he ſhould ſhortly haue a maruellous good thing happen to him: and with theſe words ſate downe in his chaire to giue audience. Whereupon they that kept the hynd not farre from thence, did ſecretly let her go. The hynd being looſe, when ſhe had ſpied Sertorius, ranne ſtraight to his chaire with great ioy, and put her head betwixt his legges, and layed her mouth in his right hand, as ſhe before was wont to do. Sertorius alſo made very much of her, and of purpoſe appeared maruellous glad, ſhewing ſuch tender affection to the hynd, as it ſeemed the water ſtood in his eyes for ioy. The barbarous people that ſtood there by and beheld the ſame, at the firſt were much amazed therewith: but afterwards when they had better bethought themſelues, for ioy they clapped their hands together, and waited vpon Sertorius to his lodging with great and ioyfull ſhouts, ſaying, and ſtedfaſtly beleeuing, that he was a heauenly creature, and beloued of the gods: whereupon they were maruellouſly pleaſed in their minds, and certainly hoped that their affaires ſhould proſper daily better & better. Another time hauing ſtraighted his enemies with ſcarcitie of victuals, in the territorie of the SAGVNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight againſt his will, for that they ſent great troupes of men to forrage the countrey, to get victuals. Vpon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either ſide, where Memmius was ſlaine, (the valianteſt Captaine Pompey had) couragiouſly fighting in the middeſt of the battell. Sertorius finding himſelfe the ſtronger, followed his firſt wing, making great ſlaughter of thoſe that withſtood him, vntill he came vnto Metellus ſelfe, who taried his comming, defending himſelfe more valiantly then was either hoped or looked for, in a man of his yeares: in ſomuch as he was at the laſt hurt with a partizan. Which was ſuch a diſhonor to the ROMAINES, not vnto them onely that ſaw it, but vnto ſuch alſo as heard of it, that being all aſhamed to forſake their Captaine, and turning their ſhame into anger againſt their enemies, they couered Metellus round about with their ſhields and targets, and getting him out of the preaſe and furie of the fight, gaue ſuch a fierce onſet, as they draue the SPANIARDS to flie. Thus fortune changing the victorie, Sertorius to giue his ſcattered men time to ſaue themſelues, and leiſure alſo for a new ſupply (which he cauſed to be preſently leauied) to come at their pleaſure: fled of purpoſe into a citie of the mountaines of ſtrong ſituation, and there ſetting a good face of the matter, repaired the rampers, and fortified the gates, thinking nothing leſſe then to abide there to be beſieged, but onely to lay a baite for his enemies, comming to beſiege the citie, hoping they ſhould eaſily win it, and in the meane time left purſuing of the barbarous people, which had thereby good leiſure giuen them to ſaue themſelues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to ſuppreſſe the new ſupply that was comming to Sertorius, who had ſent out his Captaines to the next cities and ſhires adioyning to leauie men, with expreſſe commaundement, that when they had muſtered a conuenient number together, they ſhould ſend them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderſtood of their comming, he eaſily paſſed through his enemies to meete them, and with them ſodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worſe then before, ſometime cutting their victuals from them by land, through his ambuſhes and continuall ſubtile pollicies, being quickly in euery place whither they thought to go, with his light armie: and on the ſea alſo with certaine pyrats pinnaces, with the which he ſcoured all the coaſt vpon the ſea ſide. By this meanes both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to ſeuer themſelues farre one from the other, in ſomuch as Metellus went to winter in GAVLE, Pompey remained in SPAINE, (in great ſcarcitie of all things for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCEIANS, and wrote to the Senate at ROME, that he would returne with his armie into ITALY, if they ſent him not money out of hand, for that he had ſpent all his owne dayly fighting for the defence of ITALY. Thus it was certainely thought at ROME, that Sertorius would be in ITALY before Pompey: becauſe he had through his valiancie and great skill brought two of the moſt famous Captaines of their time, to great extremitie and diſtreſſe. Then did Metellus ſhew how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull enemie. For he proclaimed by ſound of trumpet, that if any ROMAINE could kill him, he would giue him an hundred ſiluer talents, and twentie thouſand Iugera of land: and if he were a baniſhed man, he promiſed he ſhould be reſtored to his countrey and goods againe, buying his death by treaſon, whom he could not ouercome by force. And furthermore, being his chance once to winne a battell of Sertorius, he was ſo iocond and proud for this victorie, that he would needes therefore be called Imperator, to ſay, Prince, or ſoueraigne Captaine: and was contented the people ſhould ſet vp altars and do ſacrifices vnto him in euerie citie where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlands of flowers on his head, and would be bidden to diſſolute banquets, ſitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victorie go vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine ſecret engines carying triumphes of gold, and crownes and garlands of triumph, and dauncers of goodly young boyes and faire girles following of them, with ſongs of triumph in his praiſe. Wherein doubtleſſe he deſerued to be laughed at, ſhewing himſelfe ſo much caried away with ioy and vaine glorie, for one ouerthrow giuen vnto him, whom himſelfe was wont to call Syllaes fugitiue, and the remnant of the baniſhed men of Carbo. On the other ſide, Sertorius noble courage was eaſily diſcerned: firſt, for that he called the baniſhed men which were eſcaped from ROME, and come to him Senatours: and hauing them about him, called them the Senate, making ſome of them Treaſurers, others Prætors, directing and ordering all things according to the maner of his countrey. And in this alſo, that making wars with the ſouldiers of the cities of SPAINE, and

and defraying the ſame at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authoritie, ſo much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with ROMAINE officers and captaines: ſaying ſtill, that he fought for the libertie of the people of ROME, and not to increaſe the glorie and power of the SPANIARDS, to the hurt & diſhonor of the ROMAINES. For to ſay truly of him, he euer loued his country well, and longed much to be ſent for home againe: and yet in his greateſt troubles, when things thwrated him moſt, then was his mind greateſt, yeelding no maner of ſhew or appearance to his enemies, of any faint heart or diſcouragement in him. Againe, when he was in beſt proſperitie, and had moſt aduantage of his enemies, he ſent vnto Metellus and Pompey, both letting them vnderſtand that for his part he was contented to lay armes aſide, and to liue at home like a priuate man, ſo that he might be lawfully reſtored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meaneſt citizen in ROME, then being a baniſhed man out of his countrey, to be called Emperour of the world. And it is ſaid, that one of the chiefeſt cauſes which made him deſire ſo much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had brought him vp from the time of his fathers death) vpon whom he caſt all his loue and delight: inſomuch as after that his friends in SPAINE had ſent for him to come to be their captaine, and that he had bene a while among them, receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it ſo ſtrake him to the heart, that he had almoſt died for ſorrow. For he lay ſeuen dayes together continually on the ground weeping, and neuer gaue his ſouldiers the watch-word, nor would be ſeene of any of his friends: vntill that the other noble men and captaines of his owne eſtate, came to him to his tent, and were ſo importunate of him by intreatie and perſwaſion, that they got him out of his tent to ſhew himſelfe to his ſouldiers, to ſpeake to them, and to take order for his affaires which proſpered very well. By theſe ſignes many haue iudged, that he was of a courteous and pitifull nature, and that naturally he was giuen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of neceſſitie to take charge of men of warre, becauſe he could not otherwiſe liue quietly nor ſafely, being purſued by his enemies, which would neuer let him reſt, and thereupon entred into warre, for his owne gard and ſafetie. The treatie ſelfe he made with king Mithridates, argued his noble mind. For when Mithridates whom Sylla had ouercome was recouered againe (like a wreſtler that being ouerthrowne, getteth vp on his feete to trie another fall with his enemie) & took vpon him to inuade ASIA: Sertorius fame was then ſo great, that he was ſpoken of through the world, by merchants comming from the Weſt, who blew abroad the report thereof all the Eaſt parts ouer, euen into the Realme of PONT, like to merchandizes which they went to ſeeke for in ſtrange countries. Whereupon Mithridates being perſwaded by the vaine vaunts of his fauoured Courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hannibal, and himſelfe vnto king Pyrrus, ſaying, that the ROMAINES being ſet vpon by them both, could not withſtand two ſuch excellēt natures, & great powers together, whē the nobleſt captain of the world ſhould be ioyned with the greateſt and moſt puiſſant Prince that euer was: ſent therupon his Ambaſſadors into SPAINE vnto Sertorius, with full power and commiſſion to promiſe him money and ſhips towards the maintenance and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he deſired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the poſſeſſion of ASIA againe, the which he had ſurrendred vp vnto the ROMAINES vpon the peace made betwixt him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his Councell together (which he termed the Senate) to conſult vpon this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he ſhould accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the ſame, conſidering that they asked them nothing but a title in the aire, and a name of things which were not in their power, offering them therefore things preſent, whereof they had greater need, yet would Sertorius neuer agree thereunto. Notwithſtanding, thus much he granted Mithridates, that he ſhould enioy CAPPADOCIA and BITHYNIA, which had euer bene countries ſubiect vnto kings, and whereunto the ROMAINES had neuer any right, excepting this ſpecially: that he would neuer ſuffer him to vſurpe any countrey; vnto the which the ROMAINES had any iuſt title, and the which he had loſt in warres by force of armes vnto Fimbria, and had afterwards alſo willingly ſurrendred by agreement made betwixt him & Sylla. For he ſaid he would enlarge the Empire of ROME through his victories, but not impaire or hurt it by his conqueſts. For, a valiāt man (ſaid he) ſhould couet to conquer with honour, but in no wiſe deſire life with diſhonor. His anſwer being reported vnto king Mithridates, did much amaze him: and ſome haue written, that he then ſayd vnto his familiars: What would Sertorius command vs then, if he ſate among them in the Senate at ROME, who being an exile now, and remaining in the fartheſt part of the world by the ſea

Atlanticum, doth take vpon him to bound the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatning vs alſo with wars, if we attempt any thing againſt Asia? All this notwithſtanding, they were agreed vpon othes taken betweene them, that Mithridates ſhould enioy the countries of Cappadocia and Bithynia, and that Sertorius ſhould ſend him one of his Captaines with aide of men of warre, and that vpon performance thereof, the king ſhould giue him the ſumme of three thouſand talents, and fortie ſhips of warre. So Sertorius ſent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of Rome, who fled to him for ſuccour: with whom Mithridates diſtreſſed certaine cities of Asia. And when Marius entred into them, with his ſergeants carying the bundels of rods and axes before him, as before a Proconſull of the Romaines, Mithridates gaue him the vpper-hand, as his better, and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did ſet certaine cities at libertie, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodneſſe did releaſe them of their taxe and cuſtomes they paid: ſo that poore Asia which had bene oppreſſed by the couetouſneſſe of the Treaſurers and Farmers of the Romaines, and alſo by the pride and inſolencie of the ſouldiers which lay in garriſon among them, beganne to haue ſome hope of change, and to deſire the alteration of gouernement, which Sertorius offered. But on the other ſide, the Senators of Rome that were in Spaine as baniſhed men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitie and eſtate that himſelfe was of, they hearing ſay that all was well againe at Rome, and perſwading themſelues that they ſhould be ſtrong inough for their enemies, hauing no cauſe to feare any more danger: began then to enuie Sertorius greatneſſe and authoritie, but Perpenna ſpecially among other, who by reaſon of his nobilitie, being puft vp with a vaine preſumption and ambitious ſelfe will, practiſed to make himſelfe chiefe of all the armie, and to that end threw forth amongſt his friends and familiars ſuch kind of ſeditious wordes: What curſed fortune (quoth he) my friends doth dayly haunt vs worſe then other, making vs that were vnwilling to obey Sylla (commaunding at this day both land and ſea at his will) to chooſe rather to forſake our lands and countrey? And now being come hither in hope to liue at libertie, we willingly make our ſelues ſlaues, becomming Sertorius guard for defence of his perſon in exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with faire words, calling vs the Senate, whereat euery man laugheth to heare vs ſo called, and in fine we muſt abide this diſhonour to be at his commaundement, and drudge and take as much paines, as the Spaniards and Lvcitanians do themſelues. Hereupon the more part of them being caried away with theſe mutinous words, durſt not yet ſhew themſelues in actuall rebellion againſt Sertorius, being afeard of his authoritie: howbeit ſecretly vnderhand they ouerthrew his doings, by ſhewing extreme crueltie vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of iuſtice, impoſing great payments vpon them, giuing it out it was Sertorius commaundement. By which their leud practiſes, many cities reuolted againſt him, and put themſelues into his enemies hands: and they dayly alſo raiſed new mutinies and rebellions vpon him. Furthermore, thoſe whom he ſent to pacifie the tumults did handle themſelues in ſuch ſort, that where they ſhould haue quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they ſet them farther out, and procured new tumults. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodneſſe ſo altered, that he committed a moſt cruell act vpon all the noble mens children of that land, which he brought vp at ſchoole in the citie of Osca: for ſome of them he put to death, and others he ſold as ſlaues. Thus Perpenna hauing many aſſociates in his wicked conſpiracie againſt Sertorius, brought into his confederacie alſo one called Manlius, who had chiefeſt charge in all the armie. This Manlius loued a young boy exceedingly, and becauſe he would let him know he loued him well, he told him on a time the whole plot of this conſpiracie, willing him not to reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him onely: for he ſhould ſee him a great man before it were long. The young boy louing another better then him, called Aufidius, went and reuealed vnto him all that Manlius had told him. Aufidius maruelled to heare the boy made priuie to it, ſeeing himſelfe alſo was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them. And when the boy alſo named Perpenna, Græcinus, and ſome other whom Aufidius knew well to be of counſell, he was worſe afrayd then before, but yet ſeemed to make litle of it, and told the boy: for that matter it was nothing, and counſelled him not to credit Manlius words, who was but a vaine man, and boaſted of that which was not true, and did it onely but to deceiue him. This notwithſtanding, departing thence, he went forthwith vnto Perpenna, and told him how their practiſe was diſcouered, declaring further what danger they were in, if it were not ſpeedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true that he ſaid, and

and thereupon they deuiſed this treaſon. They had ſuborned a meſſenger to bring counterfeit letters to Sertorius, faining in the ſame that one of his Lieutenants had wonne a great battell, in the which he had ſlaine a maruellous number of his enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made ſacrifice vnto the gods to giue them thankes. Whereupon, Perpenna taking the preſent oportunitie, inuited Sertorius to ſupper to him, and all other his friends that were preſent (euery one of the conſpiracie with him) and was ſo importunate with Sertorius, that in the end he promiſed him to come. Now Sertorius did euer vſe great modeſtie at the boord, and would ſuffer no diſſolute talk nor light parts at his meate, and had acquainted them alſo that vſed his table, to talke of graue and wiſe matters, and yet one to be honeſtly merrie with another, without any playing or vncomely talke. In the middeſt of ſupper, they that ſought occaſion of quarrell, began to ſpeake leud words, counterfeiting to be drunke, and to play many vile parts, of purpoſe to anger Sertorius. Whereupon Sertorius, whether it was that he could not abide to ſee thoſe villainous parts, or that he miſtruſted their ill will towards him by fumbling of their wordes in their mouthes, and by their vnwonted irreuerent maner ſhewed vnto him: fell backwards vpon the bed where he ſate at meate, ſeeming no more to marke what they did or ſaid. Perpenna at that inſtant tooke a cup full of wine, and making as though he dranke, let it fall of purpoſe. The cup falling down made a noiſe, and that was the ſigne giuen among them. Therewithall Antonius that ſate aboue Sertorius at the table, ſtabbed him in with his dagger. Sertorius feeling the thruſt, ſtroue to riſe: but the traiterous murtherer got vp on Sertorius breaſt, and held both his hands. And thus was Sertorius cruelly murthered, not able to defend himſelf, all the conſpirators falling vpon him. Sertorius death being blowne abroade, the moſt part of the SPANIARDS ſent Ambaſſadours immediatly vnto Pompey and Metellus, and yeelded themſelues vnto them: and Perpenna with thoſe that remained with him, attempted to do ſomething with Sertorius armie and preparation; but all fell out to his vtter deſtruction and ruine, making the world know that he was a wicked man, who could neither commaund, nor knew how to obey. For he went to aſſaile Pompey, who had ouerthrowne him ſtraight, and was in the end taken priſoner. And yet in that inſtant of his calamitie, he did not vſe himſelfe like a valiant minded man, and one worthy to rule: for, thinking to ſaue his life, hauing Sertorius letters and writings, he offered Pompey to deliuer him all Sertorius letters ſent him from the chiefeſt Senators of ROME, written with their owne hands, requeſting Sertorius to bring his armie into ITALY, where he ſhould find numbers of people deſirous of his comming, and that gaped ſtill for change of gouernement. But here did Pompey ſhew himſelfe a graue and no young man, deliuering thereby the citie of ROME from great feare and daunger of chaunge and innouation. For he put all Sertorius letters and writings on a heape together, and burnt them euery one, without reading any of them, or ſuffering them to be read. And moreouer, he preſently put Perpenna to death, fearing he ſhould name ſome, which if they were named, would breed new occaſion of trouble and ſedition. And as for the other conſpirators, ſome of them afterwards were brought to Pompey, who put them all to death: and the reſt of them fled into AFRICKE, where they were all ouerthrowne by them of the countrey, and not a man of them ſcaped, but fell vnfortunately vpon the edge of the ſword, Auſidius onely except, Manlius companion in loue. Who, either becauſe he was not reckoned of, or elſe vnknowne, died an old man in a pelting village of the barbarous people, poore, miſerable, and hated of all the world.

THE LIFE OF Eumenes.

Eumenes parentage.

Vris the Hiſtoriographer writeth, that Emenes was borne in the citie of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a cariers ſonne of the ſame countrey, (who for pouertie earned his liuing by carying merchandizes to and fro) and that he was notwithſtanding honeſtly brought vp, aſwell at ſchoole, as at other comely exerciſes. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Philip king of MACEDON chancing to come through the citie of CARDIA, where hauing nothing to do, he tooke great pleaſure to ſee the young men of the citie handle their weapons, and boyes to wreſtle: and among them, Eumenes ſhewed ſuch actiuitie, and performed it with ſo good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boy well, and tooke him away with him. But ſure their report ſeemeth trueſt, which write that Philip did aduaunce him for the loue he bare to his father, in whoſe houſe he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his ſeruice with King Alexander his ſonne, where he was thought as wiſe a man, and as faithfull to his maiſter, as any: and though he was called the Chancellor or chiefe Secretarie, yet the King did honour him as much as he did any other of his chiefeſt friends or familiars. For he was ſent his Lieutenant generall of his whole armie, againſt the INDIANS, & was Perdiccas ſucceſſor in the gouernement of his prouince, Perdiccas being preferred vnto Hephæſtions charge after his death. Now becauſe Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squiers for the bodie vnto the King) after the death of Alexander told the Lords of the councell of MACEDON, that he had ſerued the King with his ſhield and ſpeare, and how Eumenes had followed with his pen and paper: the Lords laughed him to ſcorne, knowing that beſides many great honours Eumenes had receiued, the King eſteemed ſo well of him, that he did him the honour by mariage to make him his kinſeman. For the firſt Ladie that Alexander knew in ASIA, was Barſine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a ſonne, and called his name Hercules: and two of her ſiſters he maried the one of them called Apama vnto Ptolomie, and her other ſiſter alſo called Barſine, he beſtowed vpon Eumenes, when he diſtributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lords and familiars to marrie them. Yet all this notwithſtanding, he often fell in diſgrace with King Alexander, and ſtood in ſome daunger by meanes of Hephæſtion. For Hephæſtion following Alexanders Court on a time, hauing appointed Euius a fife-player a lodging, which Eumenes ſeruants had taken vp for their maiſter: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out that a man were better be a fife and a common player of Tragedies, then a ſouldier, Barſine the wife of Eumenes.

ſithence

ſithence ſuch kind of people were preferred before men of ſeruice that ventured their liues in the warres. Alexander at that preſent time was as angrie as Eumenes, and roundly tooke vp Hephæſtion for it: howbeit immediatly after hauing chaunged his mind, he was much offended with Eumenes, becauſe he thought him not to haue vſed that franke ſpeech ſo much againſt Hephæſtion, as of a certaine preſumptuous boldneſſe towards himſelfe. And at another time alſo, when Alexander was ſending Nearchus with his armie by ſea to cleere the coaſts of the Ocean, it chanced the king was without money: whereupon he ſent to all his friends to take vp money in preſt, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requeſted three hundred talents. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, & ſaid he had much a do to get him ſo much of all his tenãts. Alexander ſaid nothing to him, neither would he ſuffer them to take his hundred talents: but commaunded his officers to ſet Eumenes tent on fire, becauſe he would take him tardie with a lie, before he could giue order to carie away his gold and ſiluer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make ſhift to ſaue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwards, and was ſorie it was burnt, becauſe all his letters and writings were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and ſiluer mingled together, aboue a thouſand talets, and yet Alexander tooke none of it away: but more then that, he ſent vnto all his Lieutenants, Captaines, and Gouernours of countries, whereſoeuer they were, that they ſhould ſend him copies, of all the letters which they before had ſent vnto him, becauſe all thoſe which he had were burnt, and commanded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephæſtion fell at variance againe, by reaſon of a gift that was giuen him, inſomuch as very foule words paſſed betwixt Hephæſtion and him: yet did not the King giue Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwithſtanding, ſhortly after Hephæſtion was dead, the King taking his death grieuouſly whom he loued ſo dearely, gaue no good countenance (and was very briefe beſides) vnto thoſe whom he knew bare any grudge to Hephæſtion whiles he liued, and that he thought were glad of his death, but ſpecially vnto Eumenes of all other, whoſe malice towards Hephæſtion was knowne to him well enough: inſomuch as he would oft twit him withall, remembring him of the iniuries he had offered Hephæſtion. But Eumenes being very wiſe, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the ſelfe ſame meane that did him hurt: and deuiſed (to further Alexanders deſire, ſeeking to honour Hephæſtions funerall with all pompe poſſible) new inuentions to ſet forth the ſame, of more magnificence then had before bene ſeene, ſparing for no coſt, laying on money bountifully, to make him a rich and ſtately tombe. Againe, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwixt the MACEDONIAN footmen, and the noblemen that had bene neareſt about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will ſtucke to the Lords, but in words he ſeemed a neuter & friend to both parts: ſaying, it was not for him being a ſtranger, to thruſt himſelf into the quarrels of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lords were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behind pacified the greateſt part of the ſouldiers, and made them more tractable and readie to agree with the Lords. Whereupon, after the Lords and Captaines had conſulted together, and taken order for thoſe contentions, they deuided the gouernement of the prouinces among them, which they called Satrapaes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coaſt vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the citie of TRAPEZVNTE, the which at that time was not ſubiect to the Empire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as king. Howbeit it was ſaid, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in poſſeſſion of it, with a great and puiſſant armie, and make him Gouernour there. Yet afterwards Antigonus made none account of Perdiccas letters vnto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to conquer all, deſpiſing all other. And Leonatus alſo came downe into PHRYGIA, and vndertooke the iourney of this conqueſt for Eumenes ſake. But when he was in his iourney thitherwards, Hecatæus tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his armie, and prayed him rather to go helpe Antipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were beſieged in the citie of LAMIA. So Leonatus being willing to take ſea, & go thither, went about to perſwade Eumenes alſo to like of it, & to reconcile him with Hecatæus: for they were not friends one with another, by reaſon of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecatæus, about the gouernement of their citie. Beſides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto King Alexander, ſaying, that he was a tyrant, and beſought the King that it would pleaſe him to ſet the CARDIANS at libertie. And therefore Eumenes refuſing that iourney againſt the GRECIANS, alleaging that he was afrayd of Antipater, who had bene his enemie of long time, doubting that for the old grudge he bare him, Eumenes made Gouernour of the countries of Cappadocia & Paphlagonia.

and alſo to gratifie Hecataeus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then reuealed himſelfe and his purpoſe to him, and how he made as though he would paſſe ouer the ſea to aid Antipater, where indeed his meaning was to take the kingdome of MACEDON. Thereupon he ſhewed him letters ſent him from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of PELLA, and there ſhe would marrie him. When Eumenes was made priuie to his purpoſe: either becauſe he feared Antipater, or elſe for that he had no great good opinion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a fond man, and very raſh and vnconſtant in his doings, he ſtale away from him by night, with thoſe few men he had (being about three hundred horſemen, and two hundred footmen well armed) taking all his gold with him, which amounted to the ſumme of fiue thouſand talents, and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he bewrayed all Leonatus intent and mind: whereupon he was immediatly of great credite about him, and called to counſell. Shortly after Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he himſelfe did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken priſoner, and Eumenes eſtabliſhed Gouernor of the countrey, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his friends, and left them there Captaines of garriſons which he appointed, placing euery where, Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernours, and all ſuch other officers neceſſarie as he thought meete, Perdiccas medling with nothing at all. Notwithſtanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas againe, as well to waite vpon him, as alſo becauſe he would euer be about the kings. But Perdiccas thinking with himſelfe that he alone could well enough performe the enterpriſe he went about: and conſidering alſo that the realme he left behind him ſtood needfull of a wiſe and skilfull Gouernor, whom he might truſt with the ſafetie of his ſtate: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes backe againe, vnder colour to ſend him to his gouernement, but indeed to keepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined vpon the frontiers of his countrey whereof he was Gouernour, becauſe Neoptolemus did vnder-hand practiſe ſome alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a proud and inſolent perſon, yet Eumenes ſtill deuiſed to hold him in, and kept him from attempts by gentle and faire words. Furthermore, perceiuing alſo that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footmen were growne exceeding ſtout and inſolent: he for a ſtrength and defence againſt them, ſet vp a companie of horſemen, and to bring it to paſſe, releaſed all the countrimen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to ſerue on horſebacke, and brought a great number of horſe of ſeruice, which he gaue amongſt them that were about him, in which he put his moſt truſt and affiance, making them couragious, by honors and gifts he gaue to them that ſerued wel, and ſo by continuall exerciſe and often remouing them from place to place, made them very readie and ſeruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACEDON, ſome much amazed, ſome others very glad when they ſaw how by this diligence Eumenes had in ſo ſhort a time gotten about him ſuch a number, as ſixe thouſand three hundred horſemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus hauing ſubdued the GRECIANS, came on with their armie into ASIA to ouerthrow Perdiccas greatneſſe and power: and newes alſo, that ſhortly they would inuade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being otherwiſe occupied in warres, fighting againſt Ptolomy, made Eumenes his Lieutenant generall, and gaue him commiſſion and full authoritie ouer all his ſouldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA: and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the ſame that they ſhould be obedient vnto Eumenes, and ſuffer him to order all matters according to his diſcretion. Now for Alcetas, he flatly anſwered, that he would not be at this waire: for the MACEDONIANS vnder his charge were aſhamed to take armes againſt Antipater, and moreouer they would not fight againſt Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receiue him for their Captaine, ſo much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on the other ſide, was as readie to play the traitor, and to do Eumenes a ſhrewd turne, as Alcetas was. For being ſent by Eumenes to come to him, where he ſhould haue obeyed him, he ſet his men in battel ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the firſt frute of his wiſe foreſight of the horſemen, which he had ſet vp to make head againſt the footmen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footmen were broken and ouerthrowne, he ouercame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horſmen, and took all their cariage. Then he made the march in order of battell againſt the MACEDONIANS, who were diſperſed euery where, following the chaſe of his footmen, whō they had ouerthrowne. Thus coming vpon them in this diſorder, he draue them to throw away their weapons, and to yeeld vnto him: and moreouer, euery man to take his oath to ſerue him faithfully in this war, whereſoeuer he would leade them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater: who who ſent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their part, with condition that he ſhould not onely enioy the countries and prouinces ſtill which he had in gouernement, but furthermore that they would giue him others vnto them, and make him ſtronger then euer he was: beſides that by the acceptation of the offer, he ſhould be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made aunſwer: that hauing alwayes bene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a ſudden become his friend, ſpecially ſeeing him vſe his friends as enemies: howbeit otherwiſe that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to reſtore him againe to his fauour, vpon reaſonable and indifferent conditions. And furthermore, that if he meant to aſſaile him, that then he would aide him ſo long as he had any breath in his bodie, and would loſe his life before he would breake his promiſe. This aunſwer being brought vnto Antipater, they fell to conſult at leiſure what was to be done. In the meane ſpace, Neoptolemus that fled vpon his ouerthrow, was come vnto them: who told them how the battell was fought, and beſought them both very inſtantly (but Craterus chiefly) to giue him aide if it were poſſible. For the MACEDONIANS were ſo farre in loue with him, that if they did but ſee his hat, and heare him ſpeake, they would all arme themſelues and follow him. For to ſpeake a troth, Craterus was had in great eſtimation among the MACEDONIANS: in ſomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more deſired of the common ſouldiers, than any other Captaine, remembring how often he had for their ſakes incurred Alexanders diſgrace and diſpleaſure, becauſe he went about to perſwade him to leaue the king of PERSIAES maner, wherunto Alexander by litle and litle gaue himſelfe: and alſo for that he maintained and defended the cuſtomes of the countrey of MACEDON, the which euery man through pride and exceſſe began to forſake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus ſent Antipater into CILICIA, and he himſelfe with Neoptolemus, went againſt Eumenes with the beſt part of his army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether vnprouided, ſuppoſing he would giue himſelfe to pleaſure and paſtime, after ſo late a victorie. But Eumenes like a wiſe and vigilant Captaine had taken ſuch order, that he heard newes time inough of his enemies comming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readineſſe to reſiſt him. Yet was not this the chiefeſt point of his skill in warre: for he looked ſo preciſely to his doings, that he did not onely keepe his enemies from knowledge of any thing that he did, but making his men alſo to kill Craterus in battell, before they knew againſt whom they ſhould fight, and to keepe alſo ſo dreadfull an enemie from their knowledge: that of all others ſhewed the paſſing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his pollicy. Firſt, he made a rumour to be ſpred in his hoaſt, how Neoptolemus and Pigres were againe come againſt him, with certaine horſemen of all ſorts gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great deſire of ſleepe came vpon him, in the which he had a maruellous ſtraunge dreame. For it ſeemed vnto him that he ſaw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with another, either of them leading a battell of footemen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN faſhion: who comming to giue charge the one vpon the other, the goddeſſe Minerua came to aide the one, and Ceres likewiſe to aide the other. Then him thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerua aided was ouerthrowne, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to giue him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perſwaded himſelfe that this dreame made for him, and promiſed him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile countrey of corne, where was great plentie of it. For all the fields were ſowne with corne in euerie place, that it was a pleaſure to behold it, ſhewing the benefit of long peace, to ſee all the corne fields how greene they looked. But when he vnderſtood that the enemies had giuen their ſouldiers for the ſignall of battell, Minerua and Alexander: then was his firſt imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gaue Ceres and Alexander for ſignall of the battell to his ſouldiers, and commaunded euery man to make them a garland of wheate eares to weare on their heads, and that they ſhould wreath flowers and noſegayes about their pikes. He was in a mind many times to make his truſtieſt Captaines priuie againſt whom they ſhould fight, and not alone to truſt himſelfe withall, to keepe ſo neceſſary a thing as that ſecret: yet in fine, he kept his firſt reſolution, thinking it the ſafeſt way, not to commit this danger, but to himſelfe. Now when he came to giue battell, he would place neuer a MACEDONIAN directly againſt Craterus, but ſet two companies of men at armes that were ſtraungers againſt him, the which Pharnabazus (Artabazus ſonne) and Phœnix Tenidian did leade. Then he specially commaunded, that so soone as they saw the enemies before them, they should straight giue charge, giuing them no leisure to speake nor retire, neither to harken to any Herauld or trumpet that they should send vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne against him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for himselfe, he led the right wing of his battell, with a troupe of three hundred men at armes, the chiefest men of all his armie, where he should meete full with Neoptolemus front. When they had passed a litle hill that stood betweene both battels, Eumenes horsemen following his commaundement, ranne with full cariere to set vpon their enemies. Craterus seeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and cursed Neoptolemus that had deceiued him in that sort, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his side, if they might but once see him: notwithstanding, he prayed them that were about him, to shew themselues like valiant men that day, and therewithall fiercely set spurres to his horse to meete with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either side, and their staues being broken, they fell straight to their swords: but that day did not Craterus dishonour the memory of Alexander, for he slue many of his enemies round about him, valiantly repulsed them that did assaile him, and many times ouerthrew them. Yet in fine, one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him such a blow on the side, that he turned him off his horse, and when he was downe, many passed ouer him. But Gorgias, one of Eumenes Captaines knowing him, lighted from his horse, and appointed men about him to gard him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and euen in the verie pangs of death. Eumenes and Neoptolemus on the other side, which had bin mortall enemies of long time, being on fire with an old malice, they sought vp and downe the one for the other. And at the two first courses they could not one light vpon the other, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they set spurres to their horses, their swords drawne, and with great cries gaue charge vpon each other. And their horses met so fiercely together, as if two armed galleys had met with their prowes: and both the Captaines laying the bridles in their horse neckes, closed together, and with both hands striued to plucke off each others head-peece, & to rent their polrons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing each other, their horses ran from thē, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other fast as if they had wrestled together. Neoptolemus got vp first: but as he rose, Eumenes cut the ham of his legge, and raised himselfe vp withall. Neoptolemus staying himselfe vpon one knee, his other legge being very sore hurt, defended himselfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on his feete, but he could giue him no deadly wound: neuertheless himselfe had a blow on the necke, that layd him flat on the ground. Then Eumenes inflamed with choler against him, went about to strip him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious mood, remembred not that Neoptolemus had his sword yet, who hurt him vnder his curaces, euen about his groine, not farre from his priuie parts: howbeit the wound made Eumenes worse afraid, then there was cause of hurt, for that Neoptolemus strength was gone before the stroke came, dying presently vpon it. Eumenes hauing stripped him, found himselfe very ill (by reason of his wounds) on his armes and legges, which had many a sore gash: notwithstanding, he got vp on his horse againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies had bene fighting still. But there being told that Craterus had his deaths wound, he went straight to the place where he lay, and found him yet aliue, not past knowledge. Then Eumenes lighted from his horse, and wept, and taking him by the right hand, accursed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitifull state, and had also forced him to be in battell against one of his deerest friends, to make him the instrument of his vtter vndoing. This second battell Eumenes wanne ten dayes after the first battell obtained, which got him great honour, for that he had discomfited one of his enemies through wisedome, and the other by valiantnesse. But yet this bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his friends also that tooke his part, when they bethought them, that he being a straunger, had with the weapons and power of the MACEDONIANS themselues, slaine the greatest and most famous Captaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had bene so happie, as to haue liued and receiued the aduertisement of Craterus death: no doubt he had bene the greatest person of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill lucke would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was slaine in a mutinie of his men in EGYPT, newes came to his armie of Eumenes victorie, and also of the death of Craterus. Whereupon the MACEDONIANS were so offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to die, and gaue Antigonus and Antipater commission to execute the reuenge. When

Eumenes passing by mount Ida (where the king kept a race and breed of horses) had taken away with him as many horses as he would, and had sent letters of aduertisement thereof to the kings riders: Antipater, as it is reported, smiled, and in mockerie sayd, that he maruelled to see Eumenes great care, to thinke that he should either giue or receiue any account of the kings goods. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of LYDIA, especially neare vnto the chiefe city of SARDIS, because he was the stronger in horsmen, and for that he would make Cleopatra see the power of his armie. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into high PHRYGIA, and wintered in the city of CELÆNES. But there Polemon, Alcetas, and Docimus, fell in contention with him for leading of the army, saying, that they had as much right to leade the army as he. Eumenes aunswered them, Truly here is the common saying vp and downe: desperate men regard no danger. Now Eumenes hauing promised his souldiers pay within three dayes, to keepe his promise, sold them all the farmes and castels of that country, together with the men and beasts of the same, wherof the prouince was fully replenished. Thereupon his Lieutenants of the bands hauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of battery which he suffered them to cary with him: and hauing taken them, they went and deuided the spoile, paying euery souldier ratably his wages due. This deuise brought him againe in fauour among his souldiers. For certaine papers being found in his campe cast abroad by his enemies, promising great offices, and a hundred talents besides to any man that killed Eumenes: the MACEDONIANS that serued vnder him were so offended withall, that they presently set downe an order, that from that time forward a thousand of the best souldiers among them (which also had charge vnder them) should alwayes gard his person, keeping watch euery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Whereunto they all agreed: and Eumenes gaue them those honors and rewards, which the kings of MACEDON were wont to giue vnto their friends, and which they gladly receiued. For through their graunt he had authority to giue purple clokes and hats to whom he thought good, which was the honourablest gift the king of MACEDON could giue. It is true that prosperitie maketh simple men high minded, whereby they seeme (though they be not) very honorabe, but specially when fortune hath raised them to honor and wealth. But indeed he that is of a noble mind and stout courage, is best discerned in aduersity: for he neuer yeeldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he had lost a battell among the ORCYNIANS, in the realme of CAPPADOCIA, through the treason of one of his souldiers: he being pursued, yet neuer gaue the traytor any leisure to flie to his enemies for safety, but tooke him and trussed him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horse head vpon a sudde, & leauing his enemies side-hand of him that had him in chase, he closely stale by them without their knowledge, & held on iourneying so long, vntill he came to the selfe same plaine, where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies (the Captaines by themselues, and the souldiers apart) he burnt them with the doores, gates, and windowes of all the villages and townes thereabouts that he could get together: an in stead of tombes for them, he raised vp great heapes of earth. Insomuch as Antigonus comming thither immediatly after, he wondred much at his valiantnesse and inuincible courage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, and might easily without danger haue taken a number of prisoners, as well free as bond, and haue gotten all the riches and treasure which they had spoiled in so many sundry warres, townes, and countries: howbeit he was afraid that if his souldiers were loden with that spoile, it would make them more heauy to march, and vnable to flie, but specially more tender to abide to runne from place to place a long time together, being the onely meane wherein he trusted to come to end this warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be weary in following him so long a time, and therefore that he would turne some other way. Moreouer he perceiued that it was vnpossible for him by his authority to keepe the MACEDONIANS from taking so rich a prey, as offered it selfe vnto them: whereupon he commaunded them to stay a while, and baite their horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the enemies cariage. But in the meane time he secretly sent a messenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the cariage) to will him to flie with all speed out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a hill not farre from thence, and safe from horsemen, where they could not be enuironed, and there to fortifie himselfe: sending him word also, that he sent him this aduertisement, for the old friendship and acquaintance that had bene betweene them afore. Menander hearing what danger he was in, made his men trusse vp their cariage straight. Therupon Eumenes openly ſent certaine light armed men to diſcouer, and to bring him newes: and therewithall commaunded them to arme, and bridle their horſes, as if he had meant to haue led them againſt the enemies. His ſcouts were now returned, and told him that it was vnpoſſible either to diſtreſſe or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of ſuch ſtrength, and therefore he was not to be come by. Eumenes ſeemed to be very ſory for it, howbeit he led his army from thence notwithſtanding. Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, and the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, and after that loued him better then euer they did before: becauſe that hauing their children in his hands whom he might haue made ſlaues, and their wiues alſo whom he might haue defiled, he ſpared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humor, told thē, ye are deceiued, my friends: for it was not for your ſakes, nor yet to pleaſure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wiues, your children, and your goods, but onely for the feare he had to haue ſhackles on his heeles, to let him from ſpeedy flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled ſtill before Antigonus, and wandring vp and downe, did himſelfe wiſh his ſouldiers to get them ſomewhere elſe: either indeed for that he was carefull of them, or for that he was vnwilling to haue ſuch a number about him, being too few to fight a battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a ſtrong place of ſituation called NORA, in the confines of LYCAONIA and CAPPADOCIA, with fiue hundred horſmen, and two hundred footmen well armed. And when he was come thither alſo, he gaue euery one leaue to depart that aſked him licence, becauſe they could not haue abidden the diſcommodity of the place, which was very ſtraight, and the lacke of neceſſary victuals, which they muſt needs haue wanted, if the ſiege did continue long: and thus departed from them with very good words and louing countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the fort, but would not beſiege it, before he ſent for Eumenes to come to him vpon his word. Eumenes anſwered him, that Antigonus had many of his friends about him, that after him might come to be the heads of his tribe, and that himſelfe on the other ſide had not a noble man for whom he fought. And therefore if Antigonus would haue him come and ſpeake with him, that he ſhould ſend him one of his chiefeſt friends in hoſtage. Againe, Antigonus being earneſt with him, and telling him it was reaſon he ſhould come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power: Eumenes aunſwered him, I will acknowledge none better then my ſelfe, ſo long as I can hold my ſword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes requeſt) ſent his owne nephew Ptolomy into the fort, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both imbraced and ſaluted each other, as friends of old acquaintance and familiarity: and ſo fell in talke of diuerſe matters: but all this while Eumenes neuer once made requeſt to depart in ſafety, neither yet demanded pardon, but onely deſired the confirmation of his charge and gouernement, and that he might be reſtored to that which was giuen him. They that were preſent at that meeting maruelled much at Eumenes, and greatly commended his ſtoutneſſe. Now whileſt they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all parts of the campe, to ſee what maner of man Eumenes was: becauſe that after the death of Craterus there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN ſouldiers, of any Captaine, but of Eumenes. Neuertheleſſe, Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes ſome miſchiefe, commaunded them aloud to giue backe, and made ſtones to be throwne among them to keepe them off him. All this notwithſtanding he was faine in the end to put them off with his gard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much ado to deliuer him ſafely into his fort againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compaſſed this fort of NORA round about with a wall, and left a ſufficient number of men to continue the ſiege, and ſo went his way with the reſt of his army. In the meane time Eumenes remained beſieged within this fort, where there was plentie of wheate, water, and ſalt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor ſweete of taſte, to ſuſtaine them with their bread. Yet with ſuch as he had, he kept them in good liking that were in houſe with him. For he made them euery one after another ſit at his boord with him, and withall did faſhion out that manner of diet, with a certaine life and familiarity of pleaſant deuiſes to entertaine them at their meate. For beſides that he ſought to ſhew them as pleaſant a countenance as he could, yet naturally he had a ſweete faire face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had bene trained vp in it: but like a freſh youth, being of ſuch a conſtitution of body, that the excellenteſt workeman that euer was could not better ſet out all the parts and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be ſeene in him. His ſpeech was not harſh nor churliſh, but very mild, and pleaſant, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the ſiege, there was nothing that more more annoyed the beſieged, then the narrowneſſe of the fort wherein they were, which was not aboue two furlongs compaſſe about, and their houſes ſo litle and narrow, that they could ſcant turne them in them: and did eate and drinke without any manner of exerciſe for themſelues, or their horſe. Now Eumenes to take away the ſluggiſhneſſe that groweth by idleneſſe, a thing moſt hurtfull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines, to keepe them in breath, and to make them the lighter to flie, if occaſion were offered: put his men into the longeſt and wideſt hall he had in his houſe (being fourteene cubits long to walke vp and downe in) and taught them firſt of all to march faire and ſoftly, and then by litle and litle to haſten their pace: for the horſes he had, them he made to be girt before, one after another, & then did ſoftly triſe them vp with long pulleys faſtned to the beames: their hindmoſt part ſtanding on the ground, and their formoſt being aloft. The horſes being triſed vp in this maner, their riders came with loud cries behind them, and ſome with whips in their hands to laſh them, that the horſe being mad withall, yerked out behind, & ſprang forward with his formoſt legs to touch the ground, that they did but euen raſe it a litle, ſo as euery veine and ſinew of them were ſtrained by this meanes, that they blew, and were all of a ſome withall, ſo good an exerciſe to them it was, as well to put them in breath, as to keepe their legs ſupple to run. After that, they had their oats very cleane pickt and dreſſed, that they might digeſt them the ſooner. Antigonus hauing long continued this ſiege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in MACEDON, and that the realme was in a great broile, through the factions of Caſſander and Polyperchon. Antigonus whoſe head was ſtraight ful of great imaginations, greedily coueting with himſelfe the whole kingdom of MACEDON, thought good to make Eumenes his friend, that through his helpe he might attaine his deſired purpoſe. Thereupon he ſent Hyeronymus vnto him to treat of peace, and gaue him the forme of the oath which he would haue him ſweare vnto him. When Eumenes had ſeene it, he would not be ſworne in that manner, but corrected it, and ſayd: that he did referre himſelfe to the iudgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him beſieged, to iudge which of thoſe two formes was moſt meeteſt: that which Antigonus had ſent him, or the ſame which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of oath, there was a litle mention onely made at the beginning of the bloud royall, but in all the reſt following, he bound Eumenes particularly to himſelfe. But Eumenes in his forme of oath, did firſt of all put Olympias the mother of king Alexander, & the kings his ſonnes afterwards: and for the reſt, he ſware he would be friend of the friends, and enemy of the enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the kings, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the ſiege before NORA, did better like the forme of Eumenes oath, than they did that of Antigonus. So hauing giuen Eumenes his oath, and made him ſweare according to that forme, they raiſed their ſiege, and ſent alſo vnto Antigonus to take his oath. All this accompliſhed, Eumenes redeliuered the CAPPADOCIANS their hoſtages, (which he had kept in NORA with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their ſtead, horſe of warre, beaſts of cariage, tents and pauillions. Thus he began to gather his men againe together, which were diſperſed abroad after his ouerthrow, ſo that in few dayes he was aboue a thouſand horſemen, with whom he fled, fearing yet Antigonus, and he did wiſely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to ſhut him vp againe ſtraighter then he was before: but beſides that wrote ſharpe letters and very angrily vnto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the oath. Whileſt Eumenes wandred vp and downe flying ſtill, he receiued letters from certaine in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatneſſe) and ſpecially from Olympias: which ſent vnto him to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouernment of her young ſonne Alexander, whom they ſought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewiſe receiued letters from Polyperchon, and from king Philip, who commanded him to make war with Antigonus with his army he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his purſe of the kings fiue hundreth ſiluer talents (which had bene taken from him before) which were in the city of CYNDES: and beſides, to defray the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meete. And therewithall alſo they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyraſpides: to wit, the ſouldiers with the ſiluer ſhields, or ſhields ſiluered, which were of the old bands of Alexanders armie. Theſe two Captaines hauing receiued theſe letters, did vſe Eumenes with verie good words, and ſhewed him great countenance: yet a man by their lookes might eaſily coniecture that they enuied him, for either of them both thought themſelues men ſufficient, and worthie to commaund Eumenes, not to aide him. Howbeit Eumenes behaued himſelfe very wiſely: for as touching their enuy, he pacified that, becauſe he tooke not the mony which he was commanded to take for his owne vse, for that he had no need of it. And as for their ambition and presumption, disdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell how to command nor obey: he did reclaime them, by a superstition he layd before them, which was this. He made them beleeue that Alexander did appeare to him in his sleepe, and that he shewed him a pauillion sumptuously set out in the state and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and told him, that if they would keepe their councell place in that pauillion, he would be present among them, and aide them in all their counsels and conducts of their warres, so that they would alwayes begin by him. He easily perswaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleeue that which he spake, who would not go to him to consult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for himselfe to be seene to go to other mens gates. Wherefore with all their consents they incontinently set vp a goodly rich pauillion, which was called Alexanders pauillion: and there they kept their counsels & assemblies for dispatch of all their weightiest causes. After this, they went towards the high countries and met with Peucestas on the way (Eumenes very great friend) who ioyned with them, and other great peeres of the realme, with all their power besides. This did greatly strengthen the army of the noblemen of MACEDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armors and furniture: but for their owne persons, because they had no man to command them since the death of Alexander, they were growne selfe willed by dissolute liberty, and effeminate in their manner of life: and moreouer they had gotten a tyrannicall fiercenesse, nourished and increased by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with another, but shamefully flattered the old bands of the MACEDONIAN souldiers, giuing them money, and making them banquets and feasts of sacrifices. And thus in short time, of a campe they brought it to be a dissolute tauerne, where the noblemen got the souldiers fauour that they might be chosen chieftaines of all the army: like as the common peoples voyces are bought in free cities (where the people do rule) to be preferred to honourable states and offices of the common wealth. Now Eumenes found straight that these peeres of the realme disdained one another, howbeit that they all feared and mistrusted him, and sought but for oportunity to kill him. Wherefore to preuent this, he made as though he had occasion to occupy mony, and so borrowed a great summe of them specially, whom he knew most hated him: to the end that from thencefoorth they should no more distrust, but trust him, standing in feare to lose the mony they had lent him. And thereof followed a strange thing: for other mens money and goods, was the safety of his life. For where others giue money to saue their liues, he by taking of money saued his owne life. Now for the souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whilest they saw they were without danger of enemies to make them afraid, they still hung vpon them that gaue them, being desirous to be made Generals: and came euery morning to their vprising to waite vpon them, and follow them whersoeuer they went. But when Antigonus was come to campe hard by them with a great and puissant army, and that their case required then a valiant Captaine and skilfull leader: not the souldiers alone, but all the peeres and states besides (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) submit themselues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commaundement. For when Antigonus assayed all the wayes he could to passe ouer the riuer of Pasitigris, the peeres which were layed in diuerse places to let him from passing ouer, heard nothing of it, so that there was none but Eumenes onely that resisted him, and fought with him: where he slue such a number of his men, that he filled the riuer with them, and tooke foure thousand of them prisoners. Againe, when Eumenes was sicke, these old bands did more plainely shew what opinion they had of him, and of others: to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheare at their houses, yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthiest to be their Captaine, and to commaund them. For Peucestas hauing feasted them in the kingdome of PERSIA, and giuen euery souldier a mutton to sacrifice, thought he had won great fauor and credit among them. But shortly after, as the army marched against their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerously sicke, and therfore would needs be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noyse, because he could take no rest. But they had not gone farre, before they saw their enemies, which hauing passed ouer certaine litle hils betweene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the souldiers saw the glistering of the gilt armours of their enemies, that glared in the Sunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephants with the towers vpon their backes, and the men at armes with their purple coates vpon their armours (which was the apparell they they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the foremoſt ſtaid vpon it, and cried out, willing them to ſend for Eumenes to lead thē, for they would elſe go no further if they had not him for their Generall. And therewithall they raiſed their pikes, and laid downe their ſhields at their feet, calling from one to another to ſtay, and to their priuate Captaines alſo: and told them plainely, that they would not ſtirre a foot from thence, nor fight at all, vnleſſe Eumenes were among them to leade them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great ſpeed, haſtning his ſlaues and littermen to bring him thither: and then opening his litter on euery ſide, he held out his right hand to the ſouldiers, and told them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The ſouldiers alſo ſo ſoone as they ſaw him, ſaluted him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their ſhields, clapping them againſt their pikes with a great ſhout, bidding their enemies come when they would, they ſhould be fought withall, now that their Captaine was among them. Antigonus on the other ſide, being informed by certaine priſoners which his ſouldiers had taken in skirmiſh, that Eumenes was fallen very ſore ſicke, and by reaſon thereof was caried in a litter: thought now he ſhould haue no great ado to diſcomfit the reſt of the armie, and therefore made all poſſible ſpeed he could to fight. But when he came ſo neare, that he might eaſily ſee the order and countenance of his enemies, who were ſet in ſuch good order of battell, that it could not any waies be amended: he was much amazed withall, and pawſed a great while, and in the meane time ſpied Eumenes litter a farre off, caried from one end of the battell to the other, whereat he laughed out aloud, as his manner was, and turning himſelfe to his friends, ſaid: See, ſaid he, I beleeue it is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with thoſe wordes, he ſounded the retraite, and brought his men backe againe into his campe. Antigonus mocke to Eumenes.

When this feare was a litle paſſed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their old trade againe, the Peeres to flatter the ſouldiers, and the ſouldiers to waxe braue and ſtout againſt their Captaines: ſo that when they came to take their garriſons for the winter time, they deuided in maner among them the whole country of the GABENIANS, the firſt from the laſt being lodged almoſt a thouſand furlongs off. Which Antigonus vnderſtanding, determined to ſet vpon thē, they miſtruſting nothing: and ſo went ſodainly towards them, by a ſhorter way then that he had already come, but the worſer way a great deale, and where no water was to be had: in hope that if he met them thus diſperſed aſunder, their Captaines could not readily aſſemble them all together. But while he was in this his iourney, in the deſert crooked way, he was ſo ouertaken, with ſuch boiſterous winds and extreame bitter cold, that his ſouldiers could go no further, but were forced to tarie ſtill, to prouide them preſent remedie againſt the furie of the time. Now the onely remedie they had, was to make numbers of fires: and by them their enemies knew of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines, towards the deſert, being amazed to ſee ſuch a number of fires in the valley, ſent preſently with ſpeed vpon two camels light loden, to aduertiſe Peucestas, who being neareſt vnto the mountains was ſo ſcared with theſe newes, that he was at his wits end, not knowing what to do. For ſeeing his other companions as much afraid as himſelfe, he fled vpon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, aſſuring them that he would ſtay the ſodaine attempt of their enemies, and that they ſhould come three daies later then they looked for: which they beleeued. Then did Eumenes ſend meſſengers into euery quarter to all the Captaines, commaunding them ſpeedily to put their men in readineſſe, and to meet him at a certaine place which he appointed. Him ſelfe in the meane time went with other Captaines to chuſe a fit ground to lodge a campe, the which might eaſily be ſeene from the top of the mountaines, which they muſt paſſe that come from the deſert: and there fortified the ſame with trenches, and deuided it out into quarters, making fire in euery place, ſuch a diſtance off one from another, as they vſe commonly to make in a campe. It was no ſooner done, but Antigonus came to the top of the mountaines, and ſaw theſe fires a farre off, which grieued him much: for he thought that his enemies had long before knowne of his comming, and that they came againſt him. Being afraid therefore leaſt his enemies would compell him to fight, comming freſh vpon him, his owne men being wearie and done with the paines they had abidden, comming through that deſert countrey: he tooke his way to leade backe his armie, not the neareſt way by the which he came, but through the country richly inhabited and repleniſhed with great cities and good townes, to refreſh his ouer-wearied people. Yet ſeeing he had none alarmes giuen, nor any skirmiſhes offered him, (as they vſe commonly when both armies are neare together) and that the valley men told him that they Eumenes ſtratageme againſt Antigonus.

had ſeene none other armie but his, ſauing that round about there was ſtore of fires: then he ſtraight miſtruſted that it was one of Eumenes ſtratagemes of warre, wherewith he had deceiued him. And therewithall he was in ſuch a rage, that he went ſtraight to the place where he thought to find him, determining no more to ſteale vpon him, but to put all to the hazard of a battell. But in the meane time, the moſt part of the hoaſt was gathered about Eumenes, for the great eſtimation euery man had of his wiſedome and ſufficiencie: inſomuch that they agreed and ordained, that he onely as their Lieutenant generall ſhould commaund the whole armie. This ſpited the two Captaines of the ARGYRASPIDES, Antigenes and Teutamus, who bare him ſuch an inward grudge, that from that time forth, they practiſed his death: and aſſembling together with many of the States and particular Captaines, they ſate in counſell to know when, and in what ſort they ſhould kill him. Howbeit the moſt voices aſſembled in this counſell, were whole of opinion, that they ſhould take the benefite of his ſeruice in leading the battell, and that immediatly after they ſhould put him to death. This being thus reſolued vpon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and another called Phædimus, went ſecretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded vpon in the aſſembly againſt him, not for any goodwill that they bare him, or for that they ſought to pleaſure him, but onely becauſe they were afraid to loſe the money they had lent him. Eumenes gaue them great thankes, and commended their fidelitie, and then reported it vnto his beſt friends, & told them: You ſee how I am enuironed with a troupe of wild and brutiſh beaſts. That done, he made his will, and tare all the letters and writings that had bene ſent him, becauſe he would not haue them ſuffer for him after his death, that had ſent him ſecret aduertiſements. Afterwards when he had diſpoſed of all his priuate matters in this ſort, he ſtood in a doubt whether he ſhould loſe the battell, giuing his enemies the victorie, or whether it were better for him to flie into CAPPADOCIA, through MEDIA and ARMENIA. Howbeit he reſolued of nothing before his friends. But when the miſchiefe he was in had put diuers thoughts into his head, in fine, he determined to fight, and did ſet his army in battell ray, perſwading the GRECIANS as well as the barbarous people to ſtand to it like men. And as for the old ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, they ſo litle needed exhortation, that they themſelues did exhort Eumenes to be of good courage, ſaying: that their enemies would neuer abide them, becauſe they were all the oldeſt ſoldiers, and of greateſt experience that had bene in all the conqueſts of king Philip, and of his ſonne Alexander, and that it was neuer heard that they dad bene ouerthrowne in any ſet battell, the moſt of them being threeſcore and ten yeares old, and the youngeſt no leſſe then threeſcore. Whereupon, when they ran with great furie to giue charge vpon their enemies, they cryed out aloude ſpeaking to the ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS that were vnder Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your fathers? And ſo aſſailing them with a luſty courage, and in a rage withall, in a ſhort ſpace ouerthrew the ſquadron of their enemies, and ſlue the moſt part of them in the field. Thus was Antigonus armie cleane ouerthrowne on that ſide: but on the other ſide where his men of armes were, through Peuceſtas cowardlineſſe (that handled himſelf very ill at that battell) he had the vpper hand, and wanne all their cariage, through his foreſight in the greateſt fury of the battell, and the ſtrength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a maruellous great plaine of length, neither too deepe, nor yet too hard vnder foote, but couered ouer with a ſmall fine ſand, much like to the drie ſand the ſea caſteth vp, and leaueth vpon the ſhore. This ſand being ſcattered abroad by riding and going too and fro of ſo many thouſands of men and horſes during the time of the battell foughten, had raiſed ſuch a mighty duſt and white ſmoke in the element, as if they had ſtirred or tempered white lime together, which troubled their ſight ſo ſore, as they could ſee nothing before them: in reſpect whereof Antigonus might eaſily ſeize all their cariage, themſelues being neuer a whit the wiſer. The battell being come to this paſſe you haue heard, Teutamus ſent preſently vnto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage again, which he had taken and caried into his campe. Antigonus made him anſwer, that he would not onely redeliuer the goods vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreouer vſe them with all the fauour he could, ſo farfoorth as they deliuered Eumenes into his hands. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES took preſently a wicked reſolution, to deliuer him aliue into the hands of his enemies. And with that determination they came neare vnto him, not making any countenance as though they would lay hands on him, but rather ſeeming to guard and defend his perſon, as their maner was: ſome of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had won the battell: and others accuſing the noblemen of cowardlines, ſaying, that the

the fault was in them that they had not the whole victorie. But in fine, one of them hauing ſpied his time, flew to him, and tooke his ſword out of his hand: the others ſtraight laid hold of him, and bound both his hands behind him with his owne girdle. Antigonus vnderſtanding it, ſent Nicanor thither to take him out of their hands, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes hauing made requeſt vnto them to ſuffer him to ſpeake, as they brought him through the bands of theſe old MACEDONIAN ſouldiers: it was graunted him with condition, that he ſhould make no motion vnto them to turn from that they were determinated to do, but to tell them of things, which (as he ſaid) tended greatly to their benefite. Whereupon ſilence being made, he got vp vpon a litle hillocke, and there ſpake vnto them, putting foorth his hands being bound. O wretched and faithleſſe men, the wickedeſt that euer MACEDON bred! What ſo great triumph or victorie, hath euer Antigonus wonne of you, hauing ſought it ſuch infinite wayes: as you your ſelues do now put into his hands, deliuering him your Captaine bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great ſhame, that being maiſters of the field, you will grant the honour of the victorie vnto your enemie, only for a litle couetouſneſſe of money and paltrie ſtuffe which you haue loſt? And yet is not this all, but the worſt behind: to ſend your Captaine as you do to pay the ranſome of your baggage. For my ſelf, though now they leade me bound, yet do I remain free vnouercome, vanquither of mine enemies, and ſold by them that ſhould be my friends. Well, yet this requeſt I only make vnto you, in the name of Iupiter, protector of armes, and for the honour of the gods, (vnto whom all vowed othes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray and coniure you, to kill me your ſelues in this place. For all commeth to one end. To be ſlaine in Antigonus campe by the hands of mine owne enemies, will euer be counted your deed: and you may be aſſured he will not be angry withall, for he onely deſireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needs hold your hands from this attempt, vnlooſe yet one of mine only: that ſhall ſuffice to do the feate. And if for feare ye will not put a ſword in my hand, throw me bound yet hands and feet vnto wild beaſts: which if ye performe, then do I diſcharge you of your oth taken between both my hands, which ye haue ſworne vnto your Captaine, as holily and perfectly performed. Vpon this ſpeech of Eumenes, all the reſt of the army had compaſſion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the ARGYRASPIDES cried out to carie him away, and not to giue care to his preaching: and that it was a good deed to puniſh this wicked CHOERRONESIAN, according to his deſerts, conſidering that he had turmoyled the MACEDONIANS with endleſſe war and battell. And moreouer, that it were too much ſhame that the worthieſt ſouldiers that euer ſerued king Philip and Alexander, ſo painefully in all their warres, ſhould for recompence of their ſeruice in their old age be turned a begging, their wiues hauing now lien three nights with their enemies. With thoſe words, they violently draue him on towards Antigonus campe, who fearing leſt the multitude of people that ranne to ſee him, would ſmoother him in the preaſe, becauſe euery man ranne out of the campe: he ſent thither ten of the ſtrongeſt Elephants he had, and a good number of men at armes of the MEDES and PARTHIANS, to make way for him in the preaſe. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus campe, his heart would not ſerue him to ſee him in that miſerable ſtate, for that they had once bene familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, ſuch as had him in their cuſtodie, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would haue him kept: who anſwered them: Like a Lion or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pitie of him, and diſcharged him of his waightieſt irons, and ſent one of his houſhold ſeruants to him to ſee him well vſed, and ſuffered his friends to come and bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus deferre many dayes before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing euery man ſpeake, and pondering their purpoſes and ſeuerall opinions. Nearchus CRETAN, and his owne ſonne Demetrius ſpake for Eumenes, and made ſute to ſaue his life, contrarie to all the other Lords and Captaines that were about Antigonus, who would in any caſe haue him die. Eumenes ſtanding in theſe termes, asked his keeper Onomarchus one day what Antigonus meant, that hauing his enemy in his hands, he did not quickly rid him out of his paine, or nobly deliuer him? Onomarchus churliſhly anſwered him againe, that the time was paſt now to ſhew his courage, as though he feared not death: and that he ſhould haue ſhewed it in the field at the battell. So helpe me Iupiter (quoth he) ſo haue I done, and if thou beleeueſt not me, aske them that ſet vpon me: for I neuer met with man yet more ſtrong then my ſelfe. Onomarchus replyed again: ſith now therfore thou haſt found a ſtrōger then thy ſelf, why then canſt thou not abide his pleaſure? In fine, when Antigonus had reſolued of his death, he commanded them to giue him no more meate: and thus taking his ſuſtenance from him, Eumenes was three dayes a dying. In the meane time came ſuch newes, that ſodainly the campe remoued: and therefore before their departure, a man was ſent to Eumenes to diſpatch him out of his paine. Antigonus licenced his friends to take his body and burne it, and then to gather his aſhes and bones to ſend them to his wife and children. Eumenes being ſlaine in this maner, the gods appointed none other iudges to reuenge the diſloyaltie and treaſon of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Captain, for betraying of Eumenes, but Antigonus ſelf: who deteſting them as cruell murtherers, and periured perſons to the gods, appointed Ibyrtius Gouernour of the prouince of ARACHOSIA, to kill them euery mothers ſon what way he could, that none of them might euer ſee MACEDON againe, nor the Greekiſh ſea.

THE COMPARISON OF Eumenes with Sertorius.

HEre haue we ſet downe the things worthie memorie of Eumenes and Sertorius. Now to compare them together, in this they were both alike: that they being ſtrangers in a ſtraunge countrie, and baniſhed out of their owne, had alwaies bene Captaines of diuers nations, and chieftaines of great and warlike armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all thoſe of his faction gaue him the chiefeſt place of authoritie, as the moſt ſufficienteſt man among them, and worthieſt to commaund: where Eumenes hauing many that contended againſt him for the chief rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the ſame. So that they obeyed the one, deſiring to be gouerned by a good Captaine: and for their owne ſafetie gaue place to the other, ſeeing themſelues vnable to commaund. For Sertorius being a ROMAINE, gouerned the SPANIARDS and LVSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHOERRONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which the SPANIARDS of long time had bene ſubiect to the Empire of ROME: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had ſubdued all the world. Furthermore, Sertorius being then of great eſtimation, for that he was a Senator of ROME, and had had charge of men of warre before, came to the dignity and eſtate to be chieftaine of a great army. Where Eumenes came with ſmall reputation, diſdained for that he was but a Secretarie: and when he began to come forwards, had not only leſſe means to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets and impediments alſo, to hinder his riſing and eſtimation. For many openly ſtood againſt him, and ſecretly conſpired his death: and not as Sertorius, whome no man contraried from the beginning, vntill his latter end, when certaine of his companions ſecretly conſpired againſt him. Therefore Sertorius end of all his dangers, was to ouercome his enemies: where Eumenes greateſt dangers came through his victories which he wan of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuied his honor. Now for their deeds of armes, they are both in maner alike: but on the other ſide for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention: and Sertorius imbraced peace and quietneſſe. For, Eumenes that that might haue liued in safetie with honor, if he would but haue giuen place to his betters, and forsaken the warres: liked better with the daunger of his life to follow martiall feates, with the greatest personages of MACEDON, and in the end so came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the safetie of his person to take armes against them, that would not let him liue in peace. For had not Eumenes bene so ambitious and stout to striue against Antigonus for the chiefest place of authoritie, but could haue bene contented with the second, Antigonus would haue bene right glad thereof: where Pompey would neuer so much as suffer Sertorius to liue in rest. So the one made voluntarie warre onely to rule, and the other against his will was compelled to rule, because they made wars with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferring the couetous desire of a better estate, aboue the safetie of his life: and the other as a right souldier, vsed the warres onely for a meane to saue his life by valiant defence of armes. Furthermore, the one was slaine, mistrusting no treason against him: and the other, looking euery houre for present death threatned him. Whereof the one argued a noble mind, not to mistrust them whom he thought his friends: and the other shewed a faint heart, being taken when he meant to flie. So Sertorius death dishonoured not his life, suffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him suffer. The other hauing no power to auoid his destinie before he was taken, and hauing sought meanes to liue being in prison and captiuitie: could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For begging life at his enemies hands, he gaue him his heart with his bodie, who before had but his bodie in his power. The end of Eumenes life.

Sertorius death more honest, then the death of Eumenes.

THE LIFE OF Agesilaus.

ARchidamus the sonne of Zeuxidamus, hauing honorably raigned in LACEDÆMON, left two sons behind him: Agis which he begat of that noble Ladie Lampridо, and Agesilaus a great deale younger, which he had by Eupolia, Melisippidas daughter. So the kingdom falling by succession vnto Agis the elder, the younger son Agesilaus remaining a priuate person, was brought vp after the LACONIAN maner, which was a straight kind of life: but withall it taught children how to obey. Whereof it is thought the Poet Simonides calleth SPARTA, Damasimbrotos: to wit, making men ciuil: for that by continuance of custom, it frameth the citizens to be obedient to the lawes, as much or more thē any other city that euer was in the world taming thē from their childhood, as they do yong colts. The law dispenseth with the heires apparant to the crowne, frō that streight subiection & hard life: but Agesilaus had that excellency in him aboue all others of his eſtate, that he came to the dignitie and honour to commaund, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which vndoubtedly was the cauſe, that he knew better then any other king, how to pleaſe and beare with his ſubiects, helping his royall ſtate and princely behauiour grafted in him by nature, with that courteſie and familiaritie, which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lyſander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modeſty of his wit. For hauing better ſpirit, and being more conſtant in his opinion, then any of the other children, ſtriuing euer to excell in all things, with ſuch a vehemency he tooke all trauels in hand, that it was vnpoſſible to ouercome him, much leſſe to compell him. He was on the other ſide ſo mild and gentle, that euery courteous word wrought in him better obedience, then any feare could do: becauſe it grieued him more to be reproued, then to take vpon him any paine or labour. And for the deformitie of his legges, the one being ſhorter then the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleaſant wit, he vſed the matter ſo pleaſantly and patiently, that he would merily mocke himſelfe: which manner of merie behauiour did greatly hide the blame of the blemiſh. Yea further, his life and courage was the more commendable in him, for that men ſaw that notwithſtanding his lameneſſe, he refuſed no paines nor labour. Of his perſon we haue drawne no counterfeit, becauſe he would not in any wiſe haue it drawne, and did expreſly commaund by his will, that they ſhould neither draw his picture nor make any mould or image of his bodie. Howbeit we find that he was ſmall of ſtature, whereby his preſence promiſed no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was euer merie and pleaſant, and neuer penſiue nor troubleſome in word nor looke, euen to the laſt end of his life he was better loued, then the moſt faire creature that liued. Notwithſtanding, the Ephori (as Theophraſtus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a ſum of money becauſe he maried a litle woman: ſaying that he would beget them demy kings, no kings indeed. In the time that his eldeſt ſonne Agis raigned king, Alcibiades being baniſhed Athens, fled out of Sicile into Lacedæmon, and had not long remained in Sparta before they ſuſpected him that he kept king Agis wife, called Timæa: for which cauſe Agis would not acknowledge the child ſhe brought to be his ſonne, ſaying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Timæa cared not much for it, as Duris writeth: for otherwhile as ſhe ſate amongſt her women, ſoftly ſhe called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On the other ſide they report, that Alcibiades himſelfe ſaid, it was for no hurt he meant to any man, that he lay with Queene Timæa, but onely for the deſire he had that ſome of the kings of Lacedæmon ſhould be begotten of his ſeede. Neuertheleſſe at the length he was driuen to forſake Lacedæmon, miſtruſting king Agis, who euer after doubted of the child, and thought him a baſtard: vntill ſuch time as being on his death bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and ſo behaued himſelfe, that Agis before many witneſſes, ſaid he did acknowledge him for his ſonne. This notwithſtanding, when king Agis was dead, Lyſander that had then ouercome the Athenians by ſea, and was more in credit and authoritie in the citie of Sparta, then any other: practiſed to put the crowne vpon Ageſilaus head, ſaying, that Leotychides had no intereſt vnto it, becauſe he was a baſtard. The like did diuers other citizens ſay of him, which loued Ageſilaus vertue, and liked him paſſingly; for that he had bene brought vp from his childhood among them. But on the contrarie part alſo, there was a Soothſayer or wiſard in Sparta called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, and was accounted a very skilfull man touching prophecies and diuinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Sparta: and for proofe thereof he told this ancient oracle before the counſell.

Alcibiades committeth adulterie with king Agis wife.

Ageſilaus lameneſſe.

Ageſilaus created king, through Lyſanders meanes.

A lame king.

As ſtately as thy ſtomacke is, o Sparta take good heed,
And ſtand vpon thy guard, and looke about thee, I theereed.
For halting one day downe will caſt thine Empire to the ground,
By meane of warres and troubles great that ſhall incloſe thee round.

Lyſander replyed againſt it, ſaying, that if the Spartans were afraid of this oracle, they ſhould rather beware of Leotychides. For the gods cared not, if any man lame of a foot aſpired to be king: but rather if he were a baſtard, and not lineally deſcended of the race of Hercules. For that, ſaid he, were to make the kingdome halt. Ageſilaus furthermore alleaged, that the god Neptune himſelfe had witneſſed, that Leotychides was a baſtard: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wiues chamber, and that ten moneths after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So was Ageſilaus vpon theſe allegations not onely proclaimed king of Sparta, but he had giuen him him moreouer, as lawfull heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiected as a baſtard. Notwithſtanding, conſidering that his parents by his mothers ſide were very poore, (yet honeſt men) he left them the moytie of all the goods: by which act, Ageſilaus wonne all their good willes, where elſe they had enuied him for his ſucceſſion in the kingdome. And (as Xenophon ſaith) by obeying his countrey, he grew to ſuch power that he might do whatſoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senatours at that time bare all the ſway and gouernment of the Commonwealth, the Ephores office chaunging yearely, the other being for life: the which Ephori were onely ordained to bridle the inſolencie of the kings, for that they ſhould not (as we haue more amply written in Lycurgus life) haue abſolute power in their hands. Vpon this occaſion, the kings that ſucceeded in the gouernement, had (as it were) by inheritance, a preſent grudge and malice againſt them. This notwithſtanding, Ageſilaus tooke a contrarie courſe to all his predeceſſors. For where others preſently quarrelled with the Ephori and Senatours, Ageſilaus did honour and reuerence them, and would neuer diſpatch any matter without their priuity, but was alwaies readie to go when they did ſend him. When he was ſet in his chaire of ſtate to giue audience, if any of the Ephori chaunced to come in, he would riſe vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senatour, he would for honours ſake preſent him a gowne and an oxe. And thus cunningly ſeeming to honor and increaſe the dignity of the Senators, winning their goodwils, he made his power great, and the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behauior towards the reſt of his countrimen was ſuch, as his enmitie was leſſe faultie then his friendſhip. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iuſt cauſe, but he aided his friends euen in vniuſt cauſes. And wheras he thought it a ſhame not to honor his enemies, when they had done well: he could not find in his hart to rebuke his friends when they did amiſſe, but rather gloried in ſuccoring & helping of thē in their euil doings. For he thought it no ſhame to ſerue his friends turne, howſoeuer it were. Againe, when any of his aduerſaries offended, he was as ſory for it as any man, and as readie to beare with it if he were intreated: whereby he allured and wan the hearts of all men. The Ephori ſeeing that, and fearing his power, puniſhed him in money, for that he made the cōmon loue of his country priuate to himſelfe. For as naturall Philoſophers hold opinion, that if contention and ſtrife were taken out of nature, it would come to paſſe that the heauenly bodies ſhould ſtand ſtill, and alſo that the generation of all things ſhould be at a ſtay, by reaſon of the mutuall agreement betweene the world and them: euen ſo, the law-maker of LACEDÆMON ſeemeth to haue allowed ambition and ſtrife in the cōmonwealth, as a ſpur to vertue by procuring alwaies ſome contention and emulation among great perſons. And his reaſon was, that this baſe and effeminate fauour, in winking one at another when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of concord. And ſure ſome thinke that Homer alſo ſaw the ſame, for he would neuer elſe haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to ſee Vlyſſes & Achilles at great words together, if he had not bene of opinion, that enuy and contention among great men, were very auaileable for the commonwealth. Yet is not this thus ſimply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent: and do bring great dangers with them. Now when Ageſilaus was entred into his kingdome of LACEDÆMON, newes were brought him out of ASIA, that the king of PERSIA prepared a great nauie to conquer the LACEDÆMONIANS ſigniorie by ſea. Lyſander being glad of this occaſion, longing to be ſent againe into ASIA to ſuccour his friends whom he left there as gouernors and Lieutenants of cities and prouinces (of the which, ſome of them were driuen away by their citizens, others alſo put to death for abuſing of their authority & ruling ouer cruelly:) perſwaded Ageſilaus to go into ASIA, to make war vpon this barbarous king, far from GREECE, before his army were gathered together. And to cōpaſſe this the eaſilier, he wrote vnto his friends in ASIA that they ſhould ſend vnto SPARTA to require Ageſilaus for their Captaine, and ſo they did. Therupon Ageſilaus going to the aſſembly of the people accepted the charge, with condition that they would giue him thirtie Captaines of the SPARTANS to be counſellers & aſſiſtants to him in theſe wars, two thouſand free ILOTES, and 6000 of the confederates of LACEDÆMON. All this was immediatly granted through Lyſanders friendſhip towards him, and he was ſent away ſtraight with the thirtie Captaines which he had requeſted: of the which Lyſander was the chiefeſt, not onely for his riches and authoritie, but alſo for the good will he bare vnto Ageſilaus: who thought himſelfe more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, then for his friendſhip he ſhewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Ageſilaus army being aſſembled at the hauen of Gereſtæ, himſelf with certain of his friends went vnto

the citie of AVLIDE, where in his sleepe he dreamed that one said vnto him: O king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou knowest that neuer none but Agamemnon, and now thy selfe, was chosen generall of all GREECE, considering therfore that thou commandest the same people he did, that thou makest warres with the selfe same enemies, departing from the selfe same place to go thither, it is reason that thou make the selfe same sacrifice vnto the goddesse, the which he made at his like departure. Agesilaus straight vpon this vision, remembred that Agamemnon through the perswasion of the Soothsayers did sacrifice his owne daughter in the same place. Yet this made him not afraid, but the next day he told it to his friends, and said he would sacrifice that vnto the goddesse, which he thought would please her well enough, and that he would not follow that cruell deuotion of this auncient Captaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a hind crowned with a garland of flowers, and commanded his Soothsayer to sacrifice her: and would not suffer him to haue the honour to do the sacrifice that was appointed for the same purpose by the Gouernours of BOEOTIA, according to the custome of that place. The Gouernours of BOEOTIA vnderstanding it, were much offended, and sent their officers to will Agesilaus not to do any sacrifice there, contrarie to the law and custome of their countrey. The officers that were sent, performed their commission: and finding that the beast was slaine, and the quarters of it vpon the altar, they tooke and flung them off the altar euery way. This vexed Agesilaus being readie to imbarke, and departed thence in choler against the THEBANS, and mistrusted much his good successe by this vnluckie prediction, which seemed to prognosticate vnto him, that he should not preuaile according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arriued at EPHESVS, he presently misliked the honor he saw done vnto Lysander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the countrimen there repaired continually to his house, and when he came abroad, they all followed him whersoeuer he went: as though Lysander had indeed bene in authoritie to do what he would, and that Agesilaus only had but the name to be generall, so appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in truth there was neuer GRECIAN Captaine in those parts that had won him such estimation, nor that was more feared then he: nor there was neuer man that was more beneficiall to his friends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these things being fresh in memorie, the country men of that country perceiuing the simplicity of Agesilaus, & how he was giuen to please the people, and caried no great maiestie nor countenance with him, and obseruing in Lysander that wonted roughnesse and sharpe speech wherewith they had bene acquainted before: euery man obeyed him, & nothing was done but what he commanded. This first of all made the other SPARTANS angry, for that it appeared they were come as it were to serue Lysander, and not as to counsell the king: but after that, Agesilaus himselfe also grew misContented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious nor sorie to see others honoured besides himselfe. Yet being a man ambitiously giuen, and of a noble courage, fearing if he should do any noble exploit in this war, that they would impute it vnto Lysander, for the great estimation he was of: he began to deale in this sort with him. First he contraried all his counsels: and what matters soeuer he preferred, which he was desirous shold haue taken effect, Agesilaus would none of that, but tooke some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lysanders followers came to make sute to him for his fauor, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lysander: he sent them away without any thing done for them. In like case also in matters of iudgements, if Lysander were against any, they were sure to haue the matter passe on their side. On the contrarie part also, if Lysander bare goodwill to the partie, and fauored the cause to gratifie him: they hardly escaped ho setting a fine on their heads, Agesilaus continuing these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chance to one or two, but indifferetly to al: Lysander looking into the cause, dissembled not with his friends, but told them plainly, that it was for his sake they had those repulses and wrongs, and therfore did counsell the to wait vpon the king, & those that had more credit then himself. Now Agesilaus supposed he gaue that aduice to make euery man to malice him: wherefore, to despite him the more, he made him distributer of his victuals: & hauing done so, some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: now let them go and honor my flesh distributer. Lysander being grieued withall, said vnto the king: my Lord, you know how to oppresse your friends. And so do I, said Agesilaus, how to keepe them vnder, that would be greater then my selfe. It may be yet (replyed Lysander) I haue not done as your Grace doth say: yet if you so conceiue of me, put me I beseech you in some place of charge or office, where I may do you good seruice without offence. After this talke betweene them, Agesilaus sent him into HELLESPONT, where by

by practise he tooke prisoner a nobleman a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of Pharnabazus prouince whereof he was gouernor, and brought him to Agesilaus with a great sum of gold and siluer, and neare about two hundred horsemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgate not his grudge to Agesilaus, but being offended stil, sought oportunitie and means to defeat the two houses of the priuiledge of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and surely he had made great broile (in my opinion) in the citie of SPARTA, had he not bene preuented by death, in a iourney he made into BOEOTIA. Thus we see, that ambitious minds obseruing no meane, are in a commonweale oft times more hurtfull, then beneficial. For though Lysander was indeed intollerable, to shew himselfe so ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Agesilaus ignorant neither, that there were diuerse other meanes lesse reprochfull to punish such a nobleman, that offended only by greedinesse of honour. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfe passion: the one not to know his Princes power, & the other not to beare with his friends imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afraid of Agesilaus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderstand that the king would be content to set the cities of GREECE in ASIA at libertie. Notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed war. Agesilaus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through all GREECE, that he would do some noble exploit in this iourney. Moreouer he thought himself dishonored for euer, that the ten thousand GRECIANS which were returned backe from the farthest part of ASIA, euen vnto the sea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Captaine) had ouercome the king of PERSIAES army as oft as they listed themselues: and that he which was the Lieutenant generall of the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at that time commanded both sea and land) should not do some deed worthy memorie among the GRECIANS. Presently therefore to reuenge Tisaphernes periurie by iust deceipt, he made a countenance as though he would first inuade the countrie of CARIA. Whereupon, this barbarous person Tisaphernes, gathered all his power together. But Agesilaus on a sodaine returned backe againe, and entred into PHRYGIA, tooke there many cities, and wan great spoile, making his men see by experience, that to infringe and break a league made and auowed by oath, was a sacriledge, and contemning of the gods. On the other side also, that to beguile his enemies, it was not only iust and honorable, but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agesilaus being weaker in horsemen then his enemie, and finding the liuers of the beasts which he had sacrificed, without heads, returned into the city of EPHESVS, and there gathered horsemen together, letting the rich men vnderstand (which would not themselues serue in person) that he did dispence with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for seruice in their place. Many of them tooke that course, & by this means Agesilaus within few daies had leauied a great number of men at armes, in stead of footmen that could do small seruice. For they that were vnwilling to go to the wars, did hire them that were willing to serue in their place: and such also as would not serue a horseback, did giue them pay that were desirous to serue in their steades. In this he wisely followed king Agamemnons example, who did dispence with the person of a rich coward for going to the warres, by taking a good mare of him. Then Agesilaus commanded them that sold the prisoners by the drum taken in the warres, that they should strip them naked, and so sell them, which they did. And sundry persons willingly bought their spoiles and rayment, but they scorned their bodies, because they saw them white skinned, soft and delicate: so that few men would out-bid the price for them, for that they thought those men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Agesilaus also being present at this sale of purpose, said thus vnto his men: See, my friends, quoth he: these be the men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoiles for the which ye shall fight. Time being come now to put himselfe into the field, and to inuade his enemies countrey againe, he gaue it out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceiue Tisaphernes againe, but Tisaphernes deceiued himselfe. For he being deceiued before by Agesilaus, gaue no credit to this second rumor, but perswaded himselfe that doubtlesse Agesilaus meant then to enter into CARIA, & the rather for that it was a woody country, very ill for horsemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agesilaus inuading (as he had giuen it out) the champion country, in the which stood SARDIS, the capitall city of LYDIA: Tisaphernes was cõpelled to come to rescue it in hast, & being come thither with great speed with his horsemen, he stale vpõ many of his enemies whõ he found straggling out of order, spoiling the country, and put the most of them to the sword. Agesilaus hauing intelligence of this, imagined with himselfe that the footmen of his enemie could not yet be arriued, and considering also that he had his army whole about him: thought it best foorthwith to bid him battell, rather then to delay time any longer. Thereupon he thrust in among the horsemen his light armed footmen, and commanded them straight to charge the enemy, whilst he caused the heauier armed men to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled vpon it immediatly: & the GRECIANS lustily following the chase, tooke their campe, and made great slaughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leysure enough not only to spoile & ouerrun the kings country at their pleasure, but also to see the reuenge taken of Tisaphernes, that was a vile man, & a cruel enemie to the GRECIANS. For the king of PERSIA made another his Lieutenant immediatly in his roome, called Tithraustes: who strake off Tisaphernes head, and sent vnto Agesilaus to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him store of gold & siluer to depart out of his country. Thereto Agesilaus answered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that for his owne part, it was an easier matter to enrich his souldiers, then himselfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it dishonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then spoiles. This notwithstanding, to gratifie Tithraustes somewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS: for the sum of thirty talents giuen him to defray his charges, he withdrew his armie out of LYDIA, and went into PHRYGIA. In his iorney he receiued from the councel of LACEDÆMON, the Scytala, or scrole of parchment wreathed about, aduertising him that the citizens had made him also their Generall by sea, as he was by land. Agesilaus only of all men obtained this honor, who without comparison was of all other the worthiest man of fame in his time, as Theopompus witnesseth: and yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, then for the greatnesse of his authority. In this notwithstanding he was to be blamed, when he made choise of one Pisander his wiues brother, to be Lieutenant of the nauy, and forsooke other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: seeking rather to please his wife, and to aduance one of his kinne, then to regard the weale and safetie of his country. Afterwards he led his army into Pharnabazus countrey which he had in charge, where he found not onely plenty of all sorts of victuals, but gathered together also a wonderfull masse of mony. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with king Cotys: who for his vertue and constant fidelity, was very desirous of his friendship. The like did Spithridates, forsaking Pharnabazus, and came vnto Agesilaus: & after he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwaies followed him whersoeuer he went. Spithridates had a yong son that was passing faire, called Megabetes, (of whom Agesilaus had great liking) and likewise a faire young woman to his daughter, of age to be maried, whom Agesilaus caused king Cotys to marrie. So taking of king Cotys a thousand horsemen, and two thousand footmen light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there destroyed Pharnabazus countrey which he had in gouernment, who durst not meete him in the field, nor trust to his holds, but still fled from him, carying all his chiefest things with him, flitting from place to place: vntill that Spithridates accompanied with Erippidas the SPARTAN, followed him so neare, that he tooke his campe, and all his treasure in it. But there did Erippidas shew himselfe so hard and cruell, ouer straightly searching out part of the spoile that had bene imbeazled, compelling the barbarous people to deliuer it againe, ransacking euery corner for it: that Spithridates was so offended withall, that on a sodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went backe vnto the city of SARDIS. This more grieued Agesilaus then any thing that happened to him in all his iourney: for that he had lost so valiant a man as Spithridates, and such a number of good souldiers as he caried away with him. Moreouer, he was afraid lest they would detect him of miserable couetousnes, a thing which he euer was carefull to auoid, not onely in his owne person, but also to keepe all his countrimen from it. But besides these knowne causes, the loue he bare to Spithridates son pinched him nearely: though when the boy was with him, he striued with his owne nature to subdue that naughty affection, and desire he had of him. For when Megabetes on a time came to make much of him, and to kisse him: Agesilaus turned his face from the boy. The boy being ashamed of the repulse, durst no more come so familiarly, but saluted him aloofe off. Agesilaus then repenting him that he had not suffered Megabetes to kisse him, made as though he maruelled why he did not kisse him as he was wont to do. Then answered some of his familiars about him: your selfe, O king, is in fault, because you durst not tarie, but were afraid to kisse so faire a boy. For if he knew your mind, he would come againe, so that you turned your face no more away. When

Ageſilaus had heard them, he pawſed awhile, and ſaid neuer a word, but in fine anſwered them: It ſhall not need you ſay any thing to him, for it would do me more good I could refuſe ſuch an other kiſſe againe, then if all that I ſee before me were gold. Thus was Ageſilaus diſpoſed when Megabates was with him: but in his abſence he did ſo loue him, that I dare ſcantly ſay, that if the boy had come againe into his preſence, he would haue refuſed a kiſſe at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus ſought to ſpeake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a friend vnto them both. Ageſilaus was the firſt that met at the place appointed with his friends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he laid him downe vpon the deepe graſſe in the ſhadow, vnder a faire great tree. Pharnabazus alſo came thither, and they ſpread ſoft skins long haired, and tapeſtry excellently wrought of diuers colours, for him to ſit on vpon the ground. But being aſhamed to ſee Ageſilaus laid on the bare ground in that ſort, he alſo lay down by him, though he had vpon him a maruellous rich gowne, of excellent tiſſue and paſſing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabazus began firſt to ſpeake, and lacked no good perſwaſions & iuſt complaints, for that he hauing bene (as he was) a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the war againſt the ATHENIANS, was then ſpoiled and ſacked by them. Ageſilaus then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hung downe their heads for ſhame, not knowing how to anſwer him, conſidering that Pharnabazus had iniurie offered him, began to ſpeake in this manner: Heretofore when we were friends with the king (my Lord Pharnabazus) we haue vſed his goods like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we vſe them: and ſince we ſee that thou wilt needs be a ſlaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his ſake. But when thou ſhalt like rather to be a friend of the GRECIANS, then a ſlaue to the king of PERSIA: then make account, that all theſe ſoldiers, this armor, our ſhips, and all we, are to defend thy goods & liberty againſt him, without which, nothing that is honeſt can be looked for of mortall men. Therupon Pharnabazus told him his mind plainly: Surely, ſaid he, if the king do ſend hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, be ſure I will then take your part ſtraight. But on the other ſide, if he make me his Lieutenant in this war, truſt to it, I will do him the beſt ſeruice I can againſt you. This anſwer paſſingly pleaſed Ageſilaus, who taking him by the hand, and riſing vp with him, ſaid vnto him: I would wiſh (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing ſo noble a mind as thou haſt, that thou wert rather our friend, then an enemie. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his ſonne being left behind, ran to Ageſilaus, and ſmiling told him: King Ageſilaus, I will make thee my friend: and therewith gaue him a dart he had in his hand. Ageſilaus tooke it of him, and liking well the beautie of the young youth, and the courteſie he had offered him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might beſtow on him. At the laſt he ſpied his Secretarie Adeus horſe, which had a rich capariſon on: he ſtraight tooke it from him, and gaue the horſe and furniture to this liuely youth Pharnabazus ſon, who neuer after forgate it. For it chaunced afterwards that being driuen out of his country by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESVS, Ageſilaus made very much of him, and did not ſticke to further him in his loue abroad. For he had a great fancie and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whom they brought vp in wreſtling, one day to play for the beſt games. But when he was growne a big man and ſtrong, and that he came to offer himſelfe to be billed with them that ſhould wraſtle at the games Olympicall, being in ſome perill to be vtterly refuſed: this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Ageſilaus, and beſought his helpe, that this wraſtler might not receiue the foile to be reiected. Ageſilaus being deſirous to pleaſure him, performed his requeſt with ſome difficultie. Thus Ageſilaus in all things elſe was a ſtrict obſeruer of the lawe: but in his friends cauſes to be ſtraight laced in matters of iuſtice, he ſaid that was but an excuſe for them that would do nothing for their friends. To this effect, they find a letter of his written vnto Idrian, Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his friend. If Nicias haue not offended, let him go: if he haue offended, then pardon him for my ſake. But howſoeuer it be, let him go. This was Ageſilaus maner in the moſt part of his friends cauſes. Notwithſtanding, occaſions fell out oftentimes, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the commonwealth. As appeared one day when he was driuen to remoue in haſt on a ſodaine, and to leaue one ſicke behind him whom he loued dearely: the ſicke man calling him by his name as he was going his way, beſought him that he would not forſake him. Ageſilaus (as Hieronymus the Philoſopher reporteth) turned back againe, and ſaid: O how hard is it both to loue, and to be wiſe! Now had Ageſilaus ſpent two yeares in this warre, and was ſpoken of throughout ASIA, being maruellouſly commended to the king himſelfe, for his great honeſtie, his continencie, his curteſie and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the country with his owne traine only, he would euer lye in the holieſt temples of the gods: becauſe he would the gods themſelues ſhould be witneſſes of his priuate doings, whereas commonly we are loth that men ſhould ſee what we do. Furthermore, amongſt ſo many thouſand ſouldiers as were in his campe, there could hardly be found a worſe mattreſſe then that himſelfe did lye vpon euery night. And as for heate and cold, he could as eaſily away with either of both, as if by conſtitution of bodie he had bene borne to abide any weather and ſeaſon. But aboue all, it was a pleaſant ſight to the GRECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they ſaw the great Lords, the kings Lieutenants of PERSIA, (which before were proud, cruell, rich, and giuen to all luſt and pleaſure) to honour and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, being afraid of euery ſhort word that he ſpake like a LACONIAN: inſomuch as many of them called to mind Timotheus the Poets verſes, who ſaid:

As Mars hath no mercie, ſo Greece ſcorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being vp and in garboile, they willingly yeelded to him in euery place, after he had taken order with the cities, and had eſtabliſhed the liberty of their commõweale, without any bloudſhed, or baniſhment of any perſon: he determined to go further into the land, and tranſporting the warres from the ſea coaſts of GRECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper perſon, and with the wealth and happineſſe of the ECBATANIANS and the SVSIANIANS, and by that meanes to take his leyſure from him, who ſitting ſtill before, made the GRECIANS make war one with another, by force of money, corrupting the Gouernours of euery citie. In the meane time came Epycidas LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how SPARTA was grieuouſly troubled with wars, enforced on them by the other GRECIANS: and that therefore the Ephori did ſend for him home, and commaunded him to returne to defend his countrie.

Ageſilaus ſent for out of Aſia.

Ah wretched Greece, how cruell ſlaughters haſt
Thou brought vpon thee, for to lay thee waſt?

For how ſhould a man otherwiſe call this enuie, treaſon, and ciuill conſpiracie among the GRECIANS, who ouerthrew their good fortune that made them happie before, turning their wars againſt the barbarous people out of GRECE, and now to bring it againſt themſelues? I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that ſaid the GRECIANS delight was taken from them, which ſaw not Alexander the Great ſitting in Darius royall throne: but rather I would think they ſhould haue wept, to haue left this honor vnto Alexander & the MACEDONIANS, fondly loſing ſo many famous Captains of GRECE, at the battels of LEVCTRES, of CORONEA, of CORINTH and of ARCADIA. Neuertheleſſe, Ageſilaus neuer did better act in his life, nor euer ſhewed better example of obedience and iuſtice due to his countrie, then he did in his returne home. For ſith Hannibal that began to haue ill ſucceſſe in his warres, being in manner driuen out of ITALIE, thought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his countrey, to obey his countreymen, which called him home to defend the warre the ROMAINES had made at their owne doores: and that Alexander the Great alſo being ſent for home vpon the like occaſion did not onely refuſe to returne into MACEDON, but made a ieaſt at it, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenant Antipater had fought with king Agis, ſaying: Me thinkes when I heare theſe newes, whileſt we are ouercomming of king Darius here, there hath bene a battell of Rattes fought in ARCADIA. Sith then (I ſay) theſe two famous Captaines haue made ſo litle account of their countrey, may we not thinke the citie of SPARTA bleſſed to haue had ſuch a king, that ſo much reuerenced his countrey and obeyed the lawe, as receiuing onely a litle ſcrole of parchment commaunding him to returne, he forſooke a world of goods and wealth that he quietly enioyed (with aſſured hope and certaintie of more) and imbarked foorthwith, leauing all the allies and confederates of his countrey very ſorrowfull, for that he had giuen ouer ſo noble an enterpriſe, which he had ſo happily begun? Yes ſure. Nay furthermore, he paſſed not for the ſaying of Demoſtratus PHÆACIAN, who ſaid, that the LACEDÆMONIANS in publike matters were the worthieſt men, and the ATHENIANS in priuate cauſes. For as he had ſhewed himſelfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the Commonwealth: ſo was he alwayes courteous priuately to his familiar friends. And becauſe the PERSIAN coyne was ſtamped on the one ſide, with the print of an Archer: Ageſilaus being readie to depart, ſaid, that ten thouſand Archers draue him out of ASIA. For ſo much was brought vnto THEBES and ATHENS, and diſtributed among the Orators and Gouernors there, who through their

Orations

Orations made both those great cities to rise, and make warre against the SPARTANS. In his returne, Agesilaus hauing passed the straight of HELLESPONT, tooke his way through the country of THRACIA, and neuer intreated barbarous king nor people to suffer him to passe, but onely sent vnto them to know whether they would he should passe through their countrys as a friend, or an enemy. All countries and nations else receiued him very honorably to their power, saue the people called the TROCHALIANS, vnto whom king Xerxes himselfe gaue presents that he might passe friendly through their countrey: who sent vnto Agesilaus to demaund a hundred siluer talents, and a hundred women to suffer him to passe through their country. But Agesilaus laughing them to scorne, aunswered againe: Why, how chanceth it that they came not themselues to receiue them? So therewithall he marched forward against these barbarous people who were ranged in battell ray to stop his passage: howbeit he ouerthrew them, and slue a great number of them in the field. The like demand he made vnto the king of MACEDON, whether he should passe through his countrey as a friend, or an enemy. The king made him aunswer, he would consider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quoth Agesilaus: we will go on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldnesse, and fearing least he would do him some hurt as he went: sent to pray him that he would passe through his countrey as a friend. Now it chaunced so that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACEDÆMONIANS: therefore as he passed through their countrey, he did spoile and forrage it as his enemies countrey, and sent Xenocles and Scytha to the city of LARISSE, hoping to perswade them to take part with the LACEDÆMONIANS. These two Ambassadours were retained there as prisoners. The SPARTANS were maruellously offended withall: and thought good that Agesilaus should besiege LARISSE with his armie. But he answered them, he would not lose one of those men, to winne all THESSALIE: and therefore found meanes that he redeemed them againe by composition. Peraduenture this is not to be maruelled at in Agesilaus, that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the citie of CORINTH, where were many worthy and valiant Captaines slaine of the enemies, and but few of the SPARTANES: he seemed not to reioyce at it, but rather to fetch a grieuous sigh, saying: O poore GREECE, how vnfortunate art thou, to haue slaine with thine owne hands so many valiant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioyning together, might at one field haue ouercome all the barbarous people? The PHARSALIANS harrying and troubling the rereward of Agesilaus army, he put forth fiue hundred horsemen which gaue them so lusty a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, he set vp tokens of triumph vpon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victorie pleased him aboue all the rest, because with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of himselfe, he had ouerthrowne the glorie and pride of the enemies horsemen in battell, whereof they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, sent of purpose from SPARTA, to commaund him immediatly to inuade BOEOTIA with his armie. Now though Agesilaus intended some other time with a greater power to enter BOEOTIA, yet because he would not disobey the counsels commaundement of SPARTA: he told his men straight, that the battell for the which they returned out of ASIA was at hand, and therefore he sent for two companies of them which lay in campe by CORINTH. The LACEDÆMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honour Agesilaus for that he had obeyed their commaundement so readily, proclaimed in the city, that as many young men as were desirous to go aide the king, should come to enter their names. Notwithstanding, they onely chose but fiftie of the valiantest among them, and sent them vnto him. In the meane time, Agesilaus passed through the countrey of THERMOPYLES, and coasting ouer the land of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACÆDÆMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the citie of CHÆRONEA: where immediatly after his arriuall, he suddenly saw the Sunne eclipsed, and darkned in the fashion of a new Moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Pisander vnto him, who was slaine in a battell which he lost by sea, fighting against Pharnabazus and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOS. These newes were verie heauie vnto him, both for respect of the person his kinsman whom he lost, as also for the great losse that happened to the commonwealth. Neuertheless, fearing his souldiers would be discouraged with the newes, and become faint-harted, being ready to ioyne battell, he commaunded them that came from the sea, to brute abroad a contrary tale to that they told him, and he himselfe to make good their speech, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and did sacrifice to the gods, as thanking them for the good newes, ſending to euery one of his friends a peece of flesh ſacrificed, as he comonly vſed to do, in any publike cauſe of ioy. Then marching forward, he ſtraight diſcouered his enemies farre off, and they likewiſe him: and thereupon put his men in battell ray, and gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading himſelfe the right wing. The THEBANS on the other ſide, placed themſelues in the right wing of their army, and gaue the left vnto the ARGIVES. Xenophon being at that battell on Ageſilaus ſide, writeth that he neuer knew of the like field fought. At the firſt onſet, the conflict was not great betweene both, neither held long, becauſe the THEBANS brake the ORCHOMENIANS ſtraight, and Ageſilaus the ARGIVES. But when either ſide vnderſtood that the left wings of their battels were in great diſtreſſe, and that they turned their backes, they returned ſuddenly againe. And where Ageſilaus might eaſily haue had the victorie without any daunger, if he had ſuffered the ſquadron of the enemies to paſſe by him, and afterwards to haue charged thē in the rereward: of a noble courage to ſhew his valiantneſſe, he gaue charge vpon the voward, to haue honor in ouercomming them. The THEBANS on the other ſide no leſſe valiantly receiued him, & fought luſtily on all hands: but the cruelleſt fight was about Ageſilaus perſon, with the fiftie young men that were ſent to gard him, who ſhewed themſelues very valiant. Ageſilaus was ſore hurt, notwithſtanding their valiant reſiſtance, his armour being paſſed through with their pikes and ſwords in ſundry places: whereupon they enuironed him round amongſt them, and kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of them, and many of themſelues alſo being killed. In fine, finding the THEBANS too ſtrong in the voward, they were forced to do that which they refuſed at the firſt: and opening themſelues, gaue them paſſage through them. So when they were paſſed them, the SPARTANS perceiuing how looſely & diſorderly they marched, as thinking themſelues out of all danger, followed them, and gaue charge vpon their flancke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they reioycing for their victorie at this battell, retired faire and ſoftly vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Ageſilaus, notwithſtanding he was very ſore hurt, with many a grieuous wound, would not go into his pauillion to be dreſſed before he had bene firſt at the place where the battell was fought, and had ſeene his men that were ſlaine brought away in their armors. As many of his enemies as were fled into the temple of Minerua Itonian, which was not farre from thence (where alſo were ſet vp tokens of triumph offered vnto her long time before by the THEBANS, when they had ouercome the army of the ATHENIANS, vnder the conduct of Sparton their Captaine, and had ſlaine alſo Tolmides their Captaine in the field) he commanded his men they ſhould let them go where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Ageſilaus deſirous to ſee if the THEBANS had any courage to come downe to fight againe: commaunded his ſouldiers to put garlands vpon their heads, and his muſitions to ſound their ſhalmes or pipes, whileſt he did ſet vp a token of triumph as victorious. Moreouer, his enemies ſending to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he graunted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the city of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were playd, he made a ſolemne proceſſion and common ſacrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth part of all his ſpoiles which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the ſumme of an hundred talents. This thing done, he returned into his country, where he was greatly honoured and eſteemed of all his citizens and countrimen, for his orderly life and noble behauior: for he was no changeling, but the ſelfe ſame man in ſtate and condition that he was before he tooke his iourny. He transformed not himſelfe into ſtrangers maners, as commonly other Captaines do, that returne out of a farre country where they haue made warres: neither did he ſcorne his countrey faſhions, or ſhewed himſelfe diſobedient to the laiues thereof, but alwayes kept and obſerued them, without any manner of alteration in his meate or drinke, in waſhing or bathing, in his wiues apparell, in his armorie, or any way elſe in his houſhold ſtuffe, as if he had neuer paſſed ouer the riuer of Eurotas. Yet further, he left his old gates ſtanding that were of ſo great continuance, that they were thought to be thoſe which Ariſtodemus had ſet vp. Xenophon alſo ſaith, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more ſumptuous than any others were. A Canathrum in LACEDÆMON, is a kind of coach or charret after the likeneſſe of Griffins, Harts, or Goats; vpon the which they caried young wenches in ſolemne proceſſions in the city. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Ageſilaus: and Dicearchus alſo was much offended, that they neither knew Ageſilaus daughters name, nor yet the mother of Epaminondas. Yet we find in the LACONIAN Chronicles, that Ageſilaus wiues name was Cleora, Cleora, one of his daughters called Apolia, and the other Prolyta. Moreouer, Ageſilaus ſpeare is ſeene to this day in the citie of SPARTA, euen like vnto others, and no manner of difference. Now Ageſilaus perceiuing certaine citizens of SPARTA to ſtand vpon their reputation, and eſteeming themſelues aboue others, becauſe they kept horſe in their ſtable: perſwaded his ſiſter Cyniſca to ſend her coach and coach horſes to the Olympian games to runne for the beſt priſe, onely to let the GRECIANS ſee that it was no act of any vertue, but ſimply of riches and coſt. Furthermore hauing Xenophon the Philoſopher about him, whom he loued and made great account of, he perſwaded him to ſend for his ſonnes to LACEDÆMON, that they might be brought vp there, where they ſhould learne the nobleſt ſcience that men could poſſibly learne, to wit, to obey, and to commaund. When Lyſander was dead, Ageſilaus at his returne out of ASIA, found a great faction and conſpiracy raiſed by his meanes againſt him in SPARTA: and becauſe it might appeare what manner of citizen Lyſander was when he liued, he was likely to haue openly ſhewed and declared an Oration which he found among his writings (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnaſſeus had written for him, and Lyſander ſhould haue cunned without booke, to haue ſpoken in open aſſembly) that was to ſtirre innouation, and in manner haue made a change of the whole gouernement of the common wealth of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit there was a graue councellor that hauing read the Oration, and doubting the apparant reaſons and perſwaſions alleadged, told him, that he would wiſh him not to plucke vp the dead againe out of his graue, but rather to burie this Oration together with his bodie. Ageſilaus liked the counſell, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had bene his enemies, he did them no hurt openly: but found the meanes to make ſome of them to be ſent as Lieutenant of armie, or otherwiſe to haue charge in the warres. In fine, he made it openly knowne, what couetous and wicked men they had bene in their charges: ſo that when they were accuſed of it before the councell, he would then helpe and intreate for them. By this meanes he made them againe his friends, where they had bene his enemies: in ſo much as in the end, he had not one enemy at all. For the other king Ageſipolis his colleague, whoſe father had bene baniſhed, he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with gouernement of the common wealth. Neuertheleſſe, he ſo behaued himſelfe vnto Ageſilaus, that he made him his very good friend: for both the kings when they were in the city, did eate together in one hall. Then Ageſilaus knowing that Ageſipolis (as himſelfe) was giuen to loue, would euer miniſter talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the city, entiſing him to loue ſome one of them, which he himſelfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in theſe LACONIAN loues there was no manner of diſhoneſty offered, but a true affection and honeſt regard to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honeſt conditions: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Ageſilaus by this meanes, hauing the whole authority (aboue all men in the city) in his hands: made his halfe brother Teleutias Generall by ſea, and himſelfe with the army by land went to beſiege the city of CORINTH, where with his brothers helpe by ſea he tooke the long wals of the ſame. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTH at that time, at Ageſilaus arriuall there were ſolemnizing the feaſt of the Iſthmian games: who made them flie, euen as they came from ſacrificing vnto the god Neptune, driuing them to leaue all their preparation and ſolemnitie. Then diuerſe baniſhed men of CORINTH that were in his armie, beſought him that he would keepe theſe Iſthmian games: but he denied them, yet was contented they ſhould themſelues ſolemnize them, and ſo himſelfe remained there, during the time of the feaſt, for their ſafety. Afterwards when Ageſilaus was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Iſthmian games, and there were ſome of them which hauing wonne the game at the firſt, did alſo winne it at the ſecond time: and others that were victours before, were this ſecond time ouercome. Whereupon Ageſilaus ſayd, that the ARGIVES ſhewed themſelues rancke cowards, that eſteeming ſo much (as they did) theſe playes and ſacrifices, they durſt not once offer to fight with him for defence of the ſame. For himſelfe, touching ſuch like ſports and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, and not to be too curious. For he was contented to honour ſuch ſolemne aſſemblies and common feaſts with his preſence, as were commonly vſed in SPARTA, and tooke great pleaſure to ſee the ſports betweene the young boyes and girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he ſeemed not to be acquainted with ſome of them, wherein others had great delight. As we reade, that Callipides an excellent ſtage player (wonderfully eſteemed of among the GRECIANS for a ſingular man in that art) meeting Ageſilaus on a time, at the firſt did his dutie to him, and then arrogantly thruſt himſelfe among them that walked with him, thinking the king would haue made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O king Ageſilaus, do you not know me? Ageſilaus looking vpon him, aunſwered: what, art not thou Callipides the ſtage player? and ſo made no further account of him. Another time being deſired to heare a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingales voyce: he would not heare him, ſaying, I haue oftentimes heard the nightingale it ſelfe. Another time alſo when Menecrates the Phiſitian (hauing by good fortune cured a deſperate diſeaſe) called himſelfe Iupiter, and arrogantly vſurped that name, preſuming in a letter he wrote vnto Ageſilaus, to ſubſcribe it in this manner, Menecrates Iupiter, vnto king Ageſilaus, greeting: Ageſilaus wrote againe vnto him, Ageſilaus vnto *Menecrates health. So, whileſt Ageſilaus was in the territorie of CORINTH (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his ſouldiers forraging and ſpoiling the countrey round about: Ambaſſadours came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwayes hated the THEBANS, and beſides that thought it then very requiſite for the good ſucceſſe of his doings, to make light of it: ſeemed as he neither heard nor ſaw them that ſpake vnto him. But euen at that very inſtant, as by diuine reuenge to cry quittance, there fell a great miſhap vpon him: for before the Ambaſſadours were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bands called the Mothers, were ſlaine euery man by Iphicrates: which was the greateſt loſſe that they in long time before had ſuſtained. For they loſt a great number of valiant ſouldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS: who being well armed euery man, were ſlaine by naked or light armed hirelings. Thereupon Ageſilaus went ſtraight into the field with hope to ſaue them, or at the leaſt to be reuenged: but receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all ſlaine, he returned againe to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then ſent for the Ambaſſadours of the BOEOTIANS, to giue them audience. But they, to requite his former diſdaine vnto them, made no manner of ſpeech of peace, but onely requeſted him to ſuffer them to enter into CORINTH. Ageſilaus being offended, aunſwered them: If it be to ſee your friends triumph of their victorie, ye may ſafely do it to morow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambaſſadours with him, he deſtroyed the CORINTHIANS countrey, euen to the wals of their citie. And when he had made the Ambaſſadors ſee, that the citizens of CORINTH durſt not come out into the field to defend their countrey, he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowne, which by flight had eſcaped, he brought them into LACEDÆMON againe, alwayes remouing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, becauſe the ARCADIANS (their mortall enemies) ſhould not reioyce at their loſſe. After this voyage, to gratifie the ACHAIANS, he entred with them into the countrey of ACARNANIA, and brought great ſpoiles from thence, after he had ouercome them in battell. Moreouer, when the ACHAIANS beſought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from ſowing of their ground: he made them anſwer he would not. For, ſayd he, they will be afraid of warre the next yeare, when all their fields ſhall be ſowne with corne: and ſo indeed it came to paſſe. For the army returning againe they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANS. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the king of PERSIAES armie, being Lords of the ſea, without let of any deſtroyed and ſpoyled all the coaſt of LACONIA. Moreouer, the city of ATHENS did reare vp her wals againe by helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furniſhed them. Thereupon the LACÆDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that end ſent Antalcidas Ambaſſador vnto Tiribazus, moſt ſhamefully and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whoſe libertie Ageſilaus had made warres with him before. So, it was Ageſilaus hap not to be foiled with any part of this ſhame: for Antalcidas that was his enemy, ſought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he ſaw warre did daily increaſe the authoritie, honour, and fame of Ageſilaus. Notwithſtanding, he aunſwered one then, that reproued him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did fauour the MEDES: No, ſayd he, they do not ſo, but the MEDES do play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheleſſe, threatning warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree to the conditions of this peace: he compelled them to yeeld vnto that the king of PERSIA liked. But ſurely he did this chiefly for reſpect of the THEBANS, to the end that they being enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to ſet the countrey of BOEOTIA at libertie againe, ſhould be ſo much the weaker. This plainely plainely appeared ſoone after by that that followed. For Phœbidas hauing committed a foule act, in open peace to take the caſtell of the city of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending thereby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS themſelues alſo not being very well pleaſed withall, and thoſe ſpecially which were Ageſilaus enemies) Phœbidas being asked in great anger, at whoſe commaundement he dad done that ſudden enterpriſe, to lay all the ſuſpition of the fact vpon him: Ageſilaus for Phœbidas diſcharge, letted not openly to ſay, that the quality of the fact was to be conſidered of, whether it were profitable for the common wealth, or not: and that it was well done of him, the thing falling out profitable for his country to do it of his owne head without commaundement. All this notwithſtanding he was wont to ſay in priuate talke, that iuſtice was the chiefeſt of all vertues, and therefore that valiantneſſe without iuſtice was of no validitie, and that if all men were iuſt, valiantneſſe were of no eſtimation. And to them that told him, the great king will haue it ſo: Why, ſayd he, and wherein is he better then my ſelfe, if he be not iuſter? Iudging very wiſely therein, that they ſhould eſteeme a king (whether he were of great or ſmall power) by his iuſtice, as by the beame of princely ballance. When peace was concluded, the king of PERSIA hauing ſent him a priuate letter deſiring his friendſhip, Ageſilaus refuſed it, ſaying: that common friendſhip was inough betwixt them, and that they ſhould need none other, ſo long as that was kept. But this notwithſtanding, when it came to the point of performance, he went from his firſt good opinion, and gaue place to his will and ambition, ſpecially againſt the THEBANS, at that time when he did not onely ſaue Phœbidas, but alſo procured the city of SPARTA to take the fault vpon them which he had committed, and to iuſtifie it, by keeping the caſtell of Cadmea ſtill, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouernours of the city of THEBES, by whom Phœbidas came by the caſtell of Cadmea, and poſſeſſed it. Thereupon euery man thought ſtraight, that Phœbidas was he that had put the matter in execution, but that Ageſilaus gaue the counſell to do it: as things falling out afterwards, did manifeſtly proue the ſuſpition true. For, after that the THEBANS had driuen the garriſon of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of the caſtell of Cadmea, and reſtored their city againe to libertie, burthening them that they had trayterouſly ſlaine Archias and Leontidas (who indeed were tyrants, though in name Gouernours) he made warre with them: and Cleombrotus, raigning then king with him after Ageſipolis death, was ſent before into BOEOTIA with an army, Ageſilaus was diſpenſed with by law for going any more to the warres, by reaſon of his age, for that he was fortie yeares old from the firſt growth of haire on his face, & therfore went not that iourny: being aſhamed that the THEBANS ſhould now ſee him fight to reuenge the tyrants deaths, who had but a litle before taken armes for the baniſhed men, againſt the PHLIASIANS. At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrary faction vnto Ageſilaus: and was then gouernor in the city of THESPIES, a valiant and ſtout man of his hands, but euer fuller of vaine hope, than of good iudgement. He deſiring fame, and ſuppoſing that Phœbidas came to dignitie and great eſtimation through his valiant enterpriſe at THEBES: perſwaded himſelfe that he ſhould win much more honour, if of himſelfe he tooke the hauen of Piræa ſuddenly ſtealing vpon the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them off by that meanes from all trade by ſea. It was thought commonly that this was a practiſe deuiſed by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouernours of BOEOTIA, who had allured certaine men to faine themſelues very deuout and friendly to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Theſe men praiſing and extolling Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none ſo worthie as himſelfe alone, to take in hand ſo noble an enterpriſe. Thus by their perſwaſions they trained him on to this attẽpt, which for vileneſſe was nothing inferior vnto that trecherous winning of the caſtell Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with leſſe hardineſſe and diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plaine of THRIASIVM, where he made account to haue bene at the wals of Piræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him ſeeing certaine fires from the temples of the city of ELEVSIN, were all afraid and amazed: yea he himſelfe alſo fainted perceiuing he was diſcouered, and ſo returned backe with ſhame and diſhonour to the city of THESPIES, without any exploit done, ſauing onely a litle ſpoile taken. Thereupon accuſers were ſtraight ſent from ATHENS vnto SPARTA, who vpon their arriuall found that they needed not to accuſe him, for that the Councell and Gouernours of the city had already ſent for him to come vnto them, to condemne him of high treaſon. But he durſt not returne to SPARTA, fearing the fury of his countrimen, thinking indeed that they would ſeeme as though the wrong had bene done to them, becauſe it ſhould not be thought that they had cauſed it to be done. Sphodrias practiſe to take the hauen of Piræa at Athens.

Sphodrias accuſed of treaſon.

Sphodrias had a ſonne called Cleonymus, a very faire boy, with whom Archidamus (Ageſilaus ſonne) was farre in loue: who then was maruellous ſory to ſee this boy he loued, in ſo great danger to loſe his father, and yet durſt not be ſeene to helpe him, becauſe Sphodrias was one of Ageſilaus aduerſaries. Notwithſtanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Ageſilaus (whom they feared aboue all men elſe) Archidamus followed his father three or foure dayes together, and durſt not breake the matter to him: in fine, the day of the next ſeſſion being at hand, when iudgement ſhould be giuen of Sphodrias, he boldly ventured to tell him, how that Cleonymus had prayed him to be an humble ſuter to him touching his fathers fact. Ageſilaus vnderſtanding that his ſonne loued Cleonymus, would not withdraw him from louing of him, becauſe the boy euen from his childhood gaue alwayes good hope that one day he would ſure make as honeſt a man as any other whatſoeuer: neither made he any countenance to his ſonne, as though he would do any thing at his ſute, but onely aunſwered him, for that, he would do as became him in ſuch a caſe. Whereupon Archidamus being baſhfull, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would ſee him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias friends deſpaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymocles, one of Ageſilaus familiars talking with them, told them that for the fact it ſelfe, Ageſilaus thought it a ſhamefull deed, and as much miſliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias ſelfe, that he tooke him for a valiant man, and ſaw that the common wealth had need of men of ſuch ſeruice. This was Ageſilaus common talke to pleaſe his ſonne, when any man came to ſpeake to him of Sphodrias accuſation. Inſomuch that Cleonymus found ſtraight that Archidamus had dealt as faithfully and friendly for him as might be: and then Sphodrias friends alſo tooke heart againe vnto them, to ſolicite his cauſe, and to be earneſt ſuters for him. Ageſilaus among other had this ſpeciall property, that he loued his children dearly: and a tale goeth of him, that he would play with them in his houſe when they were litle ones, and ride vpon a litle cocke-horſe, or a reed, as on horſebacke: inſomuch as a friend of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children, he prayed him to ſay nothing, till he had litle children himſelfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his Iudges. The ATHENIANS vnderſtanding it, ſent to proclaime warre with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Ageſilaus was much reproued, becauſe that to pleaſe the fond affection of his ſonne, he had hindered iuſtice, and brought his city to be accuſed among the GRECIANS for ſuch grieuous crimes. Ageſilaus perceiuing that king Cleombrotus his companion went with no very good will to make warre with the THEBANS, he breaking the order ſet downe for leading of the armie, which was kept before, went to the warres himſelfe in perſon, and ſo inuading BOEOTIA, he both receiued and did great hurt. Whereupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one day, Now truly (ſayd he) the THEBANS haue payd you your deſerued hire, for teaching them againſt their wils to be ſouldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For indeed they ſay the THEBANS became better ſouldiers and warriours than they were before, being daily trained and exerciſed in armes through the continuall inuaſions of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Alſo this was the reaſon, why the old father Lycurgus in his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make warre too oft with one ſelfe people, becauſe that by compulſion they ſhould not be made expert ſouldiers. For this cauſe did the confederates of LACEDÆMON hate Ageſilaus, ſaying, that it was not for any knowne offence to the ſtate, but for very ſpite and priuate malice of his owne, that he ſought to vndoe the THEBANS in this manner: and that to follow his humour, they conſumed themſelues going yearely to the warres one while this way, another while that way, without any neceſſity at all, following a few LACEDÆMONIANS, themſelues being alwayes the greater number. Then it was, that Ageſilaus deſiring to make them ſee what number of men of warre they were, vſed this deuiſe. On a time he commanded all the allies to ſit downe together one with another by themſelues, and the LACEDÆMONIANS alſo by themſelues. Then he made a Herauld proclaime that all pot-makers ſhould ſtand vp on their feete. When they were vp, he made him cry to the braſiers to riſe alſo. After them in like manner, the carpenters: then the maſons, and ſo conſequently all occupations one after another. So that at the length the confederates obeying the proclamation, were all in manner on their feete. The LACEDÆMONIANS, not one of them roſe: becauſe all baſe mechanicall crafts were forbidden them to occupie. Then Ageſilaus laughing at them: Loe, my friends (ſayd he) do you not ſee now that we bring moe ſouldiers to the field, than ye do? At his returne from this iourney of THEBES, paſſing by the city of MEGARA, as he went vp into the councell-houſe within the caſtell, there ſuddenly tooke him him a great crampe in his left legge, that ſwelled extreamly, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but bloud which had filled the veine: a Phiſitian of SYRACVSA in SICILE being there, ſtraight opened a veine vnder the anckle of his foote, which made the paine to ceaſe: notwithſtanding there came ſuch abundance of bloud, that they could not ſtanch it, ſo that he ſounded oft, & was in great danger of preſent death. In fine, a way was found to ſtop it, and they caried him to LACEDÆMON, where he lay ſicke a long time, ſo that he was paſt going to the warres any more. The SPARTANS in the meane time receiued great ouerthrowes both by ſea and land, and among other, their greateſt ouerthrow was at the battell of LEVCTRES, where the THEBANS ouercame and ſlue them in plaine battell. Then the GRECIANS were all of one mind to make a generall peace, and thereupon came Ambaſſadors and Deputies from all the cities of GRECE, and met at LACEDÆMON to that end. One of theſe Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philoſopher, but as yet vnskilfull in warres. He ſeeing how the other Ambaſſadors curried fauor with Ageſilaus, only he of the reſt kept his grauity to ſpeake freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GRECE in generall, declaring to them all, how warre did onely increaſe the greatneſſe and power of the city of SPARTA, and contrarily did miniſh and decay all other cities and townes of GRECE: and for this cauſe, that he did counſell them all to conclude a good and perfect peace indifferently for all, to the end it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Ageſilaus perceiuing then that all the GRECIANS preſent at the aſſembly gaue him good eare, and were glad to heare him ſpeake thus boldly of peace: asked him openly, if he thought it meete and reaſonable, that all BOEOTIA ſhould be ſet cleare at libertie againe? Epaminondas preſently and boldly againe asked him: if he thought it iuſt and requiſite to ſet all LACONIA cleare againe at liberty? Ageſilaus being offended therewith, ſtood vpon his feete, and commanded him to anſwer plainly whether they would ſet all BOEOTIA at liberty, or not? Epaminondas replied vnto him with the ſelfe ſpeech againe, and asked him whether they would ſet all LACONIA at liberty, or not? That netled Ageſilaus ſo, that (being alſo glad of ſuch a cloake, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the THEBANS) he preſently put the name of the THEBANS out of the bill of thoſe, which ſhould haue bene compriſed within the league, and cried open warres vpon them in the market place. For the reſt, he licenſed the other Deputies & Ambaſſadors of the people of GRECE to depart, with this concluſion: that they ſhould louingly take order among themſelues for the controuerſies betwixt them, if they could peaceably agree together: & they that could not fall to ſuch agreement, that then they ſhould try it by warres, for that it was a hard thing to take vp all quarrels among them. King Cleombrotus by chaunce was at that time in the country of PHOCIDE with his army, vnto whom the Ephori wrote that he ſhould forthwith ſpoile the THEBANS country: and therwith alſo they ſent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fanſie to the iourney, and were loth to make warre with them, but yet durſt not refuſe to go, nor diſobey the LACEDÆMONIANS. And notwithſtanding that there were many ſignes preſaging ill lucke, as we haue written in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was againſt the enterpriſe of this warre all that he could: Ageſilaus would needs forward, hoping he had now found oportunity to be reuenged of the THEBANS, ſith all GRECE beſides was in peace and at liberty, themſelues only exempted from treaty of peace. If there had bene no other thing in it but the very ſhortneſſe of time, that made it manifeſt inough that this warre was begun in a geere, without any manner of reaſon. For the generall peace amongſt the GRECIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, and the LACEDÆMONIANS were ouercome at the battell of LEVCTRES the fifth of Iune: ſo as there was but twentie dayes betweene them. There were ſlaine a thouſand LACEDÆMONIANS with their king Cleombrotus, and the choiſeſt and valianteſt SPARTANS about him. Among them was alſo ſlaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias ſonne, of whom we ſpake before: who hauing bene beaten downe thriſe at the kings foote, three times got vp againe, but at the length was ſlaine, valiantly fighting againſt the THEBANS. This great ouerthrow chaunced to the LACEDÆMONIANS vnlooked for, and withall ſo glorious a victorie vnto the THEBANS, as GRECIANS fighting with GRECIANS had neuer the like: the vanquiſhed city of SPARTA notwithſtanding deſerued no leſſe honour and commendation for her fortitude and worthineſſe, than did the victorious city of THEBES. For as Xenophon writeth, that as amongſt good men euen in table talke, and in their ſports and mirth there falleth out euer ſome thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: euen ſo in like caſe, no leſſe, but rather more, ought noble mens words to be weyed, and their countenances marked as well in aduersitie as in prosperity. At that time by chance there was a common feast day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of straungers that came to see the daunces and sports of them that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arriued that brought the newes of the battell lost at LEVCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor straight ran all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had lost the signiorie and commaundement ouer all GRECE: would not suffer them for all this to breake off their daunce in the Theater, nor the city in any thing to change the forme of their feast, but sent vnto the parents (to euerie mans house) to let them vnderstand the names of them that were slaine at the battell, they themselues remaining still in the Theater to see the daunces and sports continued, to iudge who caried the best games away. The next morning when euery man knew the number of them that were slaine, and of those also that were escaped: the parents and friends of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking chearefully of the matter, and one of them embraced another. On the other side, the parents of them that escaped, kept their houses with their wiues, as folke that mourned. If any of them also had occasion to go abroad out of their houses, for any matter of necessitie, ye should see him looke so heauily and sad, that he durst not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Besides all this, euen amongst the women there was greater difference: for the mothers of them that were to returne from the battell, were sad and sorowfull, and spake not a word: contrarily, the mothers of them that were slaine, went friendly to visite one another, to reioyce together. Now when the people saw that their confederates began to forsake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victory, would inuade PELOPONNESVS: then they began to be pricked in conscience about the Oracles of the gods, thinking that this misfortune came to their city, for that they had thrust out of the kingdome a man perfect of limmes, to place an impotent person, being specially warned by the gods to beware of that aboue all things. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valiantnesse, and his authoritie was such thereby, that they did not onely vse him in warre, as their king and soueraigne Captaine: but in ciuill causes also wherein there rose any question, they euer vsed his counsell and aduise. As they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at SPARTA Tresantas (being a great number of them, and men of the noblest houses, and of greatest power within the city) least they should moue some stir or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no office in the common wealth: it is shame and reproch to giue them any wiues, and also to marry any of theirs: whosoeuer meeteth them may lawfully strike them, and they must abide it, and not giue them a word againe: they are compelled to weare poore tattered cloth gownes patched with cloth of diuerse colours, and worst of all, to shaue one side of their beards, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the danger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamie they deserued, specially then standing in need of a great number of men of warre: they referred themselues altogether vnto Agesilaus, to take such order in it as he thought good. But Agesilaus then, without chaunging or altering any thing of the law, said in open assembly at LACEDÆMON: that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this pollicy he kept the law inuiolate, and saued also the honor of those poore men: and withall, to put these youths againe in hart, being amazed with this feare, he led the army into the countrey of ARCADIA, and would giue no battell, but only tooke a small city of the MANTINEANS, and foraged the countrey. This againe did a litle reuiue the city of SPARTA with some hope, to make that it should not vtterly despaire. But shortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the countrey of LACONIA, with forty thousand footmen well armed, besides an infinite number of others light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the spoile: so that in all, there were about three score and ten thousand fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was well neare six hundred yeares sith the DORIANS possessed LACEDÆMON, and in all that time till then they neuer saw enemies in their country that durst inuade them: but then they sacked and burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the riuer of Eurotas, and hard adioyning vnto SPARTA, & no man durst come out to resist them. For Agesilaus (as Theopompus writeth) would not suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to go out to fight against such a tempest and furie of warre, but hauing fortified the middest of the city, and garded euerie end of the streetes with souldiers, he patiently bare all the bragges and threats of

of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bad him come into the field to defend his countrey, that onely was the cauſe of all theſe their calamities, hauing himſelfe procured this warre. If this went to Ageſilaus heart, no leſſe grieuous were theſe troubles to him that roſe within the citie: as the cries and running too and fro of the old men, which were madde to ſee that they did before their eyes: and of feely women alſo, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe, as ſtraught of their wits, to heare the noiſe the enemies made, and to ſee the fire which they raiſed all the fields ouer. Much more ſorowfull alſo did this make him, when as he bethought himſelfe, that entring into his kingdome at ſuch time as the city of SPARTA was in the greateſt proſperitie that euer it was, he now ſaw his honour eclipſed, and the glory of his kingdome ouerthrowne: and the rather, for that himſelfe had often vaunted, that LACONIAN women had neuer ſeene the ſmoake of any enmies campe. And as the ſay of Antalcidas one day, that he anſwered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valiantneſſe of one anothers nation, alleadging for himſelfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driuen the LACEDÆMONIANS from the riuer of Cephiſus. It is true, ſayd the LACONIAN: but we did neuer driue you from the riuer of Eurotas. The like anſwer made a meane man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that caſt him in the teeth, There are diuerſe of your LACONIANS buried in the countrey of ARGOLIDE: So are there none of yours, ſayd he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did ſecretly ſend his children into the Ile of CITHERA, fearing leaſt the city of SPARTA ſhould be taken. Ageſilaus perceiuing that the enemies forced to paſſe ouer the riuer, to enter the city: he ſtood to defend the middle part of the city, being the higheſt place of the ſame, and there had his men ſet in order of battell. Now at that time, by chance the riuer of Eurotas was ſwelled greater then of ordinary, by reaſon of the ſnow waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldneſſe, then roughneſſe of the ſame, in paſſing it ouer. Some ſhewing Ageſilaus how Epaminondas marched formoſt before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer off him, ſaying neuer a word but this onely: Oh, what a noble fellow is that? Epaminondas hauing done all that he could poſſible to giue the LACEDÆMONIANS battell, euen within the city ſelfe of SPARTA, that he might there haue ſet vp ſome tokens of triumph, he could neuer entiſe Ageſilaus to come out of his fort: wherefore he was driuen in the end to depart thence, and ſo went to deſtroy all the reſt of the countrey. There fell out a conſpiracy of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and tooke that quarter of the city where the temple of Diana ſtood, called Iſſorium, a place of ſtrong ſituation, and ill to diſtreſſe. Hereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS in furie would ſtraight haue ſet vpon them. But Ageſilaus fearing great mutiny and ſtirre vpon it, commanded that no man ſhould ſtirre: and himſelfe vnarmed, in a poore gowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that ſtrength: Sirs, ye haue not obeyed my commaundement: this is not the place I appointed you to aſſemble in, neither all of you in one place: for I willed you to diſperſe your ſelues, ſome one way, ſome another way, ſhewing them the quarters of the city. The traytors hearing theſe words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewrayed: and ſo leauing that ſtrength, went into thoſe parts of the city that he had ſhewed them. Ageſilaus then bringing others thither, poſſeſſed the fort of Iſſorium, and tooke fifteene of thoſe conſpiratours, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out another conſpiracy farre greater then the firſt, of the SPARTANS themſelues, which were ſecretly gotten together into a houſe, to make ſome ſudden ſtirre and garboile: and to puniſh them in ſo great a trouble, it was hard: on the other ſide to neglect it, the conſpiracie was ouer dangerous. Ageſilaus hauing conſulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any iudgement of law: where neuer SPARTAN before them ſuffered death, without due order of law. Againe, whereas diuerſe of their neighbours, and of the ILOTES themſelues (whom they had billed in their bands of ſouldiers) ſtale away, and ran to their enemies, which did much diſcourage them that remained: he warned his men that they ſhould euerie day go to their couches where they lay, and that they ſhould take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, becauſe they ſhould not know the number of them that were fled in this ſort. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, ſome ſay that they went out of LACONIA by reaſon of the winter that came on, whereupon the ARCADIANS diſcharged their bands, and euery one departed his way in diſorder. Others alſo hold opinion, that they continued there three moneths together, during which time they deſtroyed the moſt part of the

countrey. Theopompus writeth notwithstanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS hauing determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, sent from Agesilaus, who brought them ten talents that they should depart out of their countrey. Thus had they money giuen them to defray their charges homewards, to do that, which they themselues had long before determined to haue done. And yet do I wonder, how it is possible that all other historiographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All do acknowledge truly, that Agesilaus onely was the cause that the citie of SPARTA was saued: who leauing his ambition and selfe will, being passions borne with him, did wisely foresee their safety. Neuertheless, after this great ouerthrow, he could neuer raise SPARTA againe to her former greatnesse. For like as a whole body, which hauing acquainted it selfe continually with a moderate diet, with the least disorder doth surfeit presently, and so putteth all in daunger: euen so Lycurgus hauing framed a perfect state of gouernement in the common wealth of SPARTA, to make her citizens liue in peace and amitie together: when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good law-maker thought vnmeete to continue happie life: they were straight ouerthrowne and all went to wracke. By this time Agesilaus was growne old, and could no more go to the warres for very age: but his sonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACVSA sent vnto them, wanne a battell against the ARCADIANS, called the tearelesse battell: for there died not one of his men, and they slue a great number of their enemies. This victorie plainely shewed the great weakenesse and decay of the citie of SPARTA. For in former times it was so common a thing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did sacrifice nothing else to the gods in token of thankes, within the citie, but a poore cocke: and they that had fought the battell made no boast of it: neither did they that heard the newes reioyce greatly at it. For when they had wonne that great battell at the citie of MANTINEA, which Thucydides describeth: the Ephori onely sent the messenger that brought the newes for reward, a peece of powdred meate, and no other thing. But then, when newes was brought of this victorie, and that they vnderstood Archidamus came home victorious: neither man nor woman could keepe the citie, but the father himselfe went first of all to meete him, with the teares in his eyes for ioy, and after him all the other Magistrates and officers of the city, and a swarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the riuers side, holding vp their hands to heauen, and thanking the gods, as if their citie had redeemed and recouered her shame and lost honour, and began now to rise againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, some say, that the husbands durst not boldly looke their wiues in the faces, they were so ashamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the citie of MESSINA being by Epaminondas reedified and repleniſhed with people, he called home againe out of all parts, the naturall inhabitants of the same. The SPARTANS durst not fight with him (nor to hinder his purpose) though it spited them to the hearts, and were angry with Agesilaus, for that in his raigne they had lost all that territory, which was as great as all LACONIA selfe, & for goodnesse and fertility to be compared with the best parts of all GREECE, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agesilaus would not agree to the peace, which the THEBANS sent to offer him: and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the enemies kept in deeds. Therefore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not only without recouering the thing he looked for, but had in manner also lost the city of SPARTA by a warlike stratageme, in the which he was deceiued. For the MANTINEANS being newly reuolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and hauing sent for the LACEDÆMONIANS: Epaminondas receiuing intelligence that Agesilaus was departed from SPARTA with all his power to aide the MANTINEANS, marched away secretly by night from TEGEA, without the priuity of the MANTINEANS, and went straight to SPARTA, the which he had almost surprised on the sudden, going another way then Agesilaus came (being in manner without men to defend it.) Howbeit a THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Callisthenes sayth (or as Xenophon writeth, a CRETAN) brought Agesilaus newes of it: who dispatched a horseman straight to aduertise them of the citie of SPARTA, and marching forward himselfe to returne, staied not long after before he arriued. He was no sooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, who passing ouer the riuer of Eurotas, gaue assault to the city. Then Agesilaus perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of securitie as before, but rather of desperation and courage: he valiantly defended it, more then an old mans yeares could beare.

Agesilaus repulsed Epaminondas from Lacedemon.

Thus,

Thus, through courage and desperate mind, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did euer vse it, he put by the daunger, and saued the citie of SPARTA from Epaminondas hands, setting vp markes of triumph for repulsing of the enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to see the LACEDÆMONIANS how honourably they rewarded their nurse and countrey for their good education: but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into euery part of the city, with a few about him, to repulse the enemies where-soeuer the daunger was greatest. It is sayd also that at that time there was one Isadas the sonne of Phœbidas, that did maruellous straunge things to behold, both in the face of his enemies, as also in the sight of his friends. He was of goodly personage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being starke naked, and vnarmed, his bodie nointed with oyle, hauing in one hand a borestaffe, and in the other a sword, in this manner he went out of his house, and ranne amongst them that fought, killing and ouerthrowing his enemies that withstood him, and was not once hurt, either for that the gods preserued him for his manhoods sake, or else because men thought him more then a man. The Ephori immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honour and reward of his valiantnesse: but withall they set a fine on his head to pay a thousand siluer Drachmaes for his rash attempt, to hazard himselfe in battell, vnarmed for defence. Shorty after they fought another great battell before the city of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas hauing ouerthrowne the first rankes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and couragiously distressing the rest, valiantly following the chase, there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiuing him (as Dioscorides writeth) slue him with his borespeare. The LACEDÆMONIANS to this day notwithstanding, do call the offspring of this Anticrates, Machæriones, as much to say, as swordmen, as though he had slaine him with a sword. The LACEDÆMONIANS did esteeme this Anticrates so much, for that deadly stroke he gaue (because they were afraid of Epaminondas while he liued) that they gaue him that slue him, great honours and dignities, and discharged all his offspring and kindred from payment of subsidy and common contributions, which priuiledge one Callicrates, a kinsman of this Anticrates enioyed euen in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRECIANS hauing taken peace generally amongst them, Agesilaus would needs exclude the MESSENIANS from being sworne to this peace, saying: that they need not sweare, because they had no city. Now, for asmuch as all the GRECIANS else did receiue them as amongst the number, and tooke their oath vnto this peace, the LACEDÆMONIANS brake off from this generall peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the MESSENIANS countrey, and all through the allurement of Agesilaus, who for this cause was thought of the GRECIANS a cruell and vnsatiable man for warres, to deale so craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, he brought himselfe in discredit with all men, being compelled to make his city bare of money, borrowing of them still, and raising sundry contributions amongst them: whereas indeed it had bene his best way to haue ended all those miseries, hauing so happy an occasion offered at that time, and not to haue lost so great an Empire of so many townes and cities, both by sea and land, and all to plague his countrey, to winne the land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame vnto him of all other, when he gaue himself vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the ÆGYPTIANS, euery man thinking it a shamefull part of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefest man of all the GRECIANS, & the which had filled the world with report of his fame and glorie) should for money let out his person to hire, and the glory of his name, vnto a barbarous person, a traytour and rebell to his king and maister, to become a mercenary Captaine and souldier to do him seruice. And moreouer, he being now foure score yeares of age and vpwards, his body all mangled with wounds, though he had vndertaken this honorable charge for the recouerie of the libertie of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deserued some blame: for noble acts haue their time, yea rather the good and ill do nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocritie. But Agesilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in seruice, specially for benefit of the common wealth, but perswaded himselfe that it was a dishonour to him to liue idly in a city and do nothing, till death should come and make his summons: thereupon therefore he leauied men of warre through all GRECE with the money Tachos sent vnto him, and with them tooke sea, hauing thirtie SPARTANS counsellors and assistants to him, as he had in his first iourney. Now Agesilaus being arriued in ÆGYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and gouernours of king Tachos came to the sea shore, and honourably receiued him: and not they onely, but infinite numbers of ÆGYPTIANS of all sorts Agesilaus greedy of warres.

(that were maruellous desirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agesilaus) came thither from all parts to see what manner of man he was. But when they saw no stately traine about him, but an old gray-beard layed on the grasse by the sea side, a litle man that looked simply of the matter, & but meanely apparelled in an ill fauored threed-bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the merry tale, that a mountaine should bring foorth, and was deliuered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him presents to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geese, and such grosse things: and refused all confections, perfumes, and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to giue them to the Ilotes his slaues. Theophrastus writeth, that he delighted maruellously in the rush Papyrus, and liked the garlands they made of them, for their fineneſſe & the handsomneſſe, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing spoken at that time with Tachos, who was assembling his army to go on his iourney: he was not made Captaine generall, as he looked he should haue bene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the straungers, Chabrias Generall of all the army by sea, and the chiefe of all the rest was Tachos himselfe in person. This at the first grieued Agesilaus to the hart, being driuen whether he would not, to beare with the vanity and pride of this Ægyptiian. So he sailed with him into Phenice, against the Phenicians, imbasing himselfe against his noble disposition and mind, and gaue him place, vntill he saw time of reuenge. It chanced that one Nectanebos a nephew of this Tachos, hauing the leading of part of this army, rebelled against him, and being chosen king by the Ægyptians, he sent vnto Agesilaus, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, & prayed him to ioyne with him, promising great rewards vnto them both. Tachos vnderstanding that, besought them both that they would not forsake him. Chabrias for his part also did likewise intreate Agesilaus, & perswaded him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agesilaus answered him: For thee, Chabrias, thou camest of thine owne goodwill, and therefore mayest do what thou thinkest good, but so is it not with me: for I am sent hither a Captaine by my countrey, to serue the Ægypians, and therefore it were no honesty for me to make warre with them, whom I am sent to serue and aide: were it not that they themselues which sent me, do now commaund me the contrarie. This answer being made, he sent certaine of his men to Sparta to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nectanebos. Both they also for their parts sent to intreate the councell of Lacedæmon: the one as being alwayes their friend and confederate, and the other promising to be their faithfull friend thencefoorth. The Lacedæmonians hauing heard the requests of both, aunswered them openly, that Agesilaus should consider of this matter: and wrote secretly to him, that he should do what he thought best for the common wealth of Sparta. So Agesilaus taking with him the mercenarie souldiers which he had brought out of Greece, went vnto Nectanebos, cloaking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his countrey, to bewray a wicked thing: but indeed taking away the vizard to benefite his country, they might by a better name rightly haue termed it treason. Howbeit the Lacedæmonians placing the chiefest point of honor, to consist in the benefite of their country: did acknowledge nothing to be iustice, but that which they thought might serue for the aduancement of the glory of Sparta. Tachos seeing himselfe forsaken thus by his mercenarie straungers, fled. But now on the other side, there rose another king in the citie of Mendes, against this Nectanebos, who hauing leauied to the number of a hundred thousand fighting men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encourage Agesilaus, told him, that indeed they were a great number of men of all sorts together, and specially men of handie craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, because they knew not what warre meant. But Agesilaus answered him againe: It is not their number that I feare, but their rudeneſſe and vnskilfulneſſe, which is hardest of all to deceiue. For warlike stratagems do most preuaile against men that haue greatest feare and experience: and therefore they foresee one thing rather then another. But men of no iudgement nor experience, neither feare daunger, nor haue forecast, and therefore do giue him no more aduantage that seeketh to deceiue them, then the wrastler by sleight is able to ouerthrow him, whom he cannot stirre nor remoue. Afterwards the Mendesian king himselfe sent vnto Agesilaus, to winne him if he could. Nectanebos then began to be afraid. For when Agesilaus counselled him to try it by battell as soone as he could, and not to prolong this warre against ignorant men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouer-multitude might intrench him round about, and preuent him in diuerse things: then he began to feare and

and ſuſpect him more, and thereupon retired into a great citie well walled about, and of great ſtrength. Ageſilaus being offended that he miſtruſted him thus, tooke it inwardly: but being aſhamed to turne againe vnto the third, and alſo to depart without any exploit done, he followed him, and encloſed himſelfe within thoſe walles. The enemies purſuing him hard, came vnto the city, and began to intrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the EGYPTIAN Nectanebos fearing a long ſiege, determined to giue them battell. Thereto the hired GRECIANS gaue conſent, as deſiring no better match, and the rather alſo for that there was but ſmall ſtore of corne within the city. But Ageſilaus perſwading the contrarie, would in no wiſe conſent to it: wherupon the EGYPTIANS thought worſe of him then before, and plainly called him traitor to their king. Howbeit he did patiently beare all their accuſations, expecting time to performe an exploit he intended, which was this. The enemies had caſt a deepe trench without to compaſſe them in. When this trench drew neare to end, and that both ends lacked not much of meeting, tarying till night came on, he commanded the GRECIANS to arme, and to put themſelues in readineſſe: then he came vnto the EGYPTIAN, and ſaid vnto him: Lo here is an excellent occaſion preſented to ſaue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I ſaw it brought to the perfection I looked for, fearing leſt otherwiſe we ſhould haue loſt it. Now ſith the enemies themſelues haue with their owne hands giuen vs the way to ſaue our ſelues by this trench they haue caſt, the which as much as is finiſhed therof doth hinder their great multitude to helpe themſelues, & that which is yet left vnfiniſhed doth giue vs oportunitie to fight with them of euen hand: determine to ſhew thy valure, and following vs, ſaue thy ſelfe and thy people. For the enemies which we ſhall aſſaile before vs, ſhall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trench which defendeth vs on our ſide, can no way hurt vs. Nectanebos hearing his words, wondered at his great wiſedome, and ſo thruſting in among the GRECIANS, did aſſaile the enemies: the which were ſoone ouerthrowne and put to flight, as many as durſt reſiſt and make head againſt them. Ageſilaus hauing won Nectabenos againe to truſt him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like ſubtiltie wherewith he had firſt beguiled them, and which they knew not how to auoide. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to follow him: ſodainely againe he would turne this way and that way. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a ſtraight ſluce, walled about of either ſide, with great broad ditches full of running water: ſo that when they were euen in the midſt of it, he ſodainly ſtopped their paſſage with the front of his battell, which he caſt to the breadth of the ſluce, and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neither compaſſe him in behind, nor flanke him on the ſides. They hauing in this ſort made ſome ſmall reſiſtance, in the end turned their backes and fled, and left a great number ſlaine in the field: the reſidue after that laſt ouerthrow forſooke their Captains, and fled ſtragglingly here and there. Thus the affaires of this EGYPTIAN king after that time had good ſucceſſe, and was quietly ſtabliſhed in his kingdome, making much of Ageſilaus: and doing him all honor poſſible, prayed him to tarie with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needs haſten home to his countrey, which was in warre with others, knowing that his citie of SPARTA was without money, becauſe they were driuen to giue pay vnto ſtrangers. Thereupon Nectanebos in the end tooke his leaue of him very honorably, preſenting him a gift (beſides all other honors he did him) of two hundred and thirty ſiluer talents in readie money, to defray the charges of the war in his country. Howbeit the ſea being rough in the winter quarter, he died by the way, hauing notwithſtanding recouered land with his ſhips in a deſert place of the coaſt of LYBIA, which was called the hauen of Menelaus, after he was foure ſcore and foure yeares old: of the which he had raigned one and forty yeares king of SPARTA, and 30 yeares thereof and more he was alwaies taken and reputed for the greateſt perſon, and in maner Chieftaine generall of all GRECE, vntill the battell of LEVCTRES. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing a cuſtome to bury the dead bodies of their citizens that died out of their country, in the ſame place where they departed: (the bodies of their kings excepted) the SPARTANS which were at that time about Ageſilaus, annointed his bodie with waxe for lacke of honie, and caried him home to SPARTA in this maner. His ſonne Archidamus ſucceeded him in the kingdom, whoſe iſſue ſucceſſiuely raigned continually after him, vnto the time of Agis (who was the fifth king in ſucceſſion after Ageſilaus) whom indeed Leonidas put to death, becauſe he ſought to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIAN ſauncient diſcipline and forme of life.

THE LIFE OF Pompey.

The father of Pompey hated in Rome.

THE ROMAINES seeme to haue loued Pompey from his childhood, with the selfe affection that Prometheus in the tragedy of Æschylus appeareth to haue borne vnto Hercules, after that he was deliuered by him: when he said:

So great a hate I bare not to the father,
But that I loue the sonne of him much rather.

Strabo, the father of Pompey

For the ROMAINES neuer shewed more bitter hate against any other Captaine, then they did vnto Strabo, Pompeys father. Truly so long as he liued, they feared his greatnesse obtained by armes, for indeed he was a noble Captaine: but being striken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare whereon his body lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villanie. Contrariwise, neuer any other ROMAINE (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest goodwils so soone, nor that in prosperitie and aduersity continued longer constant, then vnto Pompey. One only cause procured the fathers hate, and that was, an vnsatiable and greedy desire of money. But Pompey his son, was for many occasions beloued: as, for temperance of life, aptnesse to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnes of word, and curtesie in conuersation: so that there was neuer man that requested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdaine, and tooke with great honor. Furthermore, being but a child, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens goodwils before he spake: for his countenance was sweet, mixed with grauitie, and being come to mans state, there appeared in his gesture and behauior a graue and princely maiesty. His haire also stood a litle vpright, & the cast and soft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine resemblance (as they said) of the statues and images of king Alexander. And because euery man gaue him that name, he did not refuse it himselfe: insomuch as there were some which sporting wise did openly call him Alexander. Wherupon Lucius Philippus a Consull, was not ashamed to say openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruell if he being Philip did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the curtisan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which she had with Pompey being a yong man: telling that after she had lien with him, she could not possibly rise from him, but she must needs giue him some sweet quip or pleasant taunt. She would tell also how one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in loue with her and was a maruellous earnest earneſt ſuter to obtaine her goodwill: and that ſhe anſwered him flatly, ſhe would not, for the loue ſhe bare to Pompey. Geminius thereupon brake the matter to Pompey himſelfe. Pompey deſirous to pleaſure him, granted the requeſt: howbeit Geminius after that, would not come neare Flora, nor ſpeake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtiſan like, for ſhe was ſicke a long time for very griefe of mind, and the thought ſhe tooke vpon it. All this notwithſtanding, it is ſaid that this Flora had then ſuch fame for her paſſing grace and beautie, that Cecilius Metellus ſetting foorth and beautifying the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, with goodly tables and pictures: among the reſt, he cauſed her picture to be liuely drawne for her excellent beautie. Furthermore, Pompey againſt his nature, dealt very hardly and vncourteouſly with the wife of Demetrius, his franchiſed bondman (who while he liued was in great credite with him, and dying, left her woorth foure thouſand talents) fearing to be taken with her beauty which was very ſingularly faire, leſt he ſhould be thought in loue with her. Now, though herein he ſeemed to be very circumſpect, and to caſt the worſt, yet could he not thus ſcape the detracting tongues of his ill-willers: for they did accuſe him, that to pleaſe and content his wiues, he would let paſſe and winke at many things, that were againſt the profite of the commonwealth. To proue his ſober and temperate diet, and how he was contented with common meats: a word (they ſay) he ſpake when he was very ſicke, and could taſt no meate, is ſpecially noted. For to bring his ſtomacke to him againe, his Phiſition willed him to eate a Thruſh. So ſeeking all about to get him one, there was no Thruſh to be bought for money, for they were out of ſeaſon. Notwithſtanding, one told him that he ſhould not miſſe of them at Lucullus houſe, for he kept them vp all the yeare through. Why, what then, ſaid he: if Lucullus ryot were not, ſhould not Pompey liue? Therewithall, letting his Phiſitians counſell alone, he made them dreſſe ſuch meate as was euery where common. But of that we will ſpeake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the field with his father, that was in armes againſt Cinna: there lay with him in his tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius, who being bribed with money, had promiſed Cinna to kill him, and other confederators alſo had promiſed to ſet their Captaines tent on fire. This conſpiracie was reuealed vnto Pompey as he ſate at ſupper, which nothing amated him at all, but he drank freely, and was merier with Terentius then of cuſtome. So when it was bed time, he ſtale out of his owne tent, & and went vnto his father to prouide for his ſafetie. Terentius thinking the houre come to attempt his enterpriſe, roſe with his ſword in his hand, and went to Pompeys bed where he was wont to lye, and gaue many a thruſt into the mattreſſe. After he had done that, all the campe ſtraight was in an vprore for the malice they bare vnto their Captaine, and the ſoldiers in all haſt would needs haue gone and yeelded to their enemie, beginning already to ouerthrow their tents, and to truſſe away bagge and baggage. The Captaine for feare of this tumult, durſt not come out of his tent: notwithſtanding Pompey his ſonne ranne amongſt the mutinous ſouldiers, and humbly beſought them with the teares in his eyes, not to do their Captaine this villanie, and in fine threw himſelfe flatling to the ground ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them march ouer him, if they had ſuch a deſire to be gone. The ſouldiers being aſhamed of their follie, returned againe to their lodging, and chaunging mind, reconciled themſelues with their Captaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediatly after that Strabo, Pompeys father, was departed out of the world, Pompey being his heire, was accuſed for the father, to robbe the common treaſure. Howbeit he confeſſed and auowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers infranchiſed bondmen that had ſtolen the moſt part of it, and brought him in before the Iudges. Notwithſtanding, he was accuſed himſelfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cords of hunters nets, and bookes that were taken at Ascvlvm. He confeſſed the hauing of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had loſt them ſince, when Cinna returned vnto Rome with his ſouldiers, who breaking into his houſe by force, ſpoiled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before definitiue ſentence, in which time Pompey ſhewed himſelfe of good ſpirit and vnderſtanding, more then was looked for in one of his yeares: inſomuch he wanne ſuch fame and fauour by it, that Antiſtius being Prætor at that time, and Iudge of his matter, fell into ſuch a liking with him, that ſecretly he offered him his daughter in mariage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, and the parties were ſecretly aſſured. This was not ſo cloſely conueyed, but the people perceiued it, by the care and paines Antiſtius tooke to fauor his matter. Inſomuch, when the Iudges gaue iudgement, & cleared him: all the people together, as if they had bene agreed, cried out with one voice, Talassio, Talassio, being the vsuall and common crie they vsed of old time at mariages in Rome. This custome by report of auncient folke came vp in this manner. At what time the chiefest Peeres and Lords of Rome did rauish the Sabines daughters, which came to Rome to see common sports played, there chaunced a few rascals (as hog-heards or neat-heards) to carie away a goodly faire woman. They fearing she should be taken from them, cryed out in the streetes as they went, Talassio, as if they would haue said, she is for Talassius. This Talassius was a young Gentleman well knowne, and beloued of most men: so that such as heard him but named onely, did clappe their hands for ioy, and cryed out with them, Talassio, commending the choice they had made for him. So, hereof they say came this custome, that euer since they haue cryed this word Talassio vnto them that are newly maried, because the mariage of that faire young maide proued fortunate, and happie vnto Talassius. And this me thinkes soundeth neareſt to the troth of that they report of this wedding crie of Talassio. Shortly after this iudgement giuen, Pompey maried Antistia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accused him for somewhat, whereupon he being afraide, secretly stale away. Now when they could not find him in Cinnaes campe, there ran straight a rumour abroad, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did set vpon him for this occasion. But he thinking to saue himselfe by flying, was straight ouertaken by a priuate Captaine that followed him with his sword drawne in his hand. Cinna seeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and tooke his seale from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tush, said the Captaine, I come not to seale any couenant, but to chastise a villaine and cruell tyrant: and therewithall thrust his sword through him, and slue him presently. Cinna being slaine in this sort, Carbo succeeded him, and tooke the gouernment in hand, being a more cruell tyrant then the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wished for, and desired of the most part of the Romaines, for the grieuous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought themselues happie to chaunge Gouernour: for their citie was brought into such miserie, as hoping no more to see Rome recouer her lost libertie, they desired yet a more tollerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of Italie called Picenvm (now the marches of Ancona) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more great loue and goodwill of the cities for his fathers sake. He seeing that the noblest men of Rome forsooke their houses and goods, to flie from all parts vnto Syllaes campe, as vnto a place of safetie: would not go to him as a fugitiue and castaway to saue himselfe, without bringing him some power to increase his armie, but would honourably go thither with an army, as he that meant first to do himselfe pleasure. So he felt the goodwill of the Picentines, who willingly tooke his part, and reiected them that were sent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping foorth, said: that Pompey which came from schoole the last day, must now in hast be a Captaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time, Pompey being but three and twentie yeares old, tarying to receiue no authoritie from any man, tooke it vpon him of himselfe, and causing a tribunall to be set vp in the middest of the market place of Avximvm, a great populous citie: he commaunded the two brethren called the Ventidians (being the chiefest men of the citie, and they that for Carboes sake withstood his doings) without delay foorthwith to auoide the citie, and so began to leauie men, and to appoint Captaines, Sergeants of bands, Centeniers, and such other officers as appertaine to martiall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the same marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled euery man, and all the rest willingly yeelded vnto him: wherby in short space he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, carts, and all manner of beasts for cariage. In this sort he tooke his iourney towards Sylla, not in hast, as a man afraid to be met with by the way, but by small iourneys, staying still where he might hurt his enemie, causing the cities euery where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuertheless, three Captaines of the contrarie part, Carinna, Cælius, and Brutus, all three did set vpon Pompey together, not all in a front, nor of one side, but in three seuerall places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to haue made him sure at the first onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting foorth his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, hauing placed his horsemen (among the which he was himselfe in person) before the battell of his footemen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were Gavles, coming to giue charge vpon him, he ran one of the chiefest among them through with his his launce and slue him. The other GAVLES seeing him slaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footmen: so that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among themselues, and some fled one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare: came all in to Pompey, and yeelded themselues. Afterwards Scipio the Consull coming against Pompey to fight with him, when both battels were in maner readie to ioyne: before they came to throwing of their darts, Scipioes souldiers saluted Pompeys men, and went on their side: so was Scipio driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo himselfe hauing sent after him diuerse troupes of horsemen by the riuer of Arsis: Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely assaile them, that he draue them into such places, as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon, they seeing no way to scape, yeelded themselues horse and armour, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as soone as he vnderstood of it, fearing lest Pompey should miscarie, being enuironed with so many Captaines of his enemies: he made hast to march towards him for to aide him. Pompey vnderstanding of his approach, commaunded his Captaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their Generall might see them brauely appointed when he should present them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honour, and indeed he did him more honour then Pompey looked for. For when Sylla saw him a farre off comming towards him, and his armie marshalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly men, that so brauely aduaunced themselues, being couragious for the victorie they had obtained of their enemies: he lighted on foote. When Pompey also came to do his dutie to him, and called him Imperator, (as much as Emperour, or soueraigne Prince) Sylla resaluted him with the selfe name, beyond all mens expectation present, litle thinking that he would haue giuen so honourable a name vnto so young a man as Pompey, who had not yet bene Senator: considering that he himselfe did contend for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was answerable to his first kindnesse offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would rise and put off his cap to him, which he did not vnto many other noblemen about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in himselfe. Wherfore when Sylla would straight haue sent him into GAVLE, because Metellus that was there, was thought to haue done no exploit worthy of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience then himselfe: yet if Metellus of himselfe were contented, and would intreate him, that he would willingly go and helpe him to end this war. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVLE, did of himselfe wonderfull exploits, and did so reuiue Metellus old courage and valiantnesse to fight, which now began to faint, like boyling copper that being powred vpon the cold and hard copper, doth melt and dissolue it, as fast or faster then fire it selfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath bene counted very strong, and the chiefest in all games, hauing euer borne the prize away where he hath wrestled, they neuer record among them his childish victories and wrestlings, as things of no account: euen so I am afraid to speak of the wonderfull deeds that Pompey did in his childhood, because they are obscured in respect of the infinite great warres and battels which he had wonne afterwards. For I am afraid that whilest I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe ouer his chiefest acts and most notable enterprises, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had ouercome all ITALIE, and was proclaimed Dictator: he did reward all his Lieutenants and Captaines that had taken his part, and did aduance them to honorable place and dignity in the commonwealth, frankly granting them all that they requested of him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him for his valiantnes, & thinking that he wold be a great stay to him in all his wars: he sought by some meanes to allie him to him. Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to mary Æmylia the daughter of Metella, & of her first husband, the which also was anothers mans wife, and with child by her husband. These mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreable to Pompeys nature and condition: to see Æmylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husband, to marie her great with child, and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her father, and for respect of her husband that did put her away. For Antistius was murthered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take part with Sylla for his sonne in law Pompeys sake:

and her mother voluntarily put her ſelfe to death, ſeeing her daughter receiued ſuch open wrong. By theſe apparant cauſes, theſe vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miſerable tragedie, by means of the death of Æmylia, who ſhortly after miſerably died with child in Pompeys houſe. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that Iland at his deuotion, as a ſafe place to receiue all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo alſo kept the ſea thereabouts with a certaine number of ſhips: that Domitius alſo was gone into AFRICKE: and diuerſe other noblemen that were baniſhed, that had ſcaped his proſcriptions and outlawries, were all in thoſe parts. Againſt them was Pompey ſent with a great armie. Howbeit he no ſooner arriued in SICILE, but Perpenna left him the whole Iland, and went his way. There he fauorably dealt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miſerie, and ſet them againe at libertie, the MAMERTINES onely excepted, which dwelt in the citie of MESSINA. They deſpiſing his tribunall and iuriſdiction, alleaged the auncient order and priuiledge of the ROMAINS, ſet downe in times paſt amongſt them. But Pompey anſwered them in choler: What do ye prattle to vs of your lawe, that haue our ſwords by our ſides? It ſeemeth alſo that Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his miſerie. For ſith he muſt needes dye, as there was no remedie but he ſhould: then it had bene better they had killed him when he was taken: for then they would haue imputed it to his malice that ſo had commaunded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him, that had bene thriſe Conſull at ROME, to be openly examined, and he ſitting in his chaire of ſtate or tribunall, condemned him to die in preſence of them all: to the great offence and miſliking of euery one that was preſent. So Pompey bade them take him away and carie him to execution. When Carbo came to the ſcaffold where he ſhould be executed, and ſeeing the ſword drawne that ſhould ſtrike off his head: he prayed the executioners to giue him a litle reſpite and place to vntruſſe a point, for he had a paine in his belly. Caius Oppius alſo (one of Iulius Cæſars friends) writeth, that he dealt very cruelly in like maner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, ſaid he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and few like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him aſide, and walked a few turnes about: then when he had queſtioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he cõmanded his guard to cary him away, and to diſpatch him. Howbeit we may not giue too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, ſpeaking of Iulius Cæſars friends or foes. For Pompey indeed was cõpelled to make away the greateſt perſonages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriouſly taken: but for the reſt, all thoſe that he could ſecretly ſuffer to ſteale away, he was cõtented to winke at it, and would not vnderſtand it: and moreouer did helpe ſome beſides to ſaue themſelues. Now Pompey was determined to haue taken ſharpe reuenge of the citie of the HIMERIANS, which had ſtoutly taken the enemies part. But Sthenis one of the Gouernours of the citie, crauing audience of Pompey, told him he ſhould do them wrong and iniuſtice, if he ſhould pardon him that committed all the fault, & ſhould deſtroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durſt take vpon him to father the offence of them all. Sthenis anſwered ſtraight, that it was himſelf that had perſwaded his friends, and compelled his enemies to do that which they did. Pompey being pleaſed to heare the franke ſpeech and boldneſſe of this man, firſt forgaue him the fault he had cõmitted, and conſequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey vnderſtanding that his ſoldiers did kill diuers men in the high waies, he ſealed vp all their ſwords, and whoſe ſeale ſoeuer was broken, he was well fauouredly puniſhed. Pompey being buſie about theſe matters in SICILE, receiued letters and cõmiſſion from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediatly into AFRICKE, to make war vpon Domitius with all his power, who had leauied already more men of war, then Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICKE into ITALIE: & had there ouerthrowne all the ROMAINES doings, being become of a fugitiue outlaw, a cruell tyrant. Pompey therupon hauing ſpeedily put himſelfe in readineſſe to take the ſeas, left Memmius his ſiſters husband gouernor of SICILE: and ſo himſelfe imbarked, and hoiſſed ſaile with ſixe ſcore gallies, and eight hundred other ſhips or bottomes, to tranſport their victuals, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage whatſoeuer. After he was landed with all his fleet, part at VTICA, and part at CARTHAGE: there ſtraight came to him ſeuẽ thouſand ſoldiers from the enemies, and yeelded themſelues, beſides ſeuen whole legions that he brought with him. They ſay moreouer, that at his arriuall, he had a pleaſant chaunce happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his ſouldiers ſtumbled on a treaſure by chaunce, and got thereby a great maſſe of money. The reſidue of the armie hearing that, thought thought ſure that the field where this treaſure was found, was full of gold and ſiluer, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereupon, for many dayes after, could haue no rule of his ſouldiers, neither could he chooſe but laugh, to ſee ſo many thouſand men digging the ground, and turning vp the field: vntill in the end they wearied themſelues, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their folly. Domitius came to Pompey with his armie ſet in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quagmire before him that ranne with a ſwift running ſtreame, very ill to get ouer: beſides that, from the very breake of day it had powred downe and rained ſo faſt, and was ſo great a wind withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they ſhould not fight, commaunded his people to truſſe away, and remoue. Pompey on the other ſide, finding this an excellent fit occaſion for him, ſodainly made his men to march, and paſſed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order, were maruellouſly amazed, and in that hurly burly would haue made reſiſtance. But they were neither all together, nor yet euenly ſet in battell ray, and had beſides the wind beating the raine full in their faces. So did the ſtorme much hurt vnto the ROMAINES alſo, for they could not one ſee another: inſomuch as Pompey himſelfe was in great daunger of being killed by one of his owne ſouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and was ſomewhat long before he anſwered him. In fine, when he had ouerthrowne his enemies with great ſlaughter: (for they ſay, that of twentie thouſand of them, there were but three thouſand ſaued) Pompeys ſouldiers ſaluted him by the name of Imperator: but he anſwered them, that he would not accept the honour of that name, ſo long as he ſaw his enemies campe yet ſtanding: and therefore, if it were ſo they thought him worthy of that name, that firſt they ſhould ouerthrow the trench and fort of the enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The ſouldiers when they heard him ſay ſo, went preſently to aſſault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to auoide the like daunger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the campe by force, and in it ſlue Domitius. After that ouerthrow, the cities in that countrey came and yeelded themſelues, ſome willingly, & others taken by force: as alſo they tooke king Iarbas, that had fought for Domitius, & his realme was giuen to Hiempſall. But Pompey, being deſirous further to employ his power, & the good fortune of his armie, went many dayes iourney into the maine land, and ſtill conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMAINES dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that countrey, the which made but ſmall account of them at that time. He ſayd moreouer, that the wild beaſts of AFRICKE alſo ſhould feele the force and good ſucceſſe of the ROMAINES: and thereupon he beſtowed a few dayes in hunting of Lions and Elephants. For it is reported, that in fortie dayes ſpace at the vttermoſt, he had ouercome his enemies, ſubdued AFRICKE, and had ſtabliſhed the affaires of the kings and kingdomes of all that countrey, being then but foure and twentie yeare old. So when he returned vnto the citie of VTICA, letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to diſcharge all his armie, and to remaine there with one legion onely, tarying the comming of another captaine that ſhould be ſent to ſucceed him in the gouernment of that countrey. This commaundement grieued him not a litle, though he made no ſhew of it at all: but his ſouldiers ſhewed plainely that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to giue out broade ſpeeches againſt Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatſoeuer became of them) to forſake him, and they would not that he ſhould truſt vnto a tyrant. Pompey ſeeing that he could not perſwade them, by any reaſon to be quiet, roſe out of his chaire, and retired into his tent weeping. But the ſouldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chaire of ſtate, where he ſpent a great part of the day, they intreating him to remaine there and commaund them, and he deſiring them to obey Sylla, and leaue their mutinies. But in fine, ſeeing them importunate to preſſe him to it, he ſware he would kill himſelfe, rather then they ſhould compell him: yet they ſcant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled againſt him. Sylla when he heard that, ſayd to his friends: Well, then I ſee it is my deſtinie, in mine old dayes to fight with children. He meant ſo, becauſe of Marius the yonger, who had done him much miſchiefe, and had beſides put him in great daunger. But afterwards vnderſtanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in ROME were determined to go and meete Pompey, and to receiue him with all the honor they could: becauſe he would go beyond them all in ſhew of good will, he went out of his houſe to meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to ſay

great, and commanded all them that were present to giue him that name also. This notwithstanding some say, that it was in AFRIKE this name was first giuen him by a common crie of all his whole armie, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. Indeed it is true that Pompey himself being sent Proconsull into SPAINE, long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his letters and commissions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was so cõmonly known and accepted, as no man did enuie it. And therefore rightly is the wisedome of the auncient ROMAINES, to be both commended and had in admiration: which did not onely reward seruice in the field with such honourable names and titles, but ciuill seruice and good gouernement also in peace at home. For there were two whom the people at ROME called Maximi, to say, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwixt the people and Senate. The other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certaine bondmen infranchised, who through their riches and fauour had obtained that place. After that, Pompey required the honor of triumph, but Sylla denied it, alleaging that none could enter in triumph into ROME, but Consuls or Prætors. For sith Scipio the first who in SPAINE had ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, neuer desired this honour of triumph, being neither Consull nor Prætor: much lesse should he stand vpon demaund of triumph into ROME, when that through his yong yeares he was not yet a Senator: and besides, it would purchase him enuie of his honor and greatnes. These reasons did Sylla alleage against Pompey, and told him plainly that if he were bent to stand in it, he would resist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honor the rising, not the setting of the Sun: meaning thereby, how his owne honor increased, and Syllaes diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he said, but perceiuing by their countenãces that stood by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he sayd. When it was told him, he maruelled at the boldnesse of so yong a man, and then cried out twise together, let him then triumph a gods name. Many being offended therwith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger thẽ more, would needes be brought in in triumphant chariot drawne with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from those Kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gate of the citie being too narrow, he was driuen to leaue the Elephants, and was contented to be drawn in with horses. Now his souldiers that had not al things as they looked for, and which was promised them, going about to trouble and hinder his triumph: he sayd he passed not for it, and that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereupon, there was a famous man at that time called Seruilius, who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompeys triumph, who said openly: now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deserueth triumph: being euident enough, that if he would, he might then haue easily bene made Senator: he sued not for that, but as they say, sought honor by a stranger meane lesse honorable. For if he had bene made Senator so yong, it had not bene so great a matter: but to haue such honor before he was Senator, that was maruellously to be noted. But this wan him the more fauor and good will still amongst the common people: for they were glad when after his triumph they saw him in companie amongst the ROMAINE knights. On the other side it spited Sylla to see him come so fast forward, and to rise to so great credite: notwithstanding, being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keepe it to himselfe, vntill that Pompey by force and against Syllaes will, had brought Lepidus to be Consull, by the helpe and good will of the people that furthered his desire. Thereupon Sylla seeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honour him, he sayd vnto him: O yong man, I see thou art glad of this victorie, and so hast thou cause, for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to haue had such fauour of the people, as for thy sake to haue made Lepidus Consull (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the citie. But I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleepe not, and looke well to thy businesse, for thou hast aduanced a dangerous enemie to thy selfe. Now the chiefest thing wherein Sylla discouered most his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his last will and testament: for he gaue legacies vnto euery one of his friends, and some of them he made tutors and ouerseers of his sonne, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding, Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would haue kept Syllaes bodie from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funerals should not be openly solemnized: he contrariwise brought him very honourably and safely to the ground. Shortly after Syllaes death, his words of prophecie vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true. For Lepidus vsurping the authoritie which Sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred straight in armes,

ſtirring vp againe thoſe of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be reuenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, ſpying for occaſion to riſe againe. True it is that his colleague, and fellow Conſull Catulus (whom the beſt and ſoundeſt part of the people followed) was thought a maruellous honeſt man, both iuſt and modeſt: howbeit, a better gouernor in peace, then a good man of warre, inſomuch as time required Pompeys skill and experience. So Pompey ſtood not doubtfull which way he would diſpoſe himſelfe, but tooke part ſtraight with the Nobilitie and honeſteſt men, and was preſently choſen Captaine of their armie againſt Lepidus: who had alreadie wonne the greateſt part of ITALY, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the reſt Pompey eaſily ouercame it: howbeit he lay a long time before MODONA, beſieging of Brutus. In the meane ſeaſon Lepidus came to ROME, and being hard at the walles damaunding the ſecond Conſulſhip, made them afraid in the citie with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all ſorts. Howbeit this feare was cooled ſtraight, by a letter which Pompey ſent to ROME, aduertiſing how he had ended this warre without any bloudſhed: for Brutus, either betraying his armie, or being betrayed of it, yeelded himſelfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certaine number of horſmen that conducted him vnto a litle towne vpon the riuer of Po: where the next day after, Geminius being ſent by Pompey, ſlue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had written letters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put himſelfe into his hands: and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting him to death. This Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwards by the helpe of Caſſius ſlue Iulius Cæſar: howbeit he ſhewed not himſelfe ſo like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did: as we haue declared more at large in his life. Furthermore Lepidus, being driuen to forſake ITALY, fled into SARDINIA, where he died (as it is reported) of a ſickneſſe that he had, not for any ſorrow or griefe of his owne affaires, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his heart, knowing thereby that his wife had played the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius in SPAINE, who was another manner of warrier then Lepidus, and that kept the ROMAINES in great aw: for that all the fugitiues of the late ciuill warres were fled to him, as from the laſt diſeaſe of the warres. He had alreadie ouerthrowne many inferiour Captaines, and was now wreſtling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble ſouldier, but now being old, made warres but ſlowly, and would not couragiouſly take preſent occaſions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimbleneſſe and dexteritie tooke out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when he thought leaſt of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of ſouldiers, and would ſtil lay ambuſhes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heauy armed. Hereupon Pompey keeping his armie alway together, practiſed at ROME, that he might be ſent into SPAINE to ayd Metellus. But Catulus, notwithſtanding that he commanded him to diſperſe his army, Pompey ſtil kept them together by colour of new deuiſes, and was continually about ROME in armes, vntil that by Lucius Philippus meanes he had obtained the gouernement of that country. They ſay that one of the Senators maruelling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: how now Philip, doeſt thou then thinke it meete to ſend Pompey Proconſull (to ſay, for a Conſull) into SPAINE? No truly, ſaid Philip, not Proconſull onely, but pro conſulibus: (to ſay, for both Conſuls) meaning, that both the Conſuls for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was arriued in SPAINE, men began ſtraight to be caried away, (as the maner is commonly where no gouernours be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out proud and bitter words againſt Pompey, ſaying in mockery, he woulld haue no other weapon but rods to whip this yong boy, if he were not afraid of this old woman, meaning Metellus the old man. But notwithſtanding theſe gallant brags, he ſtood better vpon his guard, and went ſtronger to fight then he did before, being afraid of Pompey. For Metellus was very diſſolute of life (which no man would haue iudged in him) and was giuen ouer too much to riot and pleaſure: howbeit they ſaw in him a maruellous ſodaine change, both of his honour and glorie which he vſed before, as alſo the cutting off of his ſuperfluous expence. That thing, beſides that he did honour Pompey greatly by it, wan him alſo much more the goodwill of the people, whē they ſaw that he drew himſelf downe to a ſtraighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne diſpoſition he was a graue man, and temperatly giuen for his deſires. In this war fortune changed diuerſly, as it is commonly ſeene in wars: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the citie of LAVRON.

Pompeys iourney into Spaine againſt Sertorius.

Metellus giuen to riot and pleaſure.

Sertorius wan the city of Lauron in the sight of Pompey.

For he thinking to haue shut him in, and had giuen out some glorious words of the matter, wondred when he saw himself straight compassed in, that he could not stirre out of the campe where he lay, and was driuen besides to see the citie burnt before his face. This notwithstanding, afterwards at a set battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he slue Herennius and Perpenna, both notable souldiers and Sertorius Lieutenants, and with them ten thousand men. This victorie so encouraged Pompey, that he made haste to fight with Sertorius alone, because Metellus should haue no part of the honour of the victorie. So they both met by the riuer of Sucron, about sunne set, both fearing Metellus comming: the one, that he might fight alone, and the other with one alone. In fine, the victory fell out doubtfull in the end of the battell: for either of their wings had the vpper hand. Betweene the two captaines, Sertorius had the greater honour: for he alone ouercame all them that stood before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being on foot, came and set vpon him, and hauing both their swords in their hands, they both lighted vpon their hands, but not both in one sort: for Pompeys hand was but a litle hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut off. Then Pompeys men fell vpon him, all his owne fellowes on that side being fled from him: notwithstanding, beyond all hope, he saued himselfe after a strange sort, by casting vp his horse among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harnesse, hauing a capariſon of great value: and in the meane time while they were busie deuiding this bootie among them, and fighting for it, he escaped their hands. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bands into the field, to confirme the victorie, which either of them supposed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that present time, wherupon Sertorius went his way, and dispersed his armie: for his campe was easily broken, and sodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would sometime wander the fields alone, and at another time againe he would haue a hundreth and fifty thousand fighting men together in the field, like a vehement streame that sometime is dried vp, and that sodainly againe is all of a floud. Pompey after this battel going to welcome Metellus, when they came neare one another, he commaunded his sergeants and officers to put downe their bundell of rods and axes which they caried before him to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man then himselfe. But Metellus would not suffer them, but shewed himselfe equall with him in that, and in all things else, not respecting his senioritie, nor that he had bene Consull, and Pompey not, sauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watchword to all the campe. Notwithstanding, commonly they camped asunder, for their enemie that was so flitting from place to place, and was seene in so sundry places in so short time, cõpelled them to be asunder to foresee the worst, drawing them sodainly from one purpose to another: so that in fine, cutting them off from victuals euery way, spoiling their country, and keeping the sea side, he draue them both out of the prouinces of their charge which they had in SPAINE, & did compel them to go some other where, for lacke of victuals. Pompey in the meane time hauing spent the most part of his goods in this war, sent to ROME for mony to pay his soldiers, threatning the Senate, that if they sent him no money, he would returne with his army into ITALY. Lucullus then being Consull, though Pompeys enemie, procured they should send him money: for he practised to be sent Captaine against king Mithridates, and therefore was afraid to giue Pompey any occasion to returne, who desired nothing more then to leaue Sertorius, to bend his force against Mithridates, whose ouerthrow should be more honorable to him and also lesse dangerous. In the meane space, Sertorius died, being betrayed by those whom he thought his friends, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needs counterfeit his doings, hauing the same meanes, the same furniture, and the same power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towards him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his affaires: he layed a baite for him of ten cohorts which he sent to prey in the fields, commaunding them to disperse themselues abroade as farre as they could, one from another. Perpenna straight tooke the occasion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chase. But Pompey tarying him at the foord, was readie for him with all his armie set in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victorie, and ended all this warre, because the most of the captaines were slaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe of all taken prisoner, whom he presently put to death. But herin Pompey was not to be condẽned of ingratitude nor obliuion (as some do burthen him) of Perpennaes friendship shewed him in SICILIA, but rather deserued praise to haue determined so wisely for the benefite of the commonwealth. For Perpenna hauing in his custodie all Sertorius writings, he shewed letters of the greatest noblemen of ROME, (which

(which were desirous of change of gouernement) willing him to returne into ITALY. Pompey vpon sight of these letters, fearing lest they would breed greater sedition and stirre in ROME, then that which was alreadie pacified: put Perpenna to death as soone as he could, and burnt all his papers and writings, not reading any letter of them. Then Pompey remaining in SPAINE a certaine time, 'till he had pacified all commotions and tumults maruellously out of order, he brought his armie backe againe into ITALIE, and arriued there when the warre of the bondmen and fencers led by Spartacus, was in greatest furie. Vpon his comming therefore, Crassus being sent Captaine against these bondmen, made haste to giue them battel, which he wan, and slue twelue thousand, three hundred of these fugitiue slaues. Notwithstanding, fortune meaning to giue Pompey some part of this honour, fiue thousand of these bondmen escaping from the battell fell into his hands. Whereupon he hauing ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate that Crassus had ouercome the fencers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this warre by the rootes. The ROMAINES receiuing Pompeys letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAINE againe, and the ouerthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in sport, that euer gaue any man else the honor, but vnto Pompey onely. For all this great honour and loue they bare vnto Pompey, yet they did suspect him, and were afraid of him, because he did not disperse his armie, that he would follow Syllaes steps, to rule alone by plaine force. Hereupon as manie went to meet him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this suspition quite out of their heads, telling them that he would discharge his armie after he had triumphed: then his ill willers could blame him for nothing else, but that he was more enclined vnto the people then to the nobility, and that he had a desire to restore the Tribuneship of the people which Sylla had put downe, onely to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which indeed was true. For the common people at ROME neuer longed for thing more, then they did to see the office of the Tribune set vp againe. Yea, Pompey himselfe thought it the happiest turne that euer came to him, to light in such a time, to do such an act. For had any other man preuented him of that, he could neuer haue found the like occasion possibly to haue requited the peoples good wils vnto him, so much as in that. Now therefore this second triumph and first Consulship being decreed by the Senate: that made him nothing the greater, nor better man. And yet was it a shew and signification of his greatnesse, the which Crassus (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of al them that at that time dealt in matters of state, and made more estimation of himselfe then of Pompey and all the rest) neuer durst once demaund: before he had craued Pompeys good will. Pompey was very glad of his request, and had sought occasion of long time to pleasure him: and thereupon made earnest sute vnto the people for him, assuring them he would as much thanke them for making Crassus his colleague and fellow Consull, as he would, for making himselfe Consull. All this notwithstanding, when they were created Consuls, they were in all things contrarie one to another, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Consuls together. Crassus had more authoritie with the Senate, but Pompey had more credite with the people. For he restored them the office of the Tribune, and passed by edict, that the Knights of ROME should haue full power againe to iudge causes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleasant sight also vnto the people, when he came vnto the Censors in person, to pray that he might be dispensed with for going to the warres. For it was an auncient custome in ROME, that the Knights of ROME hauing serued a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, should bring their horse in the middest of the market place before the two Censors, declaring euery Captaine vnder whom they had serued, in what iourneys and countries they had bene: and hauing also deliuered account of their good behauiour and seruice, they then prayed to be dismissed from the warres. Now if it appeared that they had done good seruice, there were they honourably rewarded: or otherwise openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Censors, being honorably set in their tribunall or iudgement seate, taking view of all the ROMAINE Knights that mustered before them, to be seene and examined, they maruelled when they saw Pompey comming at the farther end of the market place, hauing all the markes of a Consull borne before him, and himselfe leading his horse in his hand by the bridle. When Pompey came nearer, and that they saw it was he, he commaunded his sergeants that caried the axes before him, to make roome for him to passe by the barres with his horse, where the Censors sate. Then the people flocked about him, wondring and reioycing, being verie silent. The Censors themselues also were

maruellous glad to ſee him ſo obedient to the law, and did him great reuerence. In fine the elder of the Cenſors did examine him in this ſort: Pompey the great, I pray thee tell me if thou haſt ſerued ſo long time in the warres, as the law doth appoint? Then anſwered Pompey aloud: yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my ſelfe. The people hearing this anſwer, made an open ſhout for ioy, they were ſo glad to heare it: and the Cenſors themſelues came from their iudgement ſeate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his houſe, to pleaſe the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their hands, with great ſignes of ioy. At the end of their Conſulſhip, when miſliking increaſed further betweene Pompey and Craſſus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time neuer ſpake in open aſſembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and told the people openly: how Iupiter had appeared to him in the night, and had commaunded him to tell both the Conſuls from him, that they ſhould not leaue their charge and office, before they were reconciled together. For all theſe words Pompey ſtirred not. But Craſſus firſt tooke him by the hand, and ſpake openly to him before the people: My Lords, I thinke not my ſelfe diſhonoured to giue place to Pompey, ſith you your ſelues haue thought him worthy to be called the great, before he had any haire on his face, and vnto whom you graunted the honour of two triumphs before he came to be Senator. When he had ſaid his mind, they were made friends together, and ſo ſurrendred vp their office. Now for Craſſus, he held on his former manner of life which he had begun. Pompey as neare as he could gaue ouer to pleade men cauſes any more, and began litle and litle to withdraw himſelf from frequenting the market place, and matters of iudgement, comming ſeldome abroad, and when he did, he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rare thing alſo to ſee him any more come out of his houſe, or talke with any man, but he was euer accompanied with a great number, and he reioyced to himſelfe, to ſee that he had alwayes ſuch a traine after him: for that made him to be honoured the more, and gaue him greater countenance to ſee him thus courted, thinking it diſhonour to him to be familiar with meane perſons. For men that riſe by armes, are eaſily deſpiſed, when they come to liue like priuate citizens: becauſe they cannot faſhion themſelues to be companions with the common people, (who citizen-like vſe a common familiaritie together) but looke to be their betters in the citie, as they are in the field. Yea and contrarily, they that do acknowledge themſelues to be their inferiors in warres, will thinke foule ſcorne if they be not their ſuperiours in peace. And by this meanes when they haue a noble warrier among them that followeth publike cauſes (which hath triumphed for many victories and battels he hath obtained) they obſcure his glorie, and make him an vnderling vnto them: whereas they do not otherwiſe enuie any ſouldiers, that are contented equally to giue them place and authoritie, as plainely appeared ſhortly after by Pompey himſelfe. By ſuch an occaſion, the power of pyrats on the ſea, took beginning in the country of Cilicia, which was not reckoned of at the firſt, becauſe it was not perceiued, vntill they grew bold and venturous in king Mithridates warres, being hired to do him ſeruice. And afterwards the Romaines being troubled with ciuill warres, one fighting with another euen at Rome gates, the ſea not being looked to all this while, it ſet them a gogge, and made them go farther then euer they did before. For they did not onely robbe and ſpoile all merchant-venturers by ſea, but rifled alſo all the Ilands and townes vpon the ſea coaſt: inſomuch as then there ioyned with them men of great wealth and nobilitie, and of great wiſedome alſo, and entred into their fellowſhip, as into a commendable facultie. Now they had ſet vp arſenals or ſtore-houſes in ſundrie places, they had ſundrie hauens and beacons on the land, to giue warning by fire all alongſt the ſea coaſt, and thoſe well kept and watched: moreouer, they had great fleets of ſhips readie furniſhed with excellent good galliots of ores, skilful pilots & mariners, their ſhips of ſwift ſaile, & pinnaces for diſcouerie, but withal ſo glorioufly ſet out, that men leſſe hated their exceſſe, then feared their force. For the poopes of their galliots were all guilt, the couerings of the ſame all of purple ſilke, delighting onely to make a glorious ſhew of their pillage. All the ſea coaſt ouer, there was no ſight of any thing but muſicke, ſinging, banqueting, and rioting, priſes of captaines, and men of great qualitie, and ranſomes of a thouſand priſoners: and all this was to the ſhame and diſhonor of the Romaines. Their ſhips were about a thouſand in number, and they had taken aboue 400. townes. They had ſpoiled and deſtroyed many holy temples that had neuer bene touched before. As the temple of the twins in the Ile of Claros, the temple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the citie of Hermion, and the temple of Æſculapius in Epidavrvm: the temples of Neptune in Isthmos, Tænaria, and Calabria: and the temples of

Apollo in ACTIVM, in the Ile of LEVCADES: the temples of Iuno in SAMOS, in ARGOS, and in LVCANIA. They had also many strange sacrifices and certaine ceremonies of religion amongst themselues, in the mount Olympus, and among other, the mysterie of Mithres, which is the Sunne: and remaineth yet in being vnto this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent parts and iniuries they did the ROMAINES vpon the sea, they went a land, and where they found any houses of pleasure vpon the sea coast, they spoyled and destroyed them: and on a time they tooke two ROMAINE Prætors, Sextilius and Bellinus, being in their purple robes, with their sergeants and officers attending on them, and caried them quite away. Another time also they stale away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had receiued honour of triumph) as she went a walking abroade in the fields, and she was redeemed for a great summe of money. But yet the greatest spite and mockerie they vsed to the ROMAINES, was this. That when they had taken any of them, and that he cried he was a citizen of ROME, and named his name: then they made as though they had bene amazed, and afraid of that they had done. For they clapped their hands on their thighes, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgiue them. The poore prisoners thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled themselues as though they seemed fearefull. For some of them came vnto him, & put shooes on his feet: others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the ROMAINE fashion, for feare (sayd they) lest he should be mistaken another time. When they had played all this pageant, and mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their ship ladders, and put him on it, and bad him go his way, he should haue no hurt: and if he would not go of himselfe, then they cast him ouer the boord by force, and sent him packing. These rouers and sea-pyrates had all the sea Mediterraneum at commandement: insomuch there durst not a merchant looke out, nor once traffick that sea. And this was the onely cause that moued the ROMAINES (fearing scarsitie of victuals, and a great dearth) to send Pompey to recouer the signiorie againe of the sea from these pirates. The first man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be onely Admirall or Generall by sea, but should haue absolute power to commaund all maner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge: was Gabinius, Pompeys friend. The summe of this decree gaue him ful power & absolute authoritie of all the sea from Hercules pillars, and of the maine land, the space of foure hundred furlongs from the sea, (for the ROMAINES dominions at that time in few places went further then that: notwithstanding, within that compasse were many great nations and mightie kings.) Furthermore, it gaue him power to choose of the Senate fifteene Lieutenants, to giue vnto euery one of them seuerall prouinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also to take money out of the treasure, of the Generall receiuers of the state, to defray the charges of a fleete of two hundred saile, with full power besides to leauie what men of warre he thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he lifted. This law when it had bene read once ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authoritie did not onely exceed all enuie, but also that it gaue them apparant cause of feare, to giue such absolute power vnto a priuate person. Whereupon they were all against it but Cæsar, who fauoured the decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey as the people, whose fauor he sought. The noble men fell maruellously out with Pompey: and at the length one of the Consuls was very hote with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus steps, but peraduenture he would come short of that end he made. Thereupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus stood vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuie, to speake many goodly things in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, aduised the people to spare him, and not to venture in such dangerous warres (one after another) a man of so great account, as they ought to make of him. If ye chance to loose him, said he, whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: your selfe. Then perceiuing that he lost his labour, seeking to turne the people from their determination: he left it there, and sayd no more. Roscius rose next after him to speake, but he could haue no audience. When he saw that he could not be heard, he made a signe with his fingers, that they should not giue Pompey alone this authoritie, but ioyne another with him. The people being offended withall made such an outcrie vpon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that instant, was stricken blind and fell downe amongst the people. Whereby it appeareth that foule falling out of the ayre to the ground, do not fall for that the ayre is broken or pierced with any force or furie: but because the very breath of the voice (when it commeth with such a violence, as it maketh a very tempest in the aire) doth strike & ouercome them. Thus for that day, the assembly brake vp, & nothing past: and at the day appointed when this decree should passe by voices of the people, Pompey went abroade into the countrie. There being aduertised that the decree was past for the confirmatiō of his charge, he returned againe that night into the citie, because he would auoid the enuie they would haue borne him to haue seene them runne out of all parts of the citie vnto him, to haue waited on him home. The next morning he came abroade, and sacrificed to the gods: and audience being giuen him at an open assembly, he handled the matter so, that they gaue him many things besides to enlarge his power, almost doubling the preparation set downe and appointed at the first decree. Pompeys preparation against the pirates. For he ordained that the common-wealth should arme him fiue hundred ships, and they leauied for him sixe score thousand footmen, and fiue thousand horsemen, and chose besides foure and twentie Senators, which had euery one of them bene Generals of armies, and two generall Treasurers also. While things were thus a preparing, the price of victuals fell by chance: which reioyced the people so much, that they stuck not to say, that the name of Pompey onely had alreadie ended this warre. This notwithstanding, he deuided all the sea betweene the lands into thirteene regions, and in euery of them he appointed a certaine number of his ships, and moreouer, one of his Lieutenants ouer them. Thus hauing dispersed his power all abroade, he brought all the pirates ships that were in a fleete together, within his daunger: and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Now for them that had dispersed themselues betimes, or that otherwise could scape his generall chase: they fled all into Cilicia, as bees into the beehiue, against whom he would needs go himself in person with threescore of his best ships. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had scoured all the Thvscane sea, the coasts of Lybia, Sardinia, Sicile, and of Corsica, of all these theeues which are wont to keepe thereabouts: and this he did within fortie dayes space, taking infinite paines, both himselfe and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Consuls called Piso, did all the best he could to hinder Pompeys preparation, and had discharged his ower-men, for that he enuied Pompeys prosperitie: Pompey sent his ships before to make towards Italie to arriue at the citie of Brvndvsivm. He in the meane time went through Thvscane to Rome, where, so soone as his comming was knowne, all the people ranne out to meete him, as if he had bene absent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to see him, was the sodaine change of victuals vnlooked for, that dayly came to the towne out of all parts. The courtesie of Pompey vnto Piso. But Piso went neare to be depriued of his Consulship: for Gabinius had the decree written, and readie to present to the people. But Pompey would not suffer it. So, hauing gently brought all to passe as he desired, he went vnto the citie of Brvndvsivm, and there tooke sea, and hoised sayle. Now though his hastie voyage, and shortnesse of time made him passe by many good cities without comming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so passe by the citie of Athens, but landed there, and after he had sacrificed to the gods, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the citie, he read two writings that were made in his praise, the one within the gate which said thus:

The humblier that thou dost thy selfe as man behaue,
The more thou dost deserue, the name of god to haue.

And the other writing was without the gate, which said:

We wisht for thee, we waite for thee,
We worship thee, we waite on thee.

Now because Pompey hauing taken certaine of these rouers by sea that kept together, did vse them gently when they required pardon, and hauing their ships and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercie, fled from his other Captaines and Lieutenants, and went and yeelded themselues, their wiues and children into his hands. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of themselues, and by that meanes he came to haue knowledge of the rest, and to follow them where they went, whom he tooke in the end: but knowing that they deserued no pardon, they hid themselues. Yet the most part and the richest of them, had conueyed their wiues, children and goods, and all other their family vnmeete for warres, into strong castles and litle townes vpon mount Taurus: and such men as were able to carie weapon, imbarked, and lay before a citie of Coracesivm, where they tarried Pompey, and gaue him battell, first by sea, and there were ouercome, and afterwards they were besieged by land. Howbeit shortly after, they prayed they might be receiued to mercie,

and thereupon yeelded their bodies, townes, and Ilands which they had fortified, and were hard to haue taken and worse to haue approched. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirats in lesse then three moneths driuen from the sea whersoeuer they were. He wan also a great number of other ships, besides foure score and ten gallies armed with copper spurres. And touching the men whom they had taken (who were in number aboue twentie thousand persons) he did not only consider whether he should put them to death, but also thought it no wise part on the other side to let them go at libertie, to gather force againe, being so great a number of them as indeed they were, and all poore men and souldiers. Therefore weying with himselfe that man by nature is not borne a wild or sauage beast, but contrarily becommeth a brute beast chaunging nature, when he falleth to vice: and againe is made tame and ciuill in time, changing place and manner of life: (as the brute beasts that being wild by nature do also become gentle and tractable, with gentler vsage by continuance) he determined to draw these pirates from the sea into the vpland, and to make them feele the true and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine smal townes of the CILICIANS, that were scant inhabited, and were very glad of them, giuing them land to keep them with. The citie of the SOLIANS also, that not long before had bene destroyed by Tigranes the king of ARMENIA, being desirous to repleniſh that againe, he placed many of them there. He bestowed diuers also in the citie of DYMA in the countrey of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked inhabitants, and had great store of very good land. Now therefore his enemies reproued him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest friends misliked him. For Metellus that gentle person (a cousin to that Metellus which was his colleague, and made warres in SPAINE with him against Sertorius) was sent Prætor into CRETA, before Pompey was chosen Generall against the pyrates. This CRETA, next vnto CILICIA, was euen a second den of pirates. Metellus finding there a great number of these theeues, tooke many of them and put them to death, euen all that came to his hands. Then, such as had scaped from him, being straightly besieged, sent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercie: declaring vnto him, that the Ile of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, becaus all parts of that regiõ from the sea came iust within the compasse limited him on the land. Pompey pardoning them vpon their submissiõ, wrote vnto Metellus, and commanded him to leaue off his war, & therewithall charged all the cities, that they should not obey Metellus commandements. After that he sent Lucius Octauius one of his Lieutenants, who entred into the townes Metellus besieged, and fought for the pirates. This made Pompey not only hated & enuied, but derided also: for that vnder his name he had protected such vile theeues, that had neither God nor law, and giuen them his authoritie to saue their liues, for a litle enuie and emulation he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reproue Achilles, and say that he shewed not the part of a wise man, but of a yong foole besides himself, for desire of glorie making a signe to the GRECIANS, forbidding thẽ to strike at Hector, to the end that as Homer said:

Least he too late should to the battell runne,
When others had the honour of it wonne.

But Pompeys fact was worse then this: for he fought for the common enemies of the world, and onely to depriue a ROMAINE Prætor of triumph, who had done great good seruice to haue destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus left not off his warre for Pompeys letters, but hauing taken the pirates by assault, he put them to death: and afterwards hauing done Octauius open shame through his campe, he let him go. When newes came to ROME, that the pyrates warre was brought to good end, and that Pompey hauing no other seruice in hand, went visiting the cities vp and downe: one Manlius a Tribune of the people, put forth another decree vnto them of this effect: That Pompey taking all the armie Lucullus had, and the prouinces vnder his gouernement, with all BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept: should go make warre vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his hands notwithstanding all his iurisdiction and armie by sea, in as royall manner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monarch and absolute Prince of all the ROMAINE Empire. For by this second decree, he had all these countries, not named in his former commission, added to amplifie his authoritie, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all the armies and forces with the which he had ouercome those two mightie Kings. Then the Senate stucke not so much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, depriuing him of the honour of his doings, to giue it to another, that ſhould rather ſucceede him in honour of triumph, then in danger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifeſt iniurie, and ſhewed themſelues too vnthankfull: but that which moſt grieued them, was to ſee Pompeys power eſtabliſhed in a plaine tyrannie. Hereupon therfore, one of them perſwaded and encouraged an another, ſtoutly to withſtand this edict, and not to ſuffer their libertie to be loſt in this ſort. Notwithſtanding, when the day came that this decree ſhould paſſe, they were ſo afraid to anger the people, that their hearts failed them, and none durſt ſpeake againſt it but Catulus only: that earneſtly inueyed againſt the paſſing of it a long time together, & greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his part, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they ſhould looke to ſeeke out ſome mountaine or high rocke to retire ſafely vnto to defend their libertie, as their auncеſtors and done in old time before them. All this preuailed not, for the decree paſſed by the voices of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his abſence made Lord almoſt of all that, which Sylla by force of armes, and with great effuſion of bloud (hauing made himſelfe Lord of ROME) had before in his power. When Pompey had receiued letters from ROME, aduertiſing him what the people had paſt in his behalfe: ſome ſay that at the receit of them (in the preſence of his familiar friends that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieued him maruellouſly to haue ſuch great offices and charge laid vpon him, one in the necke of another, and burſt foorth in theſe words: O gods, ſhall I neuer ſee an end of ſuch a world of troubles as I haue! Had it not bene better for me to haue bene a meane man borne and vnknowne, then thus continually to be in warre with armour on my backe? What, ſhall I neuer ſee the time, that breaking the neckes of ſpite and enuie againſt me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my countrey with my wife and children? When Pompey ſpake thoſe words, his familiar friends could not abide to ſee his deepe diſſimulation, knowing that beſides his naturall ambition and couetous deſire to rule, he was glad in his heart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deeds forthwith bewrayed. For he preſently ſent out pecepts into euery quarter, commaunding all ſorts of ſouldiers to come to him immediatly, and made all the Princes and Kings within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the countries, altered and changed all that Lucullus had eſtabliſhed before. Furthermore, he did releaſe the penalties enioyned them, and tooke from them alſo the giftes that Lucullus beſtowed of them. In fine, this was all his purpoſe and deſire: to make them that honoured Lucullus know, that he had no further power and authoritie to do any thing. Lucullus finding himſelfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either ſide thought good they ſhould meete and talke together: which came ſo to paſſe, for they met in the countrey of GALATIA. And becauſe they both were Captaines of the ROMAINE armies, & had done many famous acts, they had their ſergeants & officers that caried the bundels of rods before them, wreathed all about with Laurell boughes. When they met, Lucullus came out of a cloſe and woddie countrey, all couered with greene trees; and Pompey one other ſide had paſſed through a great ſandie plaine, where no tree was growing. Thereupon Lucullus ſergeants ſeeing the laurel boughs drie and withered away, which Pompeys ſergeants caried, they gaue them of their greene and freſh boughs to beautifie the rods and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In truth Lucullus had bene Conſul before Pompey, and ſo was he alſo older man then he: yet the dignitie of Pompey was greater, becauſe he had triũphed twiſe. At their firſt meeting, their entertainement and diſcourſe was with great ceremonie and curteſie as might be, one highly praiſing the others deeds, reioycing at each others good ſucceſſe: but at parting, they fel to hot words together, Pompey vpbraiding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompeys ambition, ſo that their friends had much a do to part them. Lucullus departing thence, deuided the lands in GALATIA, which he had cõquered, & beſtowed them & other gifts, on ſuch as he thought good. Pompey on the other ſide camping hard by him, ſpecially commanded the people in euery part to obey him in nothing what he did. and beſides, he took al his ſouldiers from him, leauing him only ſixteene hundred, which he ſuppoſed were ſuch, as for diſdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but ſmal ſeruice. Furthermore, to blemiſh the glory of his doings, he told euery body Lucullus had fought with the pompe and ſhadow only of theſe two kings, and that he had left him to fight with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with ſhields, ſwords, and horſes. Lucullus for reuenge on the other ſide ſaid, that Pompey went to fight but with a ſhadow of war, like a cowardly buzzard that preyeth vpon dead bodies, which others haue

haue ſlaine: and to cut aſunder the remaine of this war ended by another, as he had done before, attributing the honor of the ouerthrow of Sertorius, Lepidus, and Spartacus, to himſelf, where indeed Metellus, Craſſus, and Catulus did ouercome them. And therefore it was no maruell, that he ſought the glorie and honor to triumph for the kingdoms of PONTVS & ARMENIA: ſith that thorough his ſubtill practiſes he had obtained triumph for a few ſlaues and fugitiues. Lucullus being now gone his way, Pompey ſent good garriſons vnto all the coaſts vpon the ſea, frõ the prouince of PHOENICIA, vnto the Realme of BOSPHORVS. That done, he tooke his iourney by land towards Mithridates, who had in his camp thirtie thouſand footmen, and two thouſand horſemen, and yet durſt not offer battell, but camped firſt vpon a mountaine of great ſtrength, and hard to get vp on: notwithſtanding ſhortly after, he forſooke it for lack of water. He was no ſooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it: who, coniecturing by the nature of the plants and trees in that place which were very greene, and alſo by diuers holes he found, that by reaſon thereabouts ſhould be ſome ſprings: he commaunded them to digge Wels in euery corner, ſo that in a very ſhort time all his camp had water enough, aud he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not find that out in al the time he lay there. In the end, he went and camped round about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abidden the ſiege fiue and fortie dayes, fled away with all the choiſe of his armie, vnknowing to Pompey, hauing firſt ſlaine all the ſicke and impotent perſons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him another time by the riuer of Euphrates, and went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would paſſe ouer the riuer before he could preuent him in time, he raiſed his campe againe, and marched away at midnight. About that time, they ſay, that Mithridates ſaw that in a dreame, which did prognoſticate what ſhould happen. He thought, that hauing the wind in the poope of the ſhip, he was vnder ſaile, in the middeſt of the ſea of Mare Boſphorum, and that he was maruellous glad of it, and reioyced with them that ſailed with him, thinking himſelfe certainely paſt all daunger: yet ſodainly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waues of the ſea, vpon a litle peece of the ſhip that was broken, truſting to the mercie of the winds. As he was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come ſo neare, that there was no ſhift, but they muſt needs fight to defend their campe. Thereupon his Captaines ſtraight began to put his men in battell ray, readie to fight. Pompey vnderſtanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venter his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compaſſe them in to keepe them from flying, and then in the morning to ſet vpon them more eaſily, his men being the better ſouldiers. But Pompeys old captains were ſo earneſtly in hand with him to perſwade him they might fight, that in the end he was contented they ſhould giue charge. Now it was not ſo darke but they could ſomewhat ſee, for the Moone that was very low and vpon her ſetting, gaue light enough to diſcerne the bodie of a man: yet becauſe the Moone was very low, the ſhadow which gaue out further farre then their bodies, came almoſt euen to their very enemies, which did let them that they could not certainely iudge what ſpace of ground was betweene them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they caſt their darts at the ROMAINES, but they hurt neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMAINES perceiuing that, ran vpon them with great cries. But the barbarous people durſt not abide their charge they were ſo afraid, but turned their backs, and ran away for life, ſo that they were ſlaine downe right. Thus were there ten thouſand of the barbarous people ſlaine and more, and their campe alſo taken. As for Mithridates himſelfe, at the beginning of the onſet, he made a lane through the ROMAINES with eight hundred horſemen, and paſſed cleane through them. But incontinently his men diſperſed vpon it, ſome one way, ſome another way, ſo that he was left alone but with three perſons only, whereof Hypſicratea was one of the number, which had euer bene valiant and had a mans heart: whereupon, for that cauſe Mithridates called her Hypſicrates. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of PERSIA, and mounted alſo on a horſe after the PERSIAN maner, was neuer wearie with any long iourney the King made, nor neuer left to wait vpon his perſon, and to look to his horſe: vntil ſuch time as the king came to a ſtrong caſtle called Inora, where was great ſtore of gold & ſiluer, and the kings chiefeſt treaſure. Then Mithridates tooke off his richeſt apparel he had there, and gaue it amongſt them that were about him at that time, and a deadly poiſon beſides to euery one of his friends to cary about them, becauſe they ſhould not (vnleſſe they would themſelues) fal into their enemies hands aliue. From thence he thought to take his iourney into ARMENIA vnto King Tigranes.

Howbeit Tigranes ſent to let him,and further proclaimed by trumpet,that he would giue a hundred talents to him that could kill him. Thereupon, paſſing by the head of the riuer of Euphrates,he fled through the country of COLCHIDE. In the meane time,Pompey inuaded the countrey of ARMENIA, at the requeſt of Tigranes the yonger, who was reuolted againſt his father, and went to meete with Pompey at the riuer of Araxes, which hath his beginning almoſt about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the Eaſt,and falleth into Mare Caſpium. So they both together marched on further into the country,receiuing ſuch townes as yeelded vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had bene conſumed and deſtroyed by Lucullus) vnderſtanding that Pompey was of a mild and gentle nature,he receiued his garriſons into his ſtrongeſt forts and royall houſes,and went himſelfe with his friends and kinſmen to meete Pompey,and to yeeld himſelfe vnto him. When he came hard to his camp,being a horſe-back,there came out two ſergeants of Pompeys,& commanded him to light and go in a foote,for there was neuer man ſeene a horſe-back within the ROMAINES camp. Tigranes did not onely obey them,but further plucked off his ſword and gaue it them: and in fine,when he came almoſt to Pompey, taking off his royall hat from his head, he would haue layd it at Pompeys feete,and falling downe moſt ſhamefully on the ground,imbaſed himſelfe to embrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey himſelf preuented him,and taking him by the hand,made him to ſit downe by him on the one ſide of him, and his ſonne on the other. Then he ſaid vnto them both: as for the other loſſes you haue ſuſtained heretofore,you muſt thank Lucullus for them,who hath taken from you SYRIA,PHOENICIA,CILICIA,GALATIA,and SOPHENA: but for that you haue left you till my comming,I wil let you enioy it,paying to the ROMAINES a fine of ſixe thouſand talents for the iniurie you had done them,prouided alſo,that your ſon haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his part. Tigranes accepted the conditions of peace. The ROMAINES then ſaluted him king. He was ſo glad thereof,that he promiſed to giue euery ſouldier halfe a Mina,euery Centener ten Minas,and to euery Colonell of a thouſand men a talent. His ſonne was very angrie withall: inſomuch as Pompey ſending for him to come to ſupper to him, he anſwered againe, that was not the friendſhip he looked for at Pompeys hands, for he ſhould find many other ROMAINES that would offer him that curteſie. Pompey for his anſwer, clapped him vp as a priſoner,and kept him to be led in triumph,at ROME. Shortly after,Phraates king of PARTHIA ſent Ambaſſadors to Pompey to demaund this yong Prince,that was his ſonne in law, and to tell him that the riuer of Euphrates muſt be the vttermoſt confines of his conqueſts. Pompey anſwered againe,that Tigranes had more right to his ſonne,then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders,that he would do it with iuſtice. So,leauing Afranius in ARMENIA,to keepe the country,Pompey paſſed by other nations which inhabite about mount Caucaſus, hauing Mithridates in chaſe: of which nations, two of the chiefeſt and of greateſt power, are the ALBANIANS and IBERIANS. The IBERIANS do ſtretch out vnto mount Moſchium, and to the realme of PONTVS. The ALBANIANS lie towards the Eaſt,and Mare Caſpium. Theſe men firſt ſuffered Pompey to paſſe through their countrey, vpon his ſending to them. But winter hauing ſtolen vpon the ROMAINES while they were there, and they buſily occupied about Saturnes feaſts: the barbarous people hauing leauied aboue fortie thouſand fighting men in one camp together,came and paſſed ouer the riuer of Cyrnus. (This riuer commeth from the mountaines of the IBERIANS,and receiuing the riuer of Araxes into it, which paſſeth through ARMENIA,diſperſeth it ſelfe into twelue ſeueral mouthes,and ſo falleth into Mare Caſpium. Some notwithſtanding hold opinion,that Cyrnus receiueth not the riuer of Araxes into it,but that it runneth by it ſelfe,and falleth into the ſame ſea,neare vnto the mouthes of the other.) Pompey might if he had would haue kept them from comming ouer the riuer, yet did he ſuffer them quietly to paſſe ouer. When they were all ouer,he went againſt them,ouercame them in battel,and ſlue a great number of them in the field. Afterwards he pardoned their King,ſubmitting himſef vnto Pompey by his Ambaſſadors,and made peace with him. Then from thence he went againſt the IBERIANS: who were no leſſe in number, then the ALBANIANS were at the firſt, and alſo better ſouldiers,and were reſolutely bent to do good ſeruice vnto Mithridates,and to driue out Pompey. Theſe IBERIANS, were neuer ſubiect to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and ſcaped alſo frō being ſubiect to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexander neuer ſtaid in the country of HYRCANIA: whom alſo Pompey ouercame in a great and bloudie battell,hauing ſlaine 9. thouſand in the field,and taken ten thouſand priſoners. Frō thence he went into the country of COLCHIDA. There Seruilius met him by the riuer of Phaſis, with the fleete of ſhips with the which he

he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to follow Mithridates further, who had hid himselfe amongst a people that were neighbours vnto the straights of BOSPHORVS, and the marishes Mæotides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore also, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them. Thereupon he passed againe ouer the riuer of Cyrnus, with great paine and daunger, because the barbarous people had made a strong defence a great way alongst the riuer side, with a maruellous number of great trees, feld and layed a crosse one ouer another. Furthermore, when he had with great difficultie passed through them, he fell into an euill-fauoured countrie, where he should trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereupon he caused ten thousand goates skinnes to be filled with water, and so went forward to meete with his enemies, whom he found by the riuer of Abas, being sixe score thousand footmen, and twelue thousand horsemen, but all (or the most of them) ill armed with wild beasts skinnes. Their Chieftaine was Cosis the kings owne brother. He, when the battell was begun, flew vpon Pompey, and threw a dart at him, and hurt him in the flancke. Pompey on the other side, ranne him through with his launce on both sides, and slue him starke dead. Some say also, that there were certaine AMAZONES at this battell, which fought on the barbarous peoples side, comming from the mountaines that run alongst the riuer of Thermodon. For, after the ouerthrow giuen, the ROMAINES spoyling the dead, found targets and buskins of the AMAZONES, but not a bodie of a woman among them. They also do inhabite on the side of the mountaine Caucasus, that looketh towards Mare Hyrcanium, and do not border vpon the ALBANIANS: but the GELE, and the LELEGES are betweene them, with whom they companie two moneths onely euery yeare, meeting together by the riuer of Thermodon, all the rest of the yeare, they liue a part by themselues. After this last battell, Pompey going to inuade the countrey of HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinit number of deadly venimous serpents which he met with, being come within three daies iourney of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the lesse, and there receiued presents which were sent vnto him from the kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES, & wrote very curteously vnto them againe: howbeit he sent Afranius with part of his armie against the king of the PARTHIANS, who had inuaded the countrie of GORDIENA, and harried and spoiled the king Tigranes subiects. Notwithstanding, he draue him out, and followed him vnto ARBELITIDE. Furthermore, all the lemmans and concubines of king Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but sent them all home againe to their parents & friends, because the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, of noblemen, or of Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans, had most credit about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left all the charge of his castell, where the greatest part of his treasure of gold and siluer lay, was a singers daughter, who as they said, was not rich, but an old man. She hauing sung one night before Mithridates, being at supper, he fell in such fancy with her, that he would needs haue her lye with him the same night, and the old man her father went home offended, because the king would not so much as giue him one gentle word. But the next morning when he rose, he maruelled to see the tables in his house full of plate of gold and siluer, and a great company of seruingmen, groomes of chamber & pages, & that they had brought him maruellous rich apparell, and a horse ready at the gates brauely furnished, as the kings familiars did vse when they went abroad into the city: he thought it was done in mockery, to haue made sport with him, and therfore would haue run his way, had not the seruingmen kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that died of late, which the king had bestowed on him, & that all this he saw, was but a litle portion in respect of the other goods and lands he gaue him. So the old man beleeuing thē, at the length did put on this purple gown they brought him, and got vp on horseback, & riding through the streets, cried, All is this mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to scorne for it, he told thē: masters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crie out, but rather, that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so mad for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we haue told you. She did then deliuer this castell into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly rich presents: but he would take none of them, other then such as serued to adorne the temples of the gods, and to beautifie his triumph, and left all the rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the king of the IBERIANS, hauing sent him a bed-stead, a table, and a chaire of cleane gold, praying him to take it as a remembrance from him: he deliuered it ouer vnto the Treasurers custodie, to be accountable for it vnto the ſtate. In another caſtell called Cœnon, he found certaine ſecret letters ſent from Mithridates, which pleaſed him maruellouſly to reade, becauſe thereby he plainly vnderſtood the kings nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poiſoned (beſides many other) Ariarathes his owne ſonne, and Alcæus the SARDINIAN, becauſe he had won the bell, at the horſe-race before him. There was alſo interpreting of dreames, that either himſelfe or his wiues had dreamed, and alſo loue-letters betwixt Monime and him. Theophanes writeth alſo, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he intiſed and perſwaded Mithridates to put all the ROMAINES to death that were in ASIA. Howbeit in reaſon men thinke, that this was a ſhamefull lye, maliciouſly deuiſed by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, becauſe he was but a counterfeit to him: or peraduenture to gratifie Pompey, whoſe father Rutilius in his hiſtories deſcribeth to be as wicked a man as euer liued. Thence Pompey departed towards the citie of AMISVS. There his ambition brought him to commit ſuch facts, as he himſelfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemie being yet aliue, he tooke vpon him to eſtabliſh lawes, to giue gifts, and diſtribute ſuch honours, as Captaines that had obtained victorie were wont to do, when they had ended all war and trouble. For he himſelf (Mithridates being yet the ſtronger in the realme of BOSPHORVS, and hauing a great puiſſant army about him) did all that which he reproued another for, appointing prouinces, and giuing out gifts to euery man according as he deſerued: to gratifie twelue barbarous kings, with diuers other Princes, Lords and Captaines that came to him thither. Writing alſo to the king of PARTHIA, he diſdained to giue him that title, which others were wont to do in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kings. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great deſire to winne SYRIA, and to go through the countrie of ARABIA, euen vnto the red ſea, becauſe he might enlarge his conqueſts and victories euery way, euen vnto the great ſea Oceanum, that compaſſeth all the whole earth. For in LYBIA, he was the firſt ROMAINE that conquered all to the great ſea. On the other ſide, in SPAINE he enlarged the Empire of ROME, and brought the confines therof vnto Mare Atlanticum. And thirdly, hauing lately the ALBANIANS in chaſe, he came almoſt vnto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he put himſelfe in iourney, intending his circuit vnto the red ſea, ſpecially becauſe he ſaw Mithridates ſo ill to follow, and worſe to ouercome by force when he fled, then when he fought any battell: and that made him ſay, that he would leaue a ſharper enemie behind him, then himſelfe: and that he meant, famine. For he appointed ſouldiers with ſufficient number of ſhips, to lye in wait for the merchants that ſailed to the conntrey of BOSPHORVS, to carie them any victuals or other merchandizes, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that ſhould attempt it. Then he went forward with the beſt part of his armie, and in his way, found the bodies of dead ROMAINES which Mithridates had ouerthrowne vnder the leading of Triarius their Captaine, and were yet vnburied. So he cauſed them all to be taken vp, and honorably buried. Lucullus hauing forgotten, or otherwiſe neglected to do it, in my conſcience that was the chiefeſt cauſe why his men did hate him. Pompey now hauing by Afranius ſubdued the ARABIANS, dwelling about mount Amanus, went himſelfe in perſon into SYRIA, and made a gouernment & prouince of it, being won to the ROMAINE Empire, for that it lacked a lawfull king: & conquered all IVRIE alſo, where he tooke king Ariſtobulus, aud builded certaine cities there, & deliuered others alſo from bondage, which by tyrants were forcibly kept, whom he chaſtiſed well enough. Howbeit he ſpent the moſt part of his time there, deciding of controuerſies, pacifying of contentions and quarels by arbiterment, which fell out betwixt the free cities, princes and kings, and ſent of his friends into thoſe places where he could not come himſelfe. For on a time when he was choſen arbitrator betwixt the PARTHIANS & the ARMENIANS, touching the title of a country which both parties claimed: he ſent three Commiſſioners thither to iudge definitiuely betwixt them both. If Pompeys fame and renowne were great, no leſſe was his vertue, iuſtice and liberalitie, which indeed did hide many faults, his friends and familiars about him did commit. For truly he was of ſo gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet puniſh them when they had offended. Notwithſtanding, he did vſe them ſo well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter: that he made them contented, patiently to beare their couetouſneſſe and ſtraight dealing. One of his chiefeſt familiars about him whom he loued beſt, was called Demetrius, a bondman infranchiſed, who otherwiſe was very diſcreet in his doings, but being ſomewhat too bold of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philoſopher being at that time a young man, yet of good iudgement and of a noble mind, in

The power & inſolencie of Demetrius, Pompeys infranchiſed bondman.

Pompeys abſence went to ſee the citie of ANTIOCH. Now for himſelfe, his maner was alwaies to go on foot, and all his friends beſides that did accompany him to honor him, were on horſeback. He perceiuing a farre off, a great ſort of people comming towards him all in white, and of one ſide of the ſtreet litle children, and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring: at the firſt he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his ſake to honour him, that they made this proceſſion, which he in no wiſe would haue had done. Thereupon he commaunded his friends to light from their horſes, and go on foot with him. But when they came neare to the gate of the citie, the maiſter of the ceremonies that led this proceſſion, hauing a garland on his head, and a rod in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them, where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Catoes friends laughed to heare this queſtion: then ſaid Cato: Alaſſe poore citie, and ſo paſſed by it. Notwithſtanding, Pompey himſelfe was cauſe that Demetrius had the leſſe ill will borne him, then otherwiſe he ſhould haue had: becauſe they ſaw how boldly he would vſe Pompey, and how well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden ſome to dinner or ſupper, while he was entertaining and welcoming of them, and would tarie till they were all come: Demetrius would be ſet at the boord, and preſumptuouſly haue his head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of this iourney, he had alreadie purchaſed the goodlieſt houſes of pleaſure, and faireſt walkes that were about ROME, and had ſumptuous gardens alſo, the which the people commonly called Demetrius gardens: though his maiſter Pompey was but meanely houſed till his third Conſulſhip. Howbeit afterwards, he built that famous ſtately Theater, called Pompeys Theater, and ioyned vnto that alſo another houſe, as a penthouſe to his Theater, farre more ſumptuous and ſtately then the firſt, and yet no more then needed. Inſomuch as he that was owner of it after him, when he came into it, he maruelled, and asked whereabouts it was, that Pompey dined and ſupped. Theſe things are reported thus. Now the king of the ARABIANS, that dwelt about the caſtell called Petra, hauing neuer vntill that time made any account of the ROMAINES army, was then greatly afraid of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his deuotion, to do what he would command him. Pompey thereupon to proue him, whether he meant as he ſpake: brought his army before this caſtell of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, becauſe they iudged it was an occaſion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, againſt whom they would haue had him rather haue bent his force, being an auncient enemie to ROME, and that began to gather ſtrength againe, and prepared (as they heard ſay) to leade a great army through SCYTHIA and PANNONIA into ITALIE. But Pompey thinking he ſhould ſooner miniſh his power by ſuffering him to go on with warres, then that he ſhould otherwiſe be able to take him flying: would not toile to follow him in vaine. And for theſe cauſes he would needes make wars in other places, and linger time ſo long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not far from the caſtell of Petra, and had lodged his campe for that day: as he was riding and managing his horſe vp and downe the campe, poſtes came flinging to him from the realme of PONTVS, and brought him good newes, as was eaſily to be diſcerned a farre off by the heads of their iauelins, which were wreathed about with lawrell boughs. The ſouldiers perceiuing that, flocked ſtraight about him: but Pompey would make an end of his riding firſt, before he read theſe letters. Howbeit they crying to him, and being importunate with him, he lighted frō his horſe, and returned into his campe, where there was no ſtone high enough for him to ſtand vpon to ſpeake vnto thē, and againe, the ſouldiers would not tarie the making of one after the maner of their campe, which men of war do make themſelues, with great turues of earth, laying one of them vpon another: but for haſt and earneſt deſire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they layed together a heape of ſaddles one vpon another, and Pompey getting vp on them, told how Mithridates was dead, and had killed himſelfe with his owne hands, becauſe his ſonne Pharnaces did rebell againſt him, and had wonne all that which his father poſſeſſed: writing vnto him, that he kept it for himſelfe and the ROMAINES. Vpon theſe newes, all the campe ye may imagine, made wonderfull ioy, and did ſacrifice to the gods, giuing them thanks, and were as merie, as if in Mithridates perſon alone, there had dyed an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occaſion, hauing brought this warre more eaſily to paſſe then he hoped for, departed preſently out of ARABIA, and hauing ſpeedily in few dayes paſſed through the countries lying by the way, he came at length to the citie of AMISVS. There he found great preſents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kings bloud, and amongst the rest, Mithridates corse, which could not well be discerned by his face, because they that had the carying of his body had forgotten to drie vp the braine: neuertheless, such as desired to see him, knew him by certaine skarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wise see him: but to auoid enuie, sent him away vnto the citie of SINOPE. He wondred much at the maruellous sumptuous rich apparell and weapons that he ware. The scabbard of his sword (which cost foure hundred talents) was stolen by Publius, and sold to Ariarathes. Also a hat of Mithridates of wonderfull workemanship, being begged of Caius his foster brother, was secretly giuen to Faustus the son of Sylla, without Pompeys priuity. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderstood of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey hauing ordered all things, and established that prouince, went on his iourney homewards with great pompe and glorie. So comming vnto MITYLENE, he released the citie of all taxes and payments for Theophanes sake, and was present at a certaine play they yearely make for games, where the Poets report their works, contending one with another, hauing at that time no other matter in hand, but Pompeys acts and gests. Pompey liked exceeding well the Theater where these playes were made, and drew a modell or platforme of it to make a statelier then that in ROME. As he passed by the citie of RHODES, he would needs heare al the Rhetoricians dispute, and gaue euery one of them a talent. Posidonius hath written the disputation he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rhetoritian, vpon the theame and proposition Pompey selfe did giue them, touching the general question. Pompey did the like at ATHENS vnto the Philosophers there. For he gaue towards the reedifying of the city againe, fifty talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALIE, to haue bene very honorably receiued, and longed to be at home, to see his wife & children, thinking also that they long looked for him: but the god that hath the charge giuē him to mingle fortunes prosperity, with some bitter sop of aduersity, laid a block in his way at home in his owne house, to make his returne more sorrowfull. For Mutia his wife had in his absence played false at tables. But Pompey being then farre off, made no account of the reports nor tales that were told him. Howbeit, when he drew neare vnto ITALIE, and that he was more attentiue to giue eare to the ill reports he heard: then he sent vnto her to tell her, that he refused her for his wife, writing nothing to her at that time, neither euer after told the cause why he had forsaken her. Notwithstanding, in Ciceroes Epistles the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumours ran abroad in ROME, which troubled them sore, being giuen out that he would bring his armie straight to ROME, and make himselfe absolute Lord of all the ROMAINE Empire. Crassus thereupon, either for that he beleeued it indeed to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the accusation true, and the enuie towards Pompey the greater: conueyed himselfe, his family, and goods sodainly out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into ITALIE, called all his souldiers together, & after he had made an oration vnto them, as time and occasion required: he commanded them to seuer themselues, and euery man to repaire home to apply his businesse, remembring to meet at ROME together, at the day of his triumph. His army being thus dispersed, & straight reported abroad for newes: a maruellous thing hapned vnto him. The cities seeing Pompey the Great without souldiers, hauing but a small traine about him of his familiar friends only: went all of them to meet him, not as though he were returned home from his great conquests, but from some iourney taken for his pleasure. Such was the loue of the people to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he wold or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into ITALIE: so that if he had bene disposed to haue made any innouation in the commonwealth, he had not needed his army. In those daies there was a law, that no man shold enter into ROME before his triumph: whereupon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray thē to defer the chusing of Consuls for a few daies, because he might be present to further Piso, who sued for the Consulship that yeare. They denyed him his request, by Catoes means that hindred it. Pompey maruelling to heare of his boldnes & plain speech, which he only vsed of all other to defend his iust causes, had a maruellous desire to win him, & to make him his friend. So Cato hauing 2. neeces, Pompey desired to mary the one himselfe, & the other for his son. But Cato mistrusting this desire of Pompeys, that it was a colour onely to win and corrupt him, denied him flatly. His wife & sister on the other side, they were angry with him for refusing to make alliance with Pompey the great. About that time it chanced, that Pompey being very desirous to prefer Afranius to be Consul, he caused certaine mony to be giuen amongst the tribes of the people, & the same was deliuered out to some, euen in his own gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the city, euery man spake ill of Pōpey: that he put the Cōsulship to sale for mony vnto vnto those that could not deserue it by vertue, sith himselfe onely had obtained it by purchase, of many a noble and worthie deed. Then said Cato to his wife and sister: Loe now, we had bene partakers of this fault too, had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to refuse the match, for equitie and his honour. But now to his triumph. For the stateliness and magnificence thereof, although he had two daies space to shew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the shew, that were not seene, which would haue serued to haue set out another triumph. First there were tables caried, whereon were written the names and titles of all the people and nations for the which he triumphed, as these that follow: The kingdome of PONTVS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, IBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, and MESOPOTAMIA: and furthermore, the people that dwell about PHOENICIA and PALÆSTINE, IVDÆA, and ARABIA: and all the pyrates which he had ouercome both by sea and by land, in all parts of the world. In all these countries he tooke about a thousand castles, few lesse then nine hundred townes and cities: of pyrates ships eight hundred, and nine and thirtie desolate townes left without inhabitants, repleniſhed againe with people by him. Moreouer, these tables declared, that the reuenue of the commonwealth of ROME before these conquests he made, amounted yearely but to fiue thousand Miriades: and that from thencefoorth with the summes he had added vnto the former reuenue, they should now receiue eight thousand and fiue hundred Miriades: and that he brought presently in readie gold and siluer, and in plate and iewels, to put into the common treasurie, the value of twentie thousand talents, besides that which had bene distributed already amongst the souldiers: of the which, he that had least for his share, had 15 hundred Drachmas. The prisoners that were led in the shew of this triumph, besides the Captaines of the pyrates, were these that follow: The sonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife and daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himselfe, called Zosime: Aristobulus king of IVRIE: Mithridates sister with fiue sonnes of hers, and some Ladies of SCYTHIA. The hostages also of the IBERIANS and the ALBANIANS, and also of the kings of the COMMAGENIANS: ouer and besides a great number of other markes of triumphs which himselfe or his Lieutenants had wonne at sundrie battels in diuers places. But the greatest honour that euer he wan, and which neuer other Consull of the ROMAINES but himself obtained, was this: that he made his third triumph of the three parts of the world. Diuers other ROMAINES had triumphed thrise before him, howbeit he first triumphed of AFRICKE: the second time of EVROPE: the third time of ASIA. So that it appeared by these three triumphs, that he had triumphed in maner of all the land that is inhabited, being at that time (as it is reported by them which compare his doings vnto Alexander the Great) vnder 34 yeares of age, though in troth at that time he was neare fortie. O happie had it bene for him, if he had died when he had Alexanders fortune: for all his life afterwards, made his prosperitie hatefull, or his aduersity miserable: imploying the honour and authoritie he had gotten by his valiantnesse, fauouring mens vniust causes: the more he furthered thē, the more he lessened his honor, & vnwares brought his greatnesse to nothing. For like as when the strongest places of a citie, which receiuing their enemies into them, do giue them the benefite of their owne strength: euen so, through Pompeys power, Cæsar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the selfe same meanes he imploied to the ouerthrow of others. And thus it fortuned: Lucullus at his returne out of ASIA (where Pompey had vncourteously vsed him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to ROME. For the Senate did counsell and incourage him to deale in the affaires of the state, seeing him waxe very slow, & giuen too much to his ease and pleasure, by reason of his great wealth he had gottē. So when Pompey was come, he began to speak against him, and through the friendship and assistance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in ASIA, which Pompey had broken and reiected. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driuen to haue recourse vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in friendship with light young men. Of the Tribunes, the most impudent and vilest person was Clodius: who receiued him, and made him a prey vnto the people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, and against his honour caried him vp & downe the market place after him, to speake as occasion serued to confirme any matter or deuice which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recōpence of his goodwill, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficiall for him) that he would forsake Cicero, who was his friend, and had done much for him in matters of cōmonwealth. Pompey granted his request. Therupon Cicero being brought in danger of law, and requiring Pompeys friendſhip to helpe him, he ſhut his doore againſt them that came to ſpeake in his behalfe, and went out himſelfe at another backe doore. Cicero thereupon fearing the extremitie of law, willingly forſooke ROME. At that time, Iulius Cæſar returning home from his Prætorſhip out of SPAINE, began to lay ſuch a plot, that preſently brought him into great fauour, and afterwards much increaſed his power, but otherwiſe vtterly vndid Pompey and the common wealth. Now he was to ſue for his firſt Conſulſhip, and conſidering the enmitie betwixt Pompey and Craſſus, if he ioyned with the one, he made the other his enemie: he deuiſed to make them friends, a thing ſeeming of great honeſtie at the firſt ſight, but yet a peſtilent deuice, and as ſubtill a practiſe as could be. For the power of the citie being before deuided into two parts (as a ſhip euenly balleſt of each ſide) maintained the common wealth vpright: and being now brought into one mans power, there was no poſſibilitie to withſtand it, ſo that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon, Cato wiſely told them afterwards, that ſaid the ciuill warres betwixt Pompey and Cæſar was cauſe of the deſtruction of the commonwealth: that their enmitie and diſcord was not the chiefe originall cauſe of this miſerie, but rather their friendſhip and agreement. For by their friendſhip Cæſar was choſen Conſull, who ſtraight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for the reſtoring of the colonies belonging to ROME, and for diſtributing of lands to them that had none, imbaſing the maieſtie and dignitie of the chiefe Magiſtrate, and making the Conſulſhip in maner no better then the Tribuneſhip of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellow Conſull, did what he could to reſiſt him, and Cato alſo did aide him to his power: vntil Cæſar openly brought Pompey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did giue his conſent to the decrees which he did ſet foorth. Pompey anſwered him, he did. Why then, ſaid Cæſar, if any man will by force let the paſſing of this law by voyces of the people, wilt thou then come to helpe them? Yes that I will indeed, ſaid Pompey: againſt them that threaten with the ſword, I will bring both ſword and target. Pompey in all his life neuer did nor ſpake thing that men more miſliked, then that which he ſaid at that time. His friends excuſed him, and ſaid it was a word paſſed his mouth before he was aware: but his deeds afterwards ſhewed, that he was altogether at Cæſars commaundement. For not many dayes after, he maried Iulia the daughter of Cæſar, which was affianced, or made ſure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Cæpioes anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in mariage, whom he had alſo promiſed before vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla: and Cæſar alſo maried Calphurnia, the daughter of Piſo. After this, Pompey filling all ROME with ſouldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Conſull Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they ſodainly ſet vpon him, and brake the bundels of rods which his officers caried before him: & ſome one, whatſoeuer he was, caſt a basket of horſe dung vpon his head. Moreouer, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were alſo very ſore hurt. By this meanes, hauing cleared the market place of all their enemies, they paſſed the law for diuiſion of lands, as they would themſelues. The people being fleſhed with this baite, were contented to be ruled by thē as they would, and would neuer ſticke at any matter that they would haue paſſed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was againſt: & they appointed vnto Cæſar alſo, the gouernment of the GAVLES on this ſide & beyond the Alpes: and ILLYRIA for 5. yeares ſpace, with foure whole legions. The next yeare following were appointed Cōſuls, Piſo Cæſars father in law, and Gabinius the greateſt flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things ſtood in theſe tearmes, Bibulus though he were Conſull, kept himſelfe cloſe in his houſe for 8. moneths ſpace, and onely ſent out bils, and ſet them vp on euery poſt in open places, accuſing Pompey & Cæſar. Cato on the other ſide, as if he had bene inſpired with the ſpirit of propheſie, told openly in the Senate houſe, what would become of the commonwealth & Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay ſtill and tooke his pleaſure, & would no more meddle in the commonwealth. At that time it was that Pompey ſaid: it was more vnſeaſonable for an old man to follow his pleaſure, then to attend matters of the cōmonwealth. Yet himſelfe ſhortly after was ſo doted of his yong wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the country, and in his gardens, and leaue all affaires of waight aſide. Wherupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, deſpiſed Pompey, and began to enter into ſeditious attempts. For when he had driuen Cicero out of ROME, and had ſent away Cato to make warres in CYPRVS, and that Cæſar alſo was occupied in GAVLE, and finding that the people in like caſe were at his commaundement, becauſe to flatter them he did what they would haue him: he attempted incontinently to vndo ſome things that Pompey had had eſtabliſhed. Amongſt other things, he tooke yong Tigranes out of priſon, & euer caried him vp & downe with him whereſoeuer he went, and cõtinually pict quarrels vnto Pompeys friends, to try what credite he had. In the end Pompey comming abroad one day into the common aſſembly, to heare how a matter of his was handled: this Clodius hauing a company of vagabonds and deſperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he ſitting in a place where he might be ſeene from the reſt, began to aske theſe queſtions out aloud: Who is the licentiouſeſt Captaine in all this city? What man is he that ſeekes for a man? What is he that ſcratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a company of dauncers or ſingers, when he ſpake and clapped his hands on his gowne, aunſwered him ſtraight aloud to euery queſtion, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys heart, that was not wont to heare himſelfe ſo ill ſpoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any ſuch kind of fight: but yet it made him bite the lippe more, when he ſaw the Senate glad to ſee him thus ſhamed and reproued, as a iuſt reuenge and puniſhment for his vile betraying and forſaking of Cicero. So, great ſtirre and vprore being made vpon this in the market place, and many men ſore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken alſo in the preaſe of the people with a ſword in his hand, very neare vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwiſe fearing Clodius inſolencie and proud words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home ſtill, conſulting with his friends what way he ſhould take to appeaſe the anger of the Senate againſt him. Thereupon, one of his friends called Culeo, perſwaded him to put away his wife Iulia, and vtterly to refuſe Cæſars friendſhip, and to ſticke againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithſtanding he was contented to harken vnto them that gaue him counſell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortall enemie, and in great fauour with the Senate. Thereupon, he brought Ciceroes brother into the market place, to moue the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuerſe were ſlaine of either ſide: notwithſtanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauour with the Senate, and ſtanding with the law propounded to giue Pompey authoritie to cauſe corne to be brought to Rome, he once againe made him haue power both by land and ſea ouer all the territories of the Romaines. For all the hauens, marts and faires, and all ſtore-houſes for corne, yea moreouer all the trade of marchandize and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accuſing him, ſayd: that the Senate had not made this law for the dearth of victuals, but that they made a dearth of victuals, becauſe the law ſhould paſſe, to reuiue Pompeys power and authority againe, that was almoſt vnder foote. Other ſay, that this was a deuiſe of Lentulus Spinther the Conſull, who gaue Pompey the greater authority, becauſe he might be ſent to put king Ptolomie againe into his kingdome. This notwithſtanding, Canidius the Tribune preferred another law to ſend Pompey without an army, with two ſergeants onely to cary the axes before him, to bring Ptolomy in fauour againe with the Alexandrians. This law ſeemed not to miſlike Pompey: but the Senate with honeſt colour put by this law, as being affraid leaſt Pompeys perſon ſhould miſcary in ſo doing. Neuertheleſſe, litle papers were found throwne about the market place, and the Senate-houſe, declaring that Ptolomy deſired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthers ſtead. Timagenes writeth notwithſtanding, that Ptolomy went vnto Rome, and left Ægypt without any occaſion giuen him, at the perſwaſion of Theophanes, who perſwaded him to do ſo, becauſe he wold giue Pompey occaſion to make new wars. But Theophanes craft and ſubtilty made not this matter ſo credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambition was nothing ſo vile nor ill, as that was. So, Pompey hauing now full authority to cauſe corn to be brought to Rome, he ſent then his Lieutenants and friends abroad, and himſelfe in perſon went into Sicile. Now being ready to returne againe, there aroſe ſuch a ſtorme of wind in the ſea, that the mariners were in doubt to wey their ankers. But himſelfe firſt imbarked, and commaunded them ſtraight to hoiſe ſaile, crying out aloud, It is of neceſſitie I muſt go, but not to liue. So, through his boldnes & good ſpirit, vſing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of mart, and markets with corne, and all the ſea beſides with ſhips: in ſo much, the plenty he brought did not only furniſh the city of Rome, but all their neighbours alſo about them, and came like a liuely ſpring that diſperſed it ſelfe through all Italie. About that time, the great conqueſts that Cæſar wade in Gavle, did ſet him aloft. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres farre from Rome, with the Belgeans, Svvisses, and Engliſhmen: he by ſecret practiſe,

The reſtoring againe of Ptolomy king of Ægypt to his realme.

was in the middeſt among the people at Rome, and moſt againſt Pompey in the waightieſt affaires of the common wealth. For he had the power of an army about his perſon, which he did harden with paines and continuall practiſe, not with intent to fight onely againſt the barbarous people: for the battels he had with them, were in maner but as a hunting ſport, by the which he made himſelfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the word. But furthermore, by the infinite gold and ſiluer, and the incredible ſpoiles & treaſure which he wan vpon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by ſending great preſents alſo to Rome, to the Ædiles, Prætors, Conſuls, and their wiues, he purchaſed him many friends. Therefore, after he had paſſed ouer the Alpes againe, and was come to winter in the city of Lvca, a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate themſelues almoſt two hundred perſons (and amongſt them, Craſſus & Pompey by name) went out of Rome vnto him. Furthermore, there were ſeene at Cæſars gate, ſixe ſcore ſergeants carying axes before Prætors, or Proconſuls. So Cæſar ſent euery one backe againe, either full of money, or good words: but with Pompey and Craſſus, he made a match, that they two together ſhould ſue to be Conſuls, and that he himſelfe would ſend them good aide to Rome, at the day of election, to giue their voyces. And if they were choſen, that they ſhould then practiſe by decree of the people, to haue the gouernements of ſome new prouinces and armies aſſigned them: and withall, that they ſhould adiorne the gouernement of thoſe prouinces he had, for fiue yeares more. This packe being bewrayed and ſpread abroad through Rome, the honeſteſt ſort miſliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open aſſembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would ſue for the Conſulſhip at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make anſwer, Pompey ſpake firſt, and ſayd: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Craſſus anſwered more gently, that he would do that which ſhould be beſt for the commonwealth. Then Marcellinus ſharply inueying againſt Pompey, he angrily againe caſt him in the teeth, and ſaid, that Marcellinus was the ranckeſt churle, and the vnthankfulleſt beaſt in the world: for that of a dum man he had made him eloquent, and being in maner ſtarued and famiſhed, many a time he had filled his belly. This notwithſtanding, diuerſe that before were determined to ſue for the Conſulſhip, went no further in it, ſauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counſelled and incouraged not to giue it ouer: for, ſayd he, thou doeſt not contend for the Conſulſhip, but to defend the common liberty of thy country againſt two tyrants. Pompey therefore fearing Catoes faction, leaſt that hauing all the Senates goodwils, he ſhould draw alſo the beſt part of the people after him: thought it not good to ſuffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this end therefore, he ſent men armed againſt him, who at the firſt onſet, ſlue the torch-bearer that caried the torch before him, and made all the reſt to flie: amongſt whom alſo Cato was the laſt man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey & Craſſus being become Conſuls after this ſort, they ordered themſelues nothing the more temperatly, nor honeſtly. For firſt of all, the people being about to chuſe Cato Prætor, Pompey being at the aſſembly of the election, perceiuing that they would chuſe him, brake vp the aſſembly, falſly alleadging that he had noted certaine ill ſignes, and afterwards, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they choſe Antias and Vatinius Prætors. After that, by Trebonius Tribune of the people, they publiſhed Edicts, authoriſing Cæſars charge for fiue yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cæſar. Vnto Craſſus alſo they had appointed Syria, and the warre againſt the Parthians. Vnto Pompey in like caſe, all Africke, and both Spaines, with foure Legions beſides: of the which, at Cæſars deſire, he lent him two Legions to helpe him in his warre in Gavle. Theſe things done, Craſſus departed to his Prouince, at the going out of his Conſulſhip: and Pompey remained at Rome about the dedicating of his Theater, where he cauſed many goodly playes to be made, both for exerciſe of perſon, as alſo for learning and muſicke, and cauſed wild beaſts alſo to be baited and hunted, and killed a fiue hundred Lyons. But of all things, there was no ſuch fearefull ſight and terrible fight, as was betweene the Elephants. This great charge and bountifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to ſhew the people paſtime and pleaſure: made him againe to be very much eſteemed of, and beloued amongſt the people. But on the other ſide, he wan himſelfe as much ill will and enuy, in committing the gouernement of his Prouinces and Legions into the hands of his Lieutenants, whileſt he himſelfe romed vp and downe the pleaſant places of Italy, with his wife at his pleaſure: either becauſe he was farre in loue with her, or elſe for that ſhe loued him ſo dearly, that he could not find in his hart to leaue her company. It was reported of her (being knowne of many) that this young Lady Iulia loued her her husband more dearly, not for Pompeys flouriſhing age, but for his aſſured continence, knowing no other woman but her: beſides alſo, he was no ſolemne man, but pleaſant of conuerſation, which made women loue him maruellouſly, vnleſſe we will reproue the curtiſan Floraes teſtimony. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ædiles, men riſing ſuddenly in hurly burly, drew their ſwords, and many were ſlaine about Pompey: inſomuch as his cloathes being bloudied, he ſent his men home in haſt to fetch him other to change him. His yong wife that was great with child, ſeeing his cloaths bloudy, tooke ſuch a flight vpon it, that ſhe fell downe in a ſound before them, and they had much ado to recouer her, and yet ſhe fell ſtraight vnto labour vpon it, and was deliuered. So that they themſelues, which blamed him moſt for his good will he bare vnto Cæſar could not reproue the loue he bare vnto his wife. Another time after that, ſhe was great with child againe, whereof ſhe died, and the child liued not many dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to cary her into the countrey to be buried, to a houſe he had there neare vnto the city of Alba, the people by force tooke her corſe, and caried it into the field of Mars, more for the pity they tooke of the young Lady, then to pleaſure either Cæſar or Pompey: and yet what the people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæſars ſake being abſent, then for Pompey that was preſent. But ſtraight when this alliance was broken, which rather couered, then bridled their ambitious deſire to rule: there aroſe a new ſtirre in Rome immediatly, and euery mans mouth was full of prittle prattle and ſeditious words. Not long after that alſo came newes, that Craſſus was ouerthrowne, and ſlaine in Parthia: who was a manifeſt ſtay and let to keepe them two from ciuill warres, for that they both feared him, and therefore kept themſelues in a reaſonable ſort together. But when fortune had taken away this third champion, who could haue withſtood the better of them both that had ouercome the other: then might haue bene ſayd of theſe two which remained, as the comicall Poet ſayd:

The death of Iulia the daughter of Cæſar.

The beginning of the diſſention betwixt Pompey and Cæſar.

See how theſe champions purpoſing each others force to try,
With nointed skin, and duſty hands, ſtand vaunting valiantly.

So litle can fortune preuaile againſt nature, hauing no power to ſtop couetouſneſſe: ſith ſo large and great an Empire, and ſuch a wide countrey beſides, could not containe the couetous deſire of theſe two men. But though they had often both heard and read:

Among the gods themſelues all things by lot deuided are,
And none of them intrudes himſelfe within his neighbours ſhare.

Yet they thought that the Empire of Rome was not inough for them, which were but two. But Pompey ſpake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it, and alſo left it ſooner then they thought he would haue done: and that he witneſſed by diſcharging his army ſo ſoone. Then thinking that Cæſar would not diſcharge his army, he ſought to make himſelf ſtrong againſt him, by procuring offices of the city, without any other alteration. Neither would he ſeeme to miſtruſt him, but he plainly ſhewed that he did deſpiſe and contemne him. But when he ſaw that he could not obtaine the offices of the city as he would, becauſe the citizens that made the elections were bribed with mony: he then left it without a magiſtrate, ſo that there was none either to commaund, or that the people ſhould obey. Hereupon there ran a brute ſtraight, that there muſt needs be a Dictator made, and the firſt man that propounded it, was Lucilius Tribune of the people, who perſwaded them to chuſe Pompey. But Cato ſtucke ſo ſtoutly againſt it, that the Tribune had like to haue loſt his office, euen in the market place. But then many of Pompeys friends ſtepped vp, and excuſed him, ſaying: that he neither ſought, nor would haue the Dictatorſhip. Then Cato commended him much, & prayed him to ſee good order kept in the commonwealth. Pompey being aſhamed to deny ſo reaſonable a requeſt, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Conſuls were choſen, Domitius, and Meſſala: but afterwards when the ſtate began to change againe, by the death of one of the Conſuls, and that diuerſe were more earneſtly bent to haue a Dictator than before, Cato fearing it would breake out with fury, determined to giue Pompey ſome office of reaſonable authority, to keepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Inſomuch, as Bibulus himſelfe being chiefe of the Senate, & Pompeys enemy, was the firſt that moued, Pompey might be choſen Conſull alone: for, ſaid he, by this meanes, either the common wealth ſhall be rid of the preſent trouble: or elſe it ſhall be in bondage to an honeſt man. This opinion was maruelled at, in reſpect of him that ſpake it. Whereupon, Cato ſtanding vp, it was thought ſtraight he would haue ſpoken againſt him: but ſilence being made him, he plainely told them, that for his owne part he would not haue bene the firſt man to haue propounded that was ſpoken: but ſithence it was ſpoken by another, that he thought it reaſonable and meete to be followed. And therefore, ſayd he, it is better to haue an Officer to command, whatſoeuer he be, rather then none: and that he ſaw no man fitter to command, then Pompey, in ſo troubleſome a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey ſhould be choſen ſole Conſull: and that if he ſaw in his diſcretion he ſhould need the aſſiſtance of another companion, he might name any whom he thought good, but not till two moneths were paſt. Thus was Pompey made Conſull alone by Sulpitius, regent for that day. Then Pompey made very friendly countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honour he had done to him, praying him priuately to aſſiſt him with his counſell in the Conſulſhip. Cato anſwered him, that there was no cauſe why he ſhould thanke him, for he had ſpoken nothing for his ſake, but for reſpect of the comon wealth only: and for his counſell, if he would aske it, he ſhould priuatly haue it, if not, yet that he would openly ſay that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the city, maried Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio, not a maiden, but late the widow of Publius Craſſus the ſonne, that was ſlaine in PARTHIA, to whom ſhe was maried a maiden. This Ladie had excellent gifts to be beloued beſides her beauty: for ſhe was properly learned, could play well on the harpe, was skilfull in muſicke and geometry, and tooke great pleaſure alſo in Philoſophy, and not vainly without ſome profit. For ſhe was very modeſt and ſober of behauior, without brawling and fooliſh curioſity, which commonly yong women haue, that are indued with ſuch ſingular gifts. Her father alſo, was a noble man, both in bloud and life. Notwithſtandig, theſe vnlike mariages did nothing pleaſe ſome: for Cornelia was young inough to haue bene his ſonnes wife. Now the beſt citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the commonwealth, being in ſuch a troubleſome time, which had choſen him onely, as her remedy to redreſſe the ſame: and that he in the meane time gaue himſelfe ouer to marying & feaſting, where rather he ſhould haue bin carefull of his Conſulſhip, which was diſpoſed vpon him againſt the law, for common calamities ſake, that otherwiſe he had not come by, if all had bene quiet. Furthermore, he ſharply proceeded againſt them, which by bribery and vnlawfull meanes came to office: and hauing made lawes and ordinances for the adminiſtration of iuſtice, otherwiſe he dealt iuſtly and vprightly in all things, giuing ſafety, order, ſilence and grauity, to matters of iudgement, with force of armes, himſelfe being preſent: ſauing that when his father in law was alſo accuſed among other, he ſent for the three hundred and three ſcore Iudges home to his houſe, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accuſer ſaw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges themſelues, returning into the market place: he let fall his ſute. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed alſo more then before, for that he hauing made a law, that no man ſhould praiſe the offenders, whileſt their matter was a hearing: came himſelfe and openly praiſed Plancus being accuſed. Thereupon Cato being one of the Iudges, ſtopped his eares with both his hands, ſaying: that he might not heare an offender praiſed, ſeeing it was forbidden by law. But therefore he was refuſed for a Iudge, before they gaue ſentence. Notwithſtanding, Plancus was condemned by all the reſt of the Iudges, to Pompeys great ſhame and reproach. Shortly after, Hypſeus, one that had bene Conſull, being likewiſe accuſed, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bathe to go to ſupper: vpon his knees he beſought Pompeys fauour and helpe: but he ſtately paſſed by him, and gaue him no other aunſwer, but told him, he marred his ſupper, and ſayd nothing elſe to him. This inconſtancy was much reproued in Pompey. Howbeit otherwiſe he ſet all things in good order, and choſe his father in law Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Conſulſhip, for the fiue laſt moneths. After that, he cauſed the gouernement of his Prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeares more, with commiſſion to take yearely out of the treaſure a thouſand talents to defray the charges of this warre. Cæſars friends ſeeing that, ſtepped vp for him, and prayed that there might alſo be had ſome conſideration of him, that had likewiſe great warres for the Empire of ROME: ſaying, that his good ſeruice deſerued, either that they ſhould make him Conſull againe, or elſe that they ſhould prolong his charge and gouernment, ſo as he might yet peaceably enioy the honor to command that which he had conquered, to the end that no other ſucceſſour might reape the fruit of his labour. Much ſtirre and contention being about this matter at ROME, Pompey as though for good will he meant to excuſe the enuie they might haue borne Cæſar, ſaid: that he had receiued letters from him, by the which he requeſted a ſucceſſour, and to be diſcharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they ſhould graunt him priuiledge to demaund the ſecond Conſulſhip,

Consulship, although he were absent. Which Cato stoutly withstood, saying, that he must returne home as a priuate man, and leauing his army, should come in person to craue recompence of his countrey. But because Pompey made no reply nor aunswer to the contrary, men suspected straight that he had no great good liking of Cæsar, and the rather, because he had sent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him, vnder colour of his warre against the PARTHIANS. But Cæsar though he smelt him wherefore he sent for his souldiers, returned them home with liberall reward. About that time, Pompey fell sicke at NAPLES of a dangerous disease, whereof notwithstanding he recouered againe. The NEAPOLITANS thereupon, by perswasion of Praxagoras, one of the chiefest men of their city, did sacrifice to the gods for his recouery. The like did also their neighbours round about: and in fine, it ranne so generally through all ITALY, that there was no city or towne (great or small) but made open feast and reioycing for many dayes together. Besides, the infinite number of people was such, that went to meete him out of all parts: that there was not place inough for them all, but the high wayes, cities, townes and ports of the sea, were all full of people, feasting and sacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouery. Diuerse also went to meete him, crowned with garlands, and so did attend on him, casting nosegayes and flowers vpon him. Thus was his iourny the noblest sight that euer was, all the way as he came: howbeit men thought also, that this was the chiefest cause of the beginning of the ciuill warres. For he fell into such a pride, and glorious conceit of himselfe, with the exceeding ioy he tooke to see himselfe thus honored: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings to prosper, he grew too bold in despising of Cæsars power, as though he stood in no need of other power or care to withstand him, but that he could ouercome him as he would, farre more easily, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appius thereupon returned from GAVLE, that brought him his two legions backe againe which he had lent vnto Cæsar, reproching much his doings which he had done there, and giuing out many foule words against Cæsar. For he sayd, that Pompey knew not his owne strength & authority, that would seeke to make himselfe strong, by other power against him: considering that he might ouercome him with his own legions he should bring with him, so soone as they saw but Pompey in the face, such illwill did Cæsars owne souldiers beare him, and were maruellous desirous besides to see himselfe. These flattering tales so puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into such a securitie and trust of himselfe, that he mocked them to scorne which were affraid of warres. And to those also which sayd, that if Cæsar came to ROME, they saw not how they could resist his power: he smilingly answered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that: for as oft sayd he as I do but stampe with my foote vpon the ground of ITALY, I shall bring men inough out of euery corner, both footmen and horsemen. In the meane time, Cæsar gathered force still vpon him, and thenceforth drew nearer vnto ITALY, and sent of his souldiers daily to ROME to be present at the election of the magistrates, and many of them that were in office, he wanne with money: amongst whom, was Paule, one of the Consuls, whom he wanne of his side, by meanes of a thousand fiue hundred talents. And Curio the Tribune of the people, whom he discharged of an infinite debt he ought: and Marke Antonie also, who for Curioes sake, was discharged likewise for part of the debt which Curio ought, being also bound as himselfe. Furthermore, it was found that a Captaine or Centurion sent from Cæsar, being neare vnto the Senate, vnderstanding that the councell would not prolong Cæsars gouernement which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pommell of his sword: Well sayd he, this shall giue it him. So, to be short, all that was done and sayd, tended to this end. Notwithstanding, the petitions and requests that Curio made in Cæsars behalfe, seemed somewhat more reasonable for the people: for he requested one of the two, either to make Pompey to put downe his army, or else to licence Cæsar to haue his army as well as he. For, either being both made priuate men, they would fall to agreement of themselues: or else being both of like strength, neither of both would seeke any alteration, fearing one another, but would content themselues either of them with their owne. Or otherwise, he that should weaken the one, and strengthen the other: should double his power whom he feared. Thereto very hotly replied the Consull Marcellus, calling Cæsar theefe, and sayd that he should be proclaimed an open enemy to ROME, if he did not disperse his army. This notwithstanding, in fine Curio, Antony, and Piso, procured that the Senate should decide the matter. For, sayd he, all those that would haue Cæsar leaue his army, and Pompey to keepe his: let them stand on the one side. Thereupon the most part of them stood at one hand. Then he bad them againe come away from them that would haue them both leaue their armies. Then there remained onely but two and twenty that ſtood for Pompey: and all the reſt went on Curioes ſide. Then Curio looking aloft for ioy of the victory, went into the market place, and there was receiued of his Tribune faction, with ſhouts of ioy and clapping of hands, and infinite noſegayes and garlands of flowers throwne vpon him. Pompey was not then preſent to ſee the Senators goodwill towards him: becauſe by the law, ſuch as haue commandement ouer ſouldiers, cannot enter into Rome. Notwithſtanding Marcellus ſtanding vp, ſayd: that he would not ſtand trifling hearing of orations and arguments, when he knew that ten legions were already paſſed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes againſt them: and that he would ſend a man vnto them, that ſhould defend their country well inough. Straight they chaunged apparell at Rome, as their manner was in a common calamity. Marcellus then comming through the market place vnto Pompey, being followed of all the Senate, went vnto him, and told him openly: Pompey, I commaund thee helpe thy country with that army thou haſt already, & alſo to leauy more to aide thee. The like ſpeech did Lentulus vſe vnto him, who was appointed one of the Conſuls the yeare following. Now, when Pompey thought to leauy ſouldiers in Rome to bill them, ſome would not obey him, a few others went vnwillingly to him with heauy hearts, and the moſt part of them cried, peace, peace. Antony alſo, againſt the Senates mind, read a letter vnto the people ſent from Cæſar containing certaine offers and reaſonable requeſts, to draw the common peoples affection towards him. For his requeſt was, that Pompey and he ſhould both of them reſigne their gouernements, and ſhould diſmiſſe their armies to make all well, referring themſelues wholly to the iudgement of the people, and to deliuer vp account vnto them of their doings. Lentulus being now entred into his Conſulſhip, did not aſſemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of Cilicia, practiſed to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cæſar ſhould leaue Gavle, and all the reſt of his army, reſeruing onely two legions and the gouernement of Illyria, attending his ſecond Conſulſhip. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Cæſars friends were contented to graunt that he ſhould haue but one of his legions. But Lentulus ſpake againſt it, and Cato cried out on the other ſide alſo, that Pompey was deceiued, and they both. So all treaty of peace was cut off. In the meane time, newes came to Rome, that Cæſar had wonne Ariminvm, a faire great city of Italy, and that he came directly to Rome with a great power. But that was not true: for he came but with three thouſand horſe, and fiue thouſand footemen, and would not tary for the reſt of his army that was yet on the other ſide of the mountaines in Gavle, but made haſte rather to ſurpriſe his enemies vpon the ſudden, being afraid and in garboile, not looking for him ſo ſoone: rather then to giue them time to be prouided, and to fight with him when they were ready. For when he was come to the riuer ſide of Rubicon (which was the vtmoſt confine of the prouince he had in charge towards Italy) he ſtayed ſuddenly, weying with himſelfe the great enterpriſe he tooke in hand. At the laſt, as men that being of a maruellous height from the ground, do headlong throw themſelues downe cloſing of their eyes, and withdrawing their minds from the thought of the daunger: crying out theſe words onely vnto them that were by, in the Greeke tongue, ἀνερρίφθω κύβος: in Engliſh, let the die be caſt (meaning hereby to put all in hazard, and according to our prouerbe, to ſet all on ſixe and ſeuen) he paſſed ouer with his army. Now, the newes of his comming being caried to Rome, they were in ſuch a maruellous feare, as the like was neuer ſeene. For all the Senate ran immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other magiſtrates of the city fled vnto him alſo. Tullus asking Pompey what power he had to reſiſt them, he aunſwered him, faltring ſomewhat in his ſpeech: that he had the two legions readie which Cæſar ſent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which he had leauied in haſte, he ſhould make vp the number of thirty thouſand fighting men. Then Tullus cried out openly: Ah, thou haſt mocked vs Pompey: and thereupon gaue order they ſhould ſend Ambaſſadours vnto Cæſar. There was one Phaonius in the company, who otherwiſe was no ill man, ſauing that he was ſomwhat too bold, thinking to counterfeit Catoes plaine maner of ſpeech: he bad Pompey then ſtampe his foot vpon the ground, & make thoſe ſoldiers come which he had promiſed them. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him alſo, what he had prophecied before hand of Cæſar, he aunſwered him againe: Indeed thou haſt prophecied more truly then I, but I haue dealt more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they ſhould make him Lieutenant generall of Rome with full and abſolute power to commaund all, ſaying: that the ſelfe ſame men which do the greateſt miſchiefe, know beſt alſo how to remedy the

the same. So he immediatly departed into SICILE, hauing the charge and gouernement of that countrey: and also euery one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALIE being in armes, no man knew what was best to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flying thither from all parts: and those on the other side that were within ROME, went out as fast, and forsooke the city in this trouble and disorder. That which might serue being willing to obey, was found very weake: and that on the other side which by disobedience did hurt, was too strong and ill to be gouerned by the magistrates, hauing law to command. For there was no possibility to pacifie their feare, neither would they suffer Pompey to order things as he would: but euery man followed his owne fancie, euen as he found himselfe grieued, afraid, or in doubt, and in one day they were in diuerse minds. Pompey could heare nothing of certainty of his enemies. For some, one while would bring him newes one way, & then againe another way: and thē if he would not credit thē, they were angry with him. At the length, when he saw the tumult and confusion so great at ROME, as there was no meane to pacifie it: he commanded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained behind, that he wold take thē for Cæsars friends, and so at night departed out of the city. Then the two Consuls fled also, without doing any sacrifice to the gods, as they were wont to do before they went to make any warres. So Pompey, euen in his greatest trouble and most danger, might thinke himselfe happie to haue euery mans goodwill as he had. For, though diuerse misliked the cause of this warre, yet no man hated the Captaine: but there were moe found that could not forsake Pompey for the loue they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their liberty. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cæsar was come to ROME, who possessing the city, spake very gently vnto all them he found there, & pacified their feare: sauing that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people to put him to death, because he would not suffer him to take any of the treasure of the common wealth. Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter speech also, saying: that it was not so hard a thing for him to do it, as to speake it. Thus hauing put downe Metellus, and taken that he needed to serue his turne, he tooke vpon him to follow Pompey, thinking to driue him out of ITALY, before that his army he had in SPAINE should come to him. Pompey in the meane time, hauing taken the city of BRVNDVSIVM, and gotten some ships together: he made the two Consuls presently imbarke with thirty ensignes of footmen, which he sent beyond the sea before vnto DYRRACHIVM. And incontinently after that, he sent his father in law Scipio, and Cneus Pompey his sonne, into SYRIA, to prouide him ships. Himselfe on the other side, fortified the rampers of the city, and placed the lightest souldiers he had vpon the wals, and commaunded the BRVNDVSIANS not to stirre out of their houses: and further, he cast trenches within the city, at the end of the streetes in diuerse places, and filled those trenches with sharpe pointed stakes, sauing two streets onely, which went vnto the hauen. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the rest of his souldiers at his pleasure, he suddenly lifting vp a signe into the aire, to giue them warning which he had left to gard the rampers: they straight ranne to him with speed, and quickly receiuing them into his ships, he weyed anker, and hoised saile. Cæsar perceiuing the wals naked without ward, he straight mistrusted that Pompey was fled: who hasting after him, had almost runne vpon the sharpe stakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRVNDVSIANS giuen him warning of them. So he stayed, and ranne not ouerthwart the city, but fetched a compasse about to go to the hauen: where he found that all the ships were vnder saile, two ships onely excepted, vpon the which were left a few souldiers. Some thinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the best stratagemes of warre that euer he vsed. Notwithstanding, Cæsar maruelled much, that he being in a strong citie, and looking for his army to come out of SPAINE, and being maister of the sea besides, that he would euer forsake ITALIE. Cicero also reproued him, for that he rather followed Themistocles counsell, then Pericles: considering that the troublesome time was rather to be likened vnto Pericles, then Themistocles time. Yea Cæsar himselfe shewed, that he was affraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeys friends, he sent him vnto Pompey at BRVNDVSIVM, to offer him reasonable conditions of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, and sailed away with him. By this meanes, Cæsar in threescore dayes being Lord of all ITALY without any bloudshed: he was very desirous to follow with speed after Pompey. But because he had no ships ready, he let him go, and hasted towards SPAINE, to ioyne Pompeys army there vnto his. Now Pompey in the meane space, had gotten a maruellous great power together both by sea and by land. His army by sea was wonderfull. For he had fiue hundred goods ships of laughing to scorne to see him come, when Pompey saw him, he rose and went to meete him, iudging it a good token of their good wils vnto him, whē such old men as he, chose rather to be with him in daunger, then at home with safety. Hereupon they sate in councell, and following Catoes opinion, decreed that they should put no citizen of ROME to death but in battell, and should sacke no citie that was subiect to the Empire of ROME, the which made Pompeys part the better liked. For they that had nothing to do with the warres, either becaufe they dwelt farre off, or else for that they were so poore, as otherwise they were not regarded: did yet both in deed and word fauour Pompeys part, thinking him an enemie both to the gods and men, that wished not

Pompey victorie. Cæsar also shewed himselfe very mercifull and courteous, where he ouercame. For when he had wonne all Pompeys armie that was in SPAINE, he suffered the Captaines that were taken to go at libertie, and onely reserued the souldiers. Then comming ouer the Alps

againe, he passed through all ITALIE, and came to the city of BRVNDVSIVM in the winter quarter: and there passing ouer the sea, he went vnto the citie of ORICVM, and landed there. Now Cæsar hauing Vibius, one of Pompeys familiar friends with him, whom he had taken prisoner: he sent him vnto Pompey, to pray againe that they might meete, and both of them disperse their armies within three dayes, and being reconciled (giuing their faith one to another) so to returne into ITALIE like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that these were new deuises to intraphim. Thereupon he suddenly went downe to the sea, and tooke all the places of strength by the sea side, safely to lodge his campe in, and all the ports, creekes, and harbors for ships to lie in rode: so that what wind soeuer blew on the sky, it serued his turne, to bring him either men, victuals, or money. Cæsar on the other side was so distressed both by sea and by land, that he was driuen to procure battell, and to assaile Pompey euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom most times he euer had the better in all skirmishes, sauing once, when he was in danger to haue lost all his army. For Pompey had valiantly repulsed his men, and made them flie, and had slaine two thousand of them in the field: but he durst not enterpell mell with them into their campe, as they fled. Whereupon Cæsar sayd to his friends, that his enemie had won the victory that day, if he had knowne how to ouercome. This victory put Pompeys men in such courage, that they would needs hazard battell. And Pompey himselfe also though he wrote letters vnto strange kings, captaines, & cities of his confederacy, as if he had already won all: was yet afraid to fight another battell, thinking it better by tract of time, and distresse of victuals, to ouercome him. For Cæsars men being old and expert souldiers, and wont euer to haue the victory when they fought together: he knew they would be loth to be brought to fight any other kind of way, to be driuen to often remouing of their campe from place to place, and still to fortifie and intrench themselues, and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hand, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his men to be quiet, and not to stirre, perceiuing that after this last bickering, Cæsar being scanted with

victuals raiſed his campe, and departed thence to go into THESSALY, through the countrey of the ATHAMANIANS: then he could no more bridle their glory and courage, which cried, Cæſar is fled, let vs follow him. And others, let vs returne home againe into ITALY. And others alſo ſent their friends and ſeruants before to ROME, to hire them houſes neare the market plake: intending when they came thither to ſue for offices in the commonwealth. Some there were alſo that in a iollity would needs take ſhip, and ſaile into the Ile of LESBOS, vnto Cornelia (whom Pompey had ſent thither) to cary her that good newes, that the warre was ended. Thereupon aſſembling the Councell, Africanus thought it beſt to winne ITALIE, for that was the chiefeſt marke to be ſhot at in this warre: for whoſoeuer obtained that, had ſtraight all SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAINE, and GAVLE at commaundement. Furthermore, that it was a diſhonor to Pompey (which in reaſon ſhould touch him aboue all things) to ſuffer their countrey to be in ſuch cruell bondage and ſubiection vnto ſlaues and flatterers of tyrants, offering it ſelfe as it were into their hands. But Pompey neither thought it honourable for him, once againe to flie from Cæſar, and to make him follow him, ſith fortune had giuen him oportunity to haue Cæſar in chaſe: nor lawfull alſo before the gods, to forſake his father in law Scipio, and many other alſo that had bene Conſuls, diſperſed abroad in GRECE and THESSALIE, which ſhould immediatly fall into Cæſars hands, with all their riches & armies they had. Furthermore, he ſayd, that they had care inough for the city of ROME, which drew the warres fartheſt off from them: ſo as, they remaining ſafe and quiet at home (neither hearing nor feeling the miſerie of warres) might in the end peaceably receiue and welcome him home, that remained conquerour. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cæſar, being determined not to giue him battell, but to beſiege him, and onely to compaſſe him in ſtill being neare vnto him, and ſo to cut him off from victuals. There was alſo another reaſon that made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a ſpeech giuen out among the ROMAINE knights, that ſo ſoone as euer they had ouercome Cæſar, they muſt alſo bring Pompey to be a priuate man againe. Some ſay therefore, that Pompey would neuer afterwards imploy Cato in any great matters of weight in all this warre: for when he followed Cæſar, he left him to keepe his cariage by the ſea ſide, fearing that ſo ſoone as Cæſar were once ouercome, he would make him ſtraight alſo reſigne his authority. Pompey following Cæſar in this maner faire and ſoftly, they cried out vpon him, that he made no warre with Cæſar, but againſt his countrey and the Senate, becauſe he might be ſtill in authoritie: and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his ſeruants and gard about him, which ſhould rule and command the world. Furthermore, Domitius Ænobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kings: made him much to be enuied. Phaonius alſo mocked him as much as the other, that ſpake moſt boldeſt: for he went crying vp and downe, My maiſters, I giue you warning, you are like to eate no THVSCVLAN figges this yeare. And Lucius Afranius alſo, he that had loſt the army which he had in SPAINE, and was alſo ſuſpected for a traytor, ſeeing Pompey then refuſed to come to battell: I maruell, ſayd he, that they which accuſe me, do not luſtily go to find him out, whom they call the marchant and common buyer of prouinces, to fight with him preſently? With theſe and many ſuch other lewd ſpeeches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not abide to be ill ſpoken of, and would not deny his friends any thing) to follow their vaine hope and deſires, and to forſake his owne wiſe determination: the which thing, no good ſhip-maiſter, and much leſſe a chiefe and ſoueraigne Captaine, ouer ſo many nations and ſo great armies, ſhould haue ſuffered and conſented vnto. Now, he that did alwayes commend the Phiſitians, that would not follow the fond deſire of the ſicke patients: was himſelfe contented to obey the worſt part of his armie, fearing their diſpleaſure, where their life or health ſtood in hazard. For who would thinke or iudge them to be wiſe men, and in their wits, who walking vp and downe their campe, did alreadie ſue to be Conſuls and Prætors? conſidering that Spinther, Domitius, and Scipio, were at ſtrife together, making friends to be high Biſhop (which office Cæſar had) as if they ſhould haue fought with Tigranes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the NABATHEIANS, which had camped by them, and not with Cæſar and his army: who had taken a thouſand townes by aſſault, had ſubdued aboue three hundred ſeuerall nations, and had wonne infinite battels of the GERMAINES and GAVLES, and was neuer ouercome: had alſo taken a million of men priſoners, and had likewiſe ſlaine ſo many at diuerſe battels. All this notwithſtanding, they of Pompeys ſide ſtill being importunate of him, and troubling him in this ſort: in fine, when they were come into the fields of PHARSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a councell. There Labienus, Generall of the horſemen ſtanding vp, ſware before them all, that he would not returne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flie. The like oath all the reſt did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honour him, made a maruellous great clapping of their hands: and that he himſelfe did ſet foorth the temple of Venus the conquerour with many ſpoiles. This viſion partly put him in good courage, and partly againe made him doubt: for that he was afraid, becauſe Cæſars family was diſcended from this goddeſſe Venus, that his dreame did ſignifie, that he ſhould haue the honor of the victorie, with the ſpoiles he ſhould win of him. Beſides all this, there were ſudden and fearefull noiſes heard in his campe, without any apparant cauſe, that waked all the campe vpon it. At the fourth watch, when the watch is renewed in the morning, there was ſeene a maruellous great light ouer Cæſars campe, and they were all at reſt, which flamed like a burning torch, and fell into Pompeys campe. The which Cæſar himſelfe ſayd he ſaw, when he went to viſite the watch. At the breake of the day, Cæſar being determined to raiſe his campe, and to go to the city of SCOTVSA, as his ſouldiers were buſie about ouerthrowing of their tents, and ſending away their bagge and baggage before: there came ſcouts vnto him, that brought him word they ſaw a great deale of armour and weapon caried too and fro in their enemies campe, and heard a noiſe and buſtling beſides, as of men that were preparing to fight. After theſe came in other ſcouts, that brought word alſo that their voward was alreadie ſet in battell ray. Then Cæſar ſayd, that the day was now come they had longed for ſo ſore, and that they ſhould now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of victuals: and thereupon gaue order preſently that they ſhould put out the red coate of armes vpon his tent, which was the ſigne all the ROMAINES vſed to ſhew that they would fight. The ſouldiers ſeeing that out, left their cariage and tents, and with great ſhouts of ioy ranne to arme themſelues. The Captaines of euery band alſo, beſtowed euery man in ſuch place as he ſhould fight, and ſo they conueyed themſelues into battell ray, without any tumult or diſorder, as quietly, as if they ſhould haue entred into a daunce. Pompey himſelfe led the right wing of his army againſt Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Scipio his father in law being right againſt Domitius Caluinus. The left wing alſo was led by Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes, for all the horſemen were placed on that ſide, to diſtreſſe Cæſar if they could, that was directly againſt them: and to ouerthrow the tenth legion that was ſo much accounted of, being the valianteſt ſouldiers the enemie had in all his armie, amongſt the which Cæſar did euer vſe to fight in perſon. Cæſar then ſeeing the left wing of his enemies ſo ſtrong with the gard of the horſemen, and being afraid of the brightneſſe of their armour: brought forward ſixe enſignes for ſupply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legion, commanding them that no man ſhould ſtirre, leaſt their enemies ſhould diſcouer them. And furthermore, when the horſemen of the enemies ſhould come to giue charge vpon them, that then they ſhould runne with ſpeed on the one ſide of the formoſt rancks, and not to throw their darts farre from them, as the valianteſt ſouldiers are wont to do, to come to the ſword the ſooner: but to throw them vpwards into their enemies eyes and faces. For, ſayd he, theſe braue fellowes and fine dauncers, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Cæſars deuiſe at that time. Pompey being on horſebacke, rode vp and downe to conſider the ordinance of both battels: and perceiuing that his enemies ſhood ſtill in their ranckes, looking for the ſignall of battell, and that his owne battell on the other ſide waued vp and downe diſorderly, as men vnskilfull in warres: he was afraid they would flie before they were charged. Thereupon he ſtraightly commaunded them in the voward, that they ſhould ſteadily keepe their rankes, and ſtanding cloſe together ſhold ſo defend themſelues, receiuing the charge of the enemy. But Cæſar diſliked of that deuiſe, for thereby, ſayd he, the force of their blowes was leſſened, and in withholding them from giuing the charge, he not onely tooke away that courage which the aſſailant carieth with him comming with fury: but made them moreouer faint harted, in receiuing the charge of the enemies. In Cæſars army, there were about two and twentie thouſand fighting men: and in Pompeys army, ſomewhat aboue twiſe as many. Now, when the word of battell was giuen of either ſide, and that the trumpets did ſound the allarme: euerie man began to looke to himſelfe. But a few of the chiefeſt of the ROMAINES, and certaine GRECIANS that were there alſo out of the ſet battell, perceiuing the imminent daunger, began to bethinke them, to what paſſe

the ambition and wilfull contention betweene theſe two men, had brought the ſtate of ROME. For the weapons of kinſmen, the bands of brethren, the enſignes all alike, the flower of ſo many valiant men of one city, did ſerue for a notable example, do ſhew how mans nature prickt forward with couetouſneſſe, is quite blind and without reaſon. For if they could haue bene contented quietly to haue gouerned that which they had conquered: the greateſt and beſt part of the world, both by ſea & by land was ſubiect vnto them. Or otherwiſe, if they could not haue quenched their vnſatiable deſire of victory and triumph, they had occaſion of warre inough offered them againſt the PARTHIANS and GERMAINES. Furthermore they had inough to do beſides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: and withall, they had had an honeſt colour to haue cloaked their ambitious deſires, if it had bene but to haue brought the barbarous people to a ciuill life. For what horſmen of SCYTHIA, or arrowes of PARTHIA, or riches of Indians, could haue abidden the power of threeſcore and ten thouſand ROMAINE ſouldiers, and ſpecially being led by two ſo famous Captaines, as Pompey, and Cæſar? whoſe names, theſe ſtrange and farre nations vnderſtood long before the name of the ROMAINS: ſo great were their victories, hauing conquered ſo many wild and barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one againſt the other, not regarding their honour which made them ſo ambitious: did not ſpare their owne countrey, who had vntill that time remained vnuincible, both in fame an proweſſe. For, the alliance that was made betweene them, the loue of Iulia, and marying with her, was ſuſpected from the beginning to be but a deceit, and a pledge as it were of a conſpiracy made betweene them, for a priuate benefit, more then for any true friendſhip. Now when the fields of PHARSALIA were couered ouer with men, with horſe and armor, and that the ſignall of battell was giuen on either ſide: the firſt man of Cæſars army that aduanced forward to giue charge, was Caius Craſſinius, Captaine of ſixſcore and fiue men, to performe a great promiſe which he had made vnto Cæſar. For Cæſar, when he came out of his tent in the morning, ſeeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what he thought of the ſucceſſe of this battell? Craſſinius holding out his right hand vnto him, couragiouſly cried: Oh Cæſar, thine is the victory, and this day thou ſhalt commend me either aliue or dead. Then remembring theſe words, he brake out of the rankes, and many following after him, ran amongſt the middeſt of his enemies. Straight they came to the ſword, and made great ſlaughter. But he preſſing forward ſtill, one with a thruſt ran him through the mouth, that the ſwords point came through at his necke. Therupon Craſſinius being ſlaine, the battell was equall. Pompey did not make his left wing march ouer ſuddenly, but ſtayed, & caſt his eyes abroad to ſee what his horſemen would do, the which had already deuided their companies, meaning to compaſſe in Cæſar, and to make the ſmall number of horſmen which he had before him, to giue backe vpon the ſquadron of his footmen. On the other ſide, as ſoone as Cæſar had giuen the ſignall of battell, his horſemen retired backe a litle, and the ſixe enſignes which he had placed ſecretly behind them (being three thouſand fighting men) ran ſuddenly to aſſaile the enemy vpon the flancke, and when they came neare vnto the horſemen, they threw the points of their darts vpwards according to Cæſar commaundement, and hit the young gentlemen full in their faces. They being vtterly vnskilfull to fight, and leaſt of all looking for ſuch manner of fight: had not the harts to defend themſelues, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heads, and clapping their hands on their faces, ſhamefully fled. They being ouerthrowne, Cæſars men made no account to follow them, but went and gaue charge vpon the battell of footmen, in that place ſpecially where they had no gard of horſemen, whereby they might the eaſilier be compaſſed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flancke, and in the voward alſo by the tenth legion, perceiuing themſelues (contrary to their expectation) compaſſed about by their enemies, where they thought to haue enuironed them: they could make no longer reſiſtance. They alſo being likewiſe driuen to flie, when Pompey ſaw the duſt in the element, and coniectured the flying of his horſemen: what mind he was of then, it was hard to ſay. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wits end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went ſtraight into his campe, and ſpake neuer a word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verſes to this effect:

Caius Craſſinius giueth the onſet of Cæſars ſide.

Craſſinius ſlaine.

Pompeys horſemen put to flight by Cæſar.

Pompeyes flying in the fields of Pharſalia.

But mighty Ioue who ſits aloft in yuorie chariot hie, Strake Aiax with ſo great a feare, that Aiax by and by Let fall his leatherne target, made of tough oxe hide ſeuen fold,
And ranne away, not looking backe, for all he was ſo bold.

In this eſtate Pompey entred into his tent, and ſate him downe there a great while, and ſpake neuer a word: vntill ſuch time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his campe. And then, he ſayd no more, but, What, euen into our campe? and ſo riſing vp, he put a gowne on his backe euen fit for his misfortune, and ſecretly ſtale out of the campe. The other legions alſo fled: and great ſlaughter was made of the tent keepers, and their ſeruants that garded the campe. For Aſinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Cæſars ſide) that there were ſlaine onely but ſixe thouſand ſouldiers. Howbeit at the taking of their campe, Cæſars ſouldiers then found plainely the madneſſe and vanity of Pompeys men. For, all their tents and pauilions were full of noſegayes and garlands of mirtle, and their couches all couered with flowers, their tables full of bowles of wine, and men prepared ready to do ſacrifice for ioy, rather then to arme themſelues to fight. Thus went they to battell, caried away with this vaine and fooliſh hope. When Pompey was gone a litle way from his campe, he forſooke his horſe, hauing a very few with him: and perceiuing that no man purſued him, he went on foote faire and ſoftly, his head full of ſuch thoughts and imaginations, as might be ſuppoſed a man of his like calling might haue, who for foure and thirty yeares ſpace together, was wont continually to cary victory away, and began then euen in his laſt caſt, to proue what it was to flie, & to be ouercome: and who thought then with himſelfe, how in one houres ſpace he had loſt the honor and riches which he had gotten in ſo many foughten fields and battels, whereby he was not long before followed and obeyed of ſo many thouſand men of warre, of ſo many horſmen, and of ſuch a great fleete of ſhips on the ſea, and then to go as he did in ſuch poore eſtate, and with ſo ſmall a traine, that his very enemies who fought him, knew him not. Thus when he was paſſed the city of Larissa, and comming to the vallie of Tempé: there being a thirſt, he fell downe on his belly and dranke of the riuer. Then riſing vp againe, he went his way thence and came to the ſea ſide, and tooke a fiſhers cotage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the day, he went into a litle boat vpon the riuer, and tooke the free men with him that were about him: and as for the ſlaues, he ſent them backe againe, and did counſell them boldly to go to Cæſar, and not to be affraid. Thus rowing vp and downe the ſhore ſide, in this litle boat, he ſpied a great ſhip of burden in the maine ſea, riding at anker, which was readie to weigh anker, and to ſaile away. The maiſter of the ſhip was a Romaine, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him by ſight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he ſaw Pompey ſpeake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in pouerty and in miſery. So, he had told this dreame vnto the mariners which ſailed with him (as men commonly vſe to do, ſpecially when they dreame of ſuch weightie matters, and being at leiſure withall) and at the very inſtant, there was one of the mariners that told him, he ſaw a litle boate on the riuer rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that ſhooke their cloakes at them, and held out their hands. Thereupon Peticius ſtanding vp, knew Pompey ſtraight, euen in like caſe as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commaunded his mariners to let downe his boate, and gaue him his hand, calling him Pompey by his name, miſtruſting (ſeeing him in that eſtate) what misfortune had happened to him. Thereupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he ſhould tell him of his miſhap, he receiued him into his ſhip, and all thoſe he would haue with him, and then hoiſed ſaile. With Pompey there were both the Lentuli and Faonius. Shortly after alſo, they perceiued king Deiotarus comming from the riuer to them, that beckened and made ſignes to receiue him: which they did. At ſupper time, the maiſter of the ſhip, made ready ſuch meate as he had aboord. Faonius ſeeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, waſhing of himſelfe: ran vnto him, waſhed him, and annointed him, and afterwards continued ſtill to waite vpon him, and to do ſuch ſeruice about him, as ſeruants do to their maiſters, euen to waſhing of his feete, and making ready of his ſupper. When a ſimple man ſaw him, that could no skill of ſeruice, he ſayd:

Good gods, how euery thing becommeth noble men?

Pompey paſſing then by the city of Amphipolis, coaſted from thence into the Ile of Lesbos, to go fetch his wife Cornelia and his ſonne being then in the city of Mitylene. There hauing caſt out his anker, and riding at rode, he put a meſſenger on the ſhore, and ſent him into the citie to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was ſtill put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre was ended and determined by the citie of Dyrrachivm. This meſſenger now finding her in this hope, had not the heart ſo much much as to ſalute her, but letting her vnderſtand rather by his teares then words, the great miſfortune Pompey had: told her, ſhe muſt diſpatch quickly, if ſhe would ſee Pompey with one ſhip onely, and none of his but borrowed. The young Ladie hearing theſe newes, fell downe in a ſound before him, and neither ſpake nor ſtirred of long time: but after ſhe was come to her ſelfe, remembring that it was no time to weepe and lament, ſhe went with ſpeed through the city vnto the ſea ſide. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, and embraced her. But ſhe ſinking vnder him, fell downe and ſaid: Out alas, wo worth my hard fortune, not thine (good huſband) that I ſee thee now brought to one poore ſhip, who before thou mariedſt thy vnfortunat Cornelia, wert wont to ſaile theſe ſeas with fiue hundred ſhippes. Alas, why art thou come to ſee me, and why diddeſt thou not leaue me to curſed fate and my wicked deſtinie: ſith my ſelfe is cauſe of all this thy euill? Alas, how happie a woman had I bene, if I had bene dead before I heard of the death of my firſt husband Publius Craſſus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS ſlue? And how wiſe a woman had I bene, if (according to my determination) I had killed my ſelfe immediatly after him: where now I liue to bring yet this misfortune vnto Pompey the Great? It is reported that Cornelia ſpake theſe words, and that Pompey alſo anſwered her in this maner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou haſt knowne a better fortune, which hath alſo deceiued thee, becauſe ſhe hath continued longer with me then her maner is. But ſince we are borne men, we muſt patiently beare theſe troubles, & proue fortune againe. For it is no impoſſible matter for vs again to come into proſperity out of this preſent miſery, as to fal out of late proſperity into preſent calamity. When Cornelia heard him ſay ſo, ſhe ſent back into the city for her ſtuffe & family. The MYTYLENIANS alſo came openly to ſalute Pompey, & prayed him to come into the city, & to refreſh himſelfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue them counſel to obey the conqueror, & not to feare any thing, for Cæſar was a iuſt man, and of a curteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philoſopher, who came among the citizens alſo to ſee him: made his complaint vnto him, & reaſoned a litle with him about diuine prouidence. Cratippus curteouſly yeelded vnto him, putting him ſtill in better hope, fearing leſt he would haue growne too hote & troubleſome, if he ſhould haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what prouidence of the gods there had bene in his doings? And Cratippus might haue anſwered him, that for the ill gouernment of the commonwealth at ROME, it was of neceſſitie that it ſhould fall into the hands of a ſoueraigne prince. Peraduenture Cratippus might then haue asked him: how & wherby Pompey wouldeſt thou make vs beleeue, if thou hadſt ouercome Cæſar, that thou wouldeſt haue vſed thy good fortune better then he? But for diuine matters, refer them to the gods as it pleaſeth thē. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoiſſed ſaile, and landed no where, but compelled to take freſh acates and water. The firſt citie he came vnto, was ATTALIA in the country of PAMPHYLIA. Thither came to him certaine gallies out of CILICIA, and many ſouldiers alſo, inſomuch he had a three ſcore Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then vnderſtanding that his army by ſea was yet whole, and that Cato had gathered together a great number of his ſouldiers after the ouerthrow, whom he had tranſported with him into AFRICKE: he lamented, and complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, & not ſuffered him to helpe himſelfe with his other force wherin he was the ſtronger: and that he kept not ſtil neare vnto his army by ſea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet preſently haue repaired to his power ready by ſea, to haue reſiſted his enemy. To confeſſe a truth, Pompey committed not ſo great a fault in all this war, neither did Cæſar put foorth a better deuice, then to make his enemy fight farre from his armie by ſea. Thus Pompey being driuen to attempt ſomewhat according to his ſmall abilitie, he ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the cities. To others, he went himſelfe in perſon alſo to require mony, wherewith he manned and armed ſome ſhips. This notwithſtanding, fearing the ſodaine approach of his enemy, leſt he ſhould preuent him before he could put any reaſonable force in readines for to reſiſt him: he bethought himſelf what place he might beſt retire vnto for his moſt ſafetie. When he had conſidered of it, he thought that there was neuer a prouince of the ROMAINS that could ſaue and defend them. And for other ſtrange realmes, he thought PARTHIA aboue all other, was the beſt place to receiue them into at that preſent (hauing ſo ſmall power as they had) and that it was beſt able to helpe and aide them. Other of his counſell were of mind to go into AFRICKE, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN ſaid, he thought it a great folly, to leaue ÆGYPT which was but three daies ſailing from thence, and king Ptolomie, (being but lately come to mans ſtate, & bound vnto Pompey for the late friendſhip and fauour his father found of him) and to go put himselfe into the hands of the PARTHIANS, the vilest and vnfaithfullest nation in the world, and not to proue the modesty of a ROMAINE, that had bene his father in law, whose prosperitie if he could haue indured, he might haue bene the chiefest man: and now to put himselfe to Arsaces goodwill, who could not away with Crassus when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill part also, for him to go carie his young wife of the noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who thinke it lawfull for them to vse what villany and insolencie they list to any. For, admit she haue no villanie offered her by them: yet is it an vndecent thing, to thinke she might haue bene dishonoured, they hauing her in their power to do it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this only that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates: for it seemeth that Pompeys counsell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therefore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in a gally of SELEVCIA with his wife Cornelia. The residue of his traine imbarked also, some into gallies, and others into merchants ships of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without daunger. When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolomie was in the city of PELVSIVM with his army, making warre against his sister: he went thither, and sent a messenger before vnto the king, to aduertise him of his arriuall, and to intreat him to receiue him. King Ptolomie was then but a young man, insomuch as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He assembled a councell of the chiefest and wisest men of the court, who had such credit and authoritie as it pleased him to giue them. They being assembled, he cõmanded euery man in the kings name to say his mind touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king should receiue him or not. It was a miserable thing to see Pothinus an Eunuch of the kings, and Theodotus of CHIO, an hired schoolemaister to teach the young king Rhetoricke, and Achillas ÆGYPTIAN to consult among themselues what they should do with Pompey the Great. These were the chiefest counsellers of all his Eunuchs, and of those that had brought him vp. Now did Pompey ride at anker vpon the shore side, expecting the resolution of this councell: in the which the opinions of other were diuers, for some would not haue receiued him: other would that he should be receiued. But the Rhetoritian Theodotus to shew his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, said he, if we receiue him, we shall haue Cæsar our enemie, and Pompey our Lord: and if we do deny him on the other side, Pompey will blame vs for refusing of him, and Cæsar for not keeping of him. Therefore this should be the best resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby we should win the goodwill of the one, and not feare the displeasure of the other: and some say moreouer, that he added this mocke withall: A dead man bites not. They being determined of this among themselues,, gaue Achillas commission to do it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge aforetime vnder Pompey) and Saluius another Centurion also, with three or foure souldiers besides, they made towards Pompeys gallie, about whom were at that time the chiefest of his traine, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in princely shew and maner, nor nothing answerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, seeing so few men come to them in a fisher boate: they began then to mistrust the small account that was made of them, and counselled Pompey to returne backe, and to launch againe into the sea, being out of the daunger of the hurling of a dart. In the meane time, the fisher boate drew neare, and Septimius rose and saluted Pompey in the ROMAINE toung, by the name of Imperator, as much as soueraigne Captaine: and Achillas also spake to him in the Greeke tong, and bade him come into his boate, because that by the shore side, there was a great deale of mud and sand bankes, so that his gallie should haue no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a farre off diuers of the kings gallies, which were arming with all speed possible, and all the shore besides full of souldiers. Thus, though Pompey and his company wold haue altered their minds, they could not haue told how to haue escaped: and furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted them, then they had giuen the murtherer occasion to haue executed his crueltie. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end: he commanded two Centurions to go downe before him into the ÆGYPTIANS boate, and Philip one of his slaues infranchised, with another slaue called Scynes. When Achillas reached out his hand to receiue him into his boat, he turned him to his wife and sonne, and said these verses of Sophocles vnto them:

The man that into Court comes free,
Must there in state of bondage be.

Pompey arriueth in Egypt and goeth to Pelusium. Pothinus an Eunuch, and groome of the chamber to king Ptolomy, ruleth all AEgypt.

Theſe were the laſt words he ſpake vnto his people, when he left his owne gallie and went into the Æ GYPTIANS boate. The land being a great way off from his gally, when he ſaw neuer a man in the boate ſpeake friendly vnto him, beholding Septimius, he ſaid vnto him: Me thinks my friend I ſhould know thee, for that thou haſt ſerued with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no anſwer, nor ſhewed him any curteſie. Pompey ſeeing that no man ſpake to him, tooke a litle booke he had in his hand, in the which he had written an oration that he meant to make vnto king Ptolomie, and began to reade it. When they came neare the ſhore, Cornelia with her ſeruants and friends about her, ſtood vp in her ſhip in great feare, to ſee what ſhould become of Pompey. So ſhe hoped well, when ſhe ſaw many of the kings people on the ſhore, comming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receiue and honour him. But euen as Pompey tooke Philip his hand to ariſe more eaſily, Septimius came firſt behind him and thruſt him through with his ſword. Next vnto him alſo, Saluius and Achillas drew out their ſwords in like manner. Pompey then did no more but tooke vp his gowne with his hands and hid his face, and manly abid the wounds they gaue him, only ſighing a litle. Thus being nine and fiftie yeares old, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. They that rode at anker in their ſhips, when they ſaw him murthered, gaue ſuch a feareful crie, that it was heard to the ſhore: then weying vp their ankers with ſpeed, they hoiſſed ſaile, and departed their way, hauing wind at will that blew a luſtie gale, as ſoone as they had gotten the maine ſea. The Æ GYPTIANS which prepared to row after them, when they ſaw they were paſt their reach, and vnpoſſible to be ouertaken, they let them go. Then hauing ſtriken off Pompeys head, they threw his body ouer boord, for a miſerable ſpectacle to all thoſe that were deſirous to ſee him. Philip his infranchiſed bondman remained euer by it, vntill ſuch time as the Æ GYPTIANS had ſeene it their bellies full. Then hauing waſhed his body with ſalt water, and wrapped it vp in an old ſhirt of his, becauſe he had no other ſhift to lay it in: he ſought vpon the ſands, and found at the length a peece of an old fiſher boate, enough to ſerue to burne his naked bodie with, but not all fully out. As he was buſie gathering the broken peeces of this boate together, thither came vnto him an old ROMAINE, who in his youth had ſerued vnder Pompey, and ſaid vnto him: O friend, what art thou that preparеſt the funerals of Pompey the Great? Philip anſwered, that he was a bondman of his infranchiſed. Well, ſaid he, thou ſhalt not haue all this honor alone, I pray thee let me accompany thee in ſo deuout a deed, that I may not altogether repent me to haue dwelt ſo long in a ſtrange countrie, where I haue abidden ſuch miſerie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good hap, with mine hands to touch Pompeys bodie, and to helpe to burie the only and moſt famous Captaine of the ROMAINES. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had paſſed, comming out of CYPRVS, ſailed by the ſhore ſide, and perceiued a fire made for funerals, and Philip ſtanding by it, whom he knew not at the firſt. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But ſtraight fetching a great ſigh, alas, ſaid he, perhaps it is Pompey the Great. Then he landed a litle, and was ſtraight taken and ſlaine. This was the end of Pompey the Great. Not long after, Cæſar alſo came into Æ GYPT that was in great warres, where Pompeys head was preſented vnto him: but he turned his head aſide and would not ſee it, and abhorred him that brought it as a deteſtable murtherer. Then taking his ring wherewith he ſealed his letters, whereupon was grauen a Lion holding a ſword: he burſt out a weeping. Achillas and Pothinus he put to death. King Ptolomie himſelfe alſo, being ouerthrowne in battell by the riuer of Nilus, vaniſhed away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rhetoritian eſcaped Cæſars hands, and wandred vp and downe Æ GYPT in great miſerie, deſpiſed of euery man. Afterwards Marcus Brutus (who ſlue Cæſar) conquering ASIA, met with him by chaunce, and putting him to all the torments he could poſſibly deuiſe, at the length ſlue him. The aſhes of Pompeys bodie were afterwards brought vnto his wife Cornelia, who buried them in a towne of hers by the citie of ALBA.

Pompey with Ageſilaus.

How Pompey and Ageſilaus came to their greatneſſe.

NOw that we haue declared vnto you the liues of Ageſilaus and Pompey, let vs compare their manners and conditions together, which are theſe. Firſt, Pompey came to his honour and greatneſſe by his integritie, and ſo aduaunced himſelfe, and was a great aide vnto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid thoſe tyrants out of ITALY, who held it in bondage. But Ageſilaus vſurped the kingdome of LACEDÆMON, againſt the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides for a baſtard, whom his brother auowed to be his lawfull ſonne: and contemned beſides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of a lame king. Furthermore, Pompey did honour Sylla while he liued, and when he was dead, gaue his bodie honourable buriall in deſpite of Lepidus: and maried his daughter vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. Ageſilaus contrarily did diſhonour Lyſander vpon light occaſion: but Pompey had done no leſſe for Sylla, then Sylla had done for him. Lyſander on the other ſide, had made Ageſilaus king of LACEDÆMON, and Lieutenant generall of all GREECE. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey did vnto the common weale, were done of neceſſitie to pleaſe Cæſar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Ageſilaus alſo, to ſatisfie his ſonnes loue, ſaued Sphodrias life that had deſerued death, for the miſchiefe he had done the ATHENIANS: and he willingly alſo tooke part with Phabidas, not ſecretly, but openly, becauſe he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the ROMAINES, either through ignorance, or to pleaſure his friends: the ſame did Ageſilaus vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, through anger and ſelfe-will, in renewing warre with the BOEOTIANS, vpon a full peace concluded. If we ſhall recken of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faults they committed: Pompeys fortune vnto the ROMAINES was vnlooked for. But Ageſilaus would not ſuffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to auoid the lame kingdome, though they knew it before. For though Leotychides had bene proued a baſtard ten thouſand times, yet had not the race of the Eurityontides failed, but they could haue found another lawfull king among them, that ſhould haue gone vpright: had not Lyſander, fauoring Ageſilaus, kept the true meaning of the oracle from the LACEDÆMONIANS. On the other ſide againe for matters of gouernment, there was neuer ſuch an excellent deuice found out, as was done by Ageſilaus, to helpe the feare and daunger the LACEDEMONIANS were in, for thoſe that fled at the battell of LEVCTRES, when he counſelled them to let the law ſleepe for that day. Neither can any man match Pompeys with the like: who, to ſhew his friends what power he was of, did breake the lawes which himſelf had made. For Ageſilaus being driuen of neceſſitie to aboliſh the law, to ſaue the life of his citizens, found ſuch a deuice that the law was not hurtfull to the commonwealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it ſhould do hurt. I muſt needs commend this for a great vertue and ciuilitie in Ageſilaus, who ſo ſoone as he receiued the Scytala, (or ſcrole of parchment from the Ephori) returned into his countrie, and left the warre of ASIA. He did not as Pompey, who made himselfe great to the benefite of the commonwealth, and for the commonwealths sake, did forsake such honour and so great authoritie, as neuer Captaine before him, but Alexander the Great, had the like in those parts. But now to other matter. Touching their battels and exploits in warres, the multitude of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great armies that he led: Xenophon himselfe if he were aliue, could not compare Agesilaus victories vnto his: although for the singular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had liberty graunted him, to write and speake of Agesilaus what he thought good. Me thinkes also, there was great difference betwixt Pompey and Agesilaus, in their equitie and clemencie towards their enemies. For, whileſt Agesilaus went about to conquer THEBES, and vtterly to race and destroy the citie of MESSINA, the one being an auncient citie of his countrey, and the other the capitall citie of BOEOTIA: he had almost lost his owne citie of SPARTA, for at the least he lost the commaundement and rule he had ouer the rest of GREECE. The other contrarily gaue cities vnto pyrates to dwell in, which were willing to chaunge their trade and manner of life: and when it was in his choice to leade Tigranes king of ARMENIA, in triumph at ROME, he chose rather to make him a confederate of the ROMAINES, saying, that he preferred perpetuall honour before one dayes glorie. But since it is reason we should giue the first place and honour of the discipline of warres, vnto a Captaine of the greatest skill and experience in warres: the LACEDÆMONIAN then leaueth the ROMAINE farre behind. For first of all Agesilaus neuer forsooke his citie, though it was besieged with three score and ten thousand men, and that there were very few within the same to defend it, the which also a litle before had bene ouerthrowne at the battell of LEVCTRES. And Pompey on the other side, hearing that Cæsar with fiue thousand footmen only had taken a town in ITALIE, fled from ROME in very great feare. And therin he cannot be excused of one of these two: either that he fled cowardly for so few men, or else that he had a false imagination of more. For he conueyed his wife and children away, but he left all the rest without defence, and fled: where indeed he should either haue ouercome, valiantly fighting for defence of his countrey, or else haue receiued the conditions of peace which the conquerours should haue offered him. For he was a citizen and allied vnto him. And he that thought it an vntollerable thing, to prolong the tearme of his gouernment, or to graunt him a second Consulship: did now giue him oportunitie, suffering him to take the city of ROME, to say vnto Metellus the Tribune and the rest, that they were all his prisoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefest point of an excellent Captaine, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth himselfe the stronger, and also to keepe himselfe from compulsion of fight when he is the weaker: Agesilaus excelling in that, did euer keepe himselfe inuincible. Cæsar also had great skill therein, to keepe himselfe from daunger being the weaker, and againe could tell how to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his vtter destruction by land, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made himselfe Lord of the treasure, victuals, and also of the sea, which his enemies had in their hands, without fighting. That which they alledge in his excuse, is that which most doth condemne him, specially for so great and skilfull a Captaine. For as it is likely enough, that a young Generall of an armie may easily be brought from his wise and safe counsell, with rumour and tumult of a few fearefull men, that should perswade him it were a shame and dishonour for him if he did otherwise: yet were this no straunge matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the Great, whose campe the ROMAINES called their countrey, and his tent the Senate, and called all the Prætors and Consuls that gouerned at ROME, rebels and traitours to the commonwealth of ROME: who could excuse him (who was neuer seene commaunded by other then himselfe, but had bene alwaies chiefe Captaine and Generall in any war he made, and euer had the vpper hand) but that he was drawne on by the scoffes of Faonius & Domitius, to hazard battell, to endanger the whole Empire & liberty of ROME, only for feare they should call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had so much regarded present infamie, he should haue fought from the beginning for the defence of the citie of ROME, and not to haue taken example of Themistocles pollicie by flying, & afterwards to thinke it a shame as he did, to lye in THESSALIE a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint thē the fields of Pharsalia for a Theater,, or close campe, of necessitie to fight which of them should haue the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Herauld to summon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he must answer to his name, and come and fight, or else to loose the honour of the crowne vnto another. But there were infinite other fields and townes (and as a man would say the whole earth) which the commoditie of his armie by sea gaue him choice to conquer, if he would rather haue followed the steppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Agesilaus himselfe: who did patiently abide no lesse tumults within the citie selfe of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to summon him to come out to fight for all the rest of his countrey. And in ÆGYPT also, he did abide many false accusations against him, where with the king himselfe did burthen him, praying him alwaies to haue a litle patience. In fine, hauing followed the best counsell which he had determined with himselfe from the beginning, he saued the ÆGYPTIANS against their wils: and furthermore, he did not onely keepe the citie of SPARTA from so great a daunger, but did also set vp tokens of triumph in the same against the THEBANS, whereby he was not compelled at that time to leade them out to the slaughter, and besides that, gaue his citizens occasion to obtaine victorie afterwards. Hereupon Agesilaus was highly praised of them, whose liues he had saued against their wils. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by themselues through whom he had offended: yet some say, that he was deceiued by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the most part of the money to himselfe which he had brought out of ASIA, did hasten and perswade Pompey to giue battell, telling him that there was no mony left. The which though it had bene true, a worthie Captaine should not so lightly haue bene brought into errour, vpon a false account, to hazard himselfe to loose all. Thus may we see what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore, for their iourneys into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with small honour, for moneys sake to serue the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make warre with the GRECIANS. Lastly, in that which we accuse the ÆGYPTIANS for Pompeys sake: for the like matter do they againe accuse Agesilaus. For the one was cruelly put to death, and betrayed by them whom he trusted: and Agesilaus forsooke them which trusted him, and went to the enemies, hauing brought aide to fight against them.

Agesilaus conquered then Pompey.

HAuing determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander, and of Iulius Cæsar, that ouercame Pompey: hauing to speake of many things, I will vse none other preface, but onely desire the readers not to blame me though I do not declare all things at large, but briefly touch diuers, chiefly in those their noblest acts and most worthy of memory. For they must remēber, that my intent is not to write histories, but onely liues. For the noblest deeds do not alwaies shew mens vertues & vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sport makes mens naturall dispositions and maners appeare more plaine, then the famous battels won, wherein are slaine ten thousand men, or the great armies, or cities won by siege or assault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no account of other parts of the body, do take the resemblances of the face and fauor of the countenance, in the which consisteth the iudgement of their maners and disposition: euen so they must giue vs leaue to seeke out the signes and tokens of the mind onely, and thereby shew the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to write the wars, battels, and other great things they did. It is certaine that Alexander was descended from Hercules by Caranus, and that of his mothers side, he came of the bloud of the Æacides by Neoptolemus. They say also, that king Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancie with his mother Olympias, which at that time also was a young maiden, and an orphan without father or mother, in the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both receiued into the mysterie and fraternity of the house of the religious: and that afterwards, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whose consent they were maried together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, & that withall, there was a great light fire that dispersed it selfe all about into diuers flames. King Philip her husband also, shortly after he was maried, dreamed that he did seale his wiues belly, and that the seale wherwith he sealed, left behind the print of a Lion. Certaine wisards and soothsayers, told Philip that this dreame gaue him warning to loooke straightly to his wife. But Aristander TELMESIAN answered againe, that it signified his wife was conceiued with child, for that they do not seale a vessell that hath nothing in it: and that she was with child with a boy, which should haue a Lions heart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay asleepe in her bed, there was seene a serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefest cause (as some presuppose) that withdrew Philips loue & kindnes from her, and caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to do: either for that he feared ſome charm or enchantment, or elſe for that he thought himſelfe vnmeete for her company, ſuppoſing her to be beloued of ſome god. Some do alſo report this after another ſort: as in this maner. That the women in thoſe parts of long time, haue bene cõmonly poſſeſt with the ſpirit of Orpheus, and the diuine fury of Bacchus, wherupon they are called Cleodones, & Mimallones (as much as warlike and fierce) & do many things like vnto the women of EDONIA & THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Threskeuin (ſignifying in the Greek tong, too ſuperſtitiouſly giuen to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboue other women, louing to be inſpired with ſuch diuine madnes & furie, did celebrate her ſolemne ſacrifices with a certaine horrible and barbarous maner. For in theſe dances to Bacchus, ſhe caried a great number of tame ſnakes about her, the which gliding vpon the Iuie wherwith the women were dreſſed in thoſe ceremonies, & winding themſelues about the litle iauelins they had in their hands, and the garlands about their heads: thereby they made men the more afraid of them. Wherupon Philip after this dreame, ſent Chæro MEGALOPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to inquire what it ſignified. Anſwer was giuen him, that he ſhould do ſacrifice vnto Iupiter Hammõ, & honor him aboue al gods: and that he had loſt one of his eyes, with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber dore, ſaw the god in forme of a ſnake lye by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Eratoſthenes writeth) bidding her ſon farewel when he went to conquer ASIA, after ſhe had ſecretly told him alone, by whome he was begotten: ſhe prayed him to be valiant, and to ſhew himſelfe worthy his ſonne that begate him. Others tell alſo, that ſhe was angry with this report, ſaying: will Alexander neuer leaue to make me ſuſpected of Iuno? So it is, that Alexander was borne on the ſixth day of the moneth of Hecatombæon, (in Engliſh, Iune) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very ſame day, the temple of Diana in the city of EPHESVS was burnt, as Hegeſias MAGNESIAN doth witnes, whoſe cry and exclamation was ſo terrible & cold, that it was enough to haue quenched that fire. It is not to be wondered at, that Diana ſuffered her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, buſie about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the Prieſts, Magitians and ſoothſayers, which were at that time in EPHESVS, iudging that this did prognoſticate ſome maruellous great misfortune to come, like men beſtraught of their wits, they ran vp and downe the city, ſmiting of their faces, and crying that ſome great plague and miſchiefe was borne that day vnto ASIA. Shortly after that king Philip had won the city of POTIDÆA, three meſſengers came to him the ſame day that brought him great newes. The firſt, that Parmenio had won a notable battell of the ILLYRIANS: the ſecond, that his horſe onely wan the bell and prize at the Olympian games: and the third, that his wife had brought him a ſonne called Alexander. Philip being maruellous glad to heare theſe newes, the Soothſayers did make his ioy yet greater: aſſuring him that his ſonne which was borne with three victories all together, ſhould be inuincible. Now for his ſtature and perſonage, the ſtatues and images made of him by Lyſippus do beſt declare it, for that he would be drawne of no man but him onely. Diuerſe of his ſucceſſours and friends did afterwards counterfeit his image, but that excellent workeman Lyſippus onely, of all other the chiefeſt, hath perfectly drawne and reſembled Alexanders manner of holding his necke, ſomewhat hanging downe towards the left ſide, and alſo the ſweet looke and caſt of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not ſhew his freſh colour, but made him ſomewhat blacke, and ſwarter then his face indeede was: for naturally he had a very faire white colour mingled alſo with red, which chiefly appeared in his face and in his breaſt. I remember I read alſo in the commentaries of Ariſtoxenus, that his skin had a maruellous good ſauour, and that his breath was very ſweet: inſomuch that his body had ſo ſweet a ſmell of it ſelfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a paſſing delightfull ſauour, as if it had bene perfumed. And the cauſe hereof peraduenture might be the very temperature and conſtitution of his body, which was hote and burning like fire. For Theophraſtus is of opinion, that the ſweet ſauor cometh by meanes of the heat that drieth vp the moiſture of the body. By which reaſon alſo it appeareth, that the drie and hote countries parched with heat of the Sun, are thoſe that deliuer vnto vs the beſt ſpices: becauſe that the Sunne drieth vp the moiſture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This naturall heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be giuen to drinke, & to be haſtie. Euen from his childhood they ſaw that he was giuen to be chaſt. For though otherwiſe he was very hot & haſtie, yet was he hardly moued with luſt or pleaſure of the body, & wold moderatly vſe it. But on the other ſide, the ambitiõ & deſire he

he had of honor, ſhewed a certaine greatneſſe of mind and noble courage, paſſing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) deſirous of all kind of glorie: who like a Rhetoritian had a delight to vtter his eloquence, and ſtamped in his coines, the victories he had wonne at the Olympian games, by the ſwift running of his horſe and coaches. For when he was asked one day (becauſe he was ſwift of foot) whether he would aſſay to run for victorie at the Olympian games: I could be content, ſaid he, ſo I might run with kings. And yet to ſpeak generally, he miſliked all ſuch cõtention for games. For it ſeemeth that he vtterly miſliked all wreſtling & other exerciſe for priſe, where men did vſe all their ſtrength: but otherwiſe he himſelfe made certaine feſtiuall daies and games of priſe for common ſtage-players, muſitians and ſingers, and for the very Poets alſo. He delighted alſo in hunting of diuers kinds of beaſts, & playing at the ſtaffe. Ambaſſadors being ſent on a time from the king of PERSIA, whileſt his father was in ſome iourney out of his realme: Alexander familiarly entertaining of them, ſo wan them with his curteous entertainment, (for that he vſed no childiſh queſtions vnto them, nor asked thẽ trifling matters, but what diſtance it was from one place to another, and which way they went into the high countries of ASIA, and of the king of PERSIA himſelfe, how he was towards his enemies, and what power he had) that he did rauiſh them with delight to heare him, inſomuch that they made no more account of Philips eloquence and ſharpe wit, in reſpect of his ſons courage and noble mind, to attempt great enterpriſes. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken ſome famous citie, or had won ſome great battell, he was nothing glad to heare it, but would ſay to his play-fellowes: ſirs, my father will haue all, I ſhall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that ſhall be ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleaſure nor riches, but only in valiantnes and honour, thought that the greater conqueſts and realmes his father ſhould leaue him, the leſſe he ſhould haue to do for himſelfe. And therfore, ſeeing that his fathers dominions and Empire increaſed daily more & more, perceiuing all occaſion taken from him to do any great attempt: he deſired no riches nor pleaſure, but wars & battels, and aſpired to a ſigniorie where he might win honor. He had diuers men appointed him (as it is to be ſuppoſed) to bring him vp: as ſchoolemaſters, gouernors, & grooms of his chamber to attend vpon him: and among thoſe, Leonidas was the chiefeſt man that had the gouernment and charge of him, a man of a ſeuere diſpoſition, and a kinſman alſo vnto the queene Olympias. He miſliked to be called a maiſter or tutor, though it be an office of good charge, wherupon the others called him Alexanders gouernour, becauſe he was a noble man, and allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his ſchoolemaſter, was Lyſimachus an ACARNANIAN borne, who had no other manner of ciuility in him, ſauing that he called himſelfe Phœnix, Alexander Achilles, and Philip Peleus: and therefore he was well thought of, and was the ſecond perſon next vnto Leonidas. At what time Philonicus THESSALIAN had brought Bucephall the horſe to ſell vnto king Philip, asking thirteene talents, they went into the field to ride him. The horſe was found ſo rough and churliſh, that the riders ſaid he would neuer do ſeruice, for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the Gentlemens voices about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Therupon, Philip being afraid, commanded them to cary him away as a wild beaſt, and altogether vnprofitable: the which they had done, had not Alexander that ſtood by ſaid: O gods, what a horſe do they turne away, for lacke of skill and heart to handle him! Philip heard what he ſaid, but held his peace. Alexander oft repeating his words, ſeeming to be ſory that they ſhould ſend backe the horſe againe: why, ſaid Philip, doſt thou controll them that haue more experience then thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horſe? Alexander anſwered, and yet me thinkes I ſhould handle him better then all they haue done. But if thou canſt not, no more then they, replied Philip, what wilt thou forfeit for thy folly? I am content (quoth Alexander) to ieopard the price of the horſe. Euery man laughed to heare his anſwer: and the wager was laid between them. Then ran Alexander to the horſe, & tooke him by the bridle: and turned him towards the Sun. It ſeemed that he had marked (as I ſuppoſe) how mad the horſe was to ſee his owne ſhadow, which was euer before him in his eye, as he ſtirred too and fro. Then Alexander ſpeaking gently to the horſe, and clapping him on the backe with his hand, till he had left his furie and ſnorting: ſoftly let fall his cloke from him, and lightly leaping on his backe, got vp without any danger, and holding the reines of the bridle hard, without ſtriking or ſtirring the horſe, made him to be gentle enough. Then when he ſaw that the furie of the horſe was paſt, and that he began to gallop, he put him to his full career, and laid on ſpurs and voice a good. Philip at the firſt with feare beholding his ſons agilitie, leſt he ſhould take ſome hurt, ſaid neuer a word: but when he ſaw him readily turne the horſe at the end of his career, in a brauery for that he had done, all the lookers on gaue a ſhout for ioy. The father on the other ſide (as they ſay) fell a weeping for ioy. And when Alexander was lighted from the horſe, he ſaid vnto him kiſſing his head: O ſonne, thou muſt needs haue a realme that is meet for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee. Furthermore, conſidering that of nature he was not to be won by extremitie, and that by gentle meanes and perſwaſion he could make him do what he would: he euer ſought rather to perſwade then commaund him in any thing he had to do. Now Philip putting no great affiance in his ſchoolemaiſters of muſicke and humanitie, for the inſtruction and education of his ſonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed men of greater learning then their capacities would reach vnto: and that as Sophocles ſaith,

Philip propheciceth of his ſon Alexander.

He needed many reines, and many bits at once:

Ariſtotle was Alexanders ſchoolemaiſter. Ariſtotle borne in the citie of Stagira.

He ſent for Ariſtotle (the greateſt Philoſopher in his time, and beſt learned) to teach his ſon, vnto whom he gaue honorable ſtipend. For Philip hauing won & taken before, the city of STAGIRA, where Ariſtotle was borne: for his ſake he built it againe, and repleniſhed it with inhabitants which fled away, or otherwiſe were in bondage. He appointed thē for a ſchoolehouſe and dwelling place, the pleaſant houſe that is by the city of MIEZA. In that place are yet ſeene ſeats of ſtone which Ariſtotle cauſed to be made, and cloſe walks to walke in the ſhadow. It is thought alſo, that Alexander did not only learne of Ariſtotle, morall Philoſophie & humanitie, but alſo he heard of him, other more ſecret, hard and graue doctrine, which Ariſtotles ſcholers do properly call Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things ſpeculatiue, which requireth the maiſters teaching to vnderſtand them, or elſe are kept frō cōmon knowledge: which ſciences, they did not cōmonly teach. Alexander being paſſed into ASIA, and hearing that Ariſtotle had put out certaine bookes of that matter: for the honors ſake of Philoſophy, he wrote a letter vnto him, ſomewhat too plaine, and of this effect. Alexander vnto Ariſtotle greeting. Thou haſt not done well to put foorth the Acroamaticall ſciences. For wherein ſhall we excell other, if thoſe things which thou haſt ſecretly taught vs, be made common to all? I do thee to vnderſtand, that I had rather excell others in excellencie of knowledge, then in greatnes of power. Farewell. Whereunto Ariſtotle to pacifie this his ambitious humor, wrote vnto him againe, that theſe bookes were publiſhed, and not publiſhed. For to ſay truly, in all his treatiſes which he called μετὰ τὰ φυσικὰ, there is no plain inſtruction profitable for any man, neither to picke out by himſelfe, nor yet to be taught by any other, then Ariſtotle himſelfe, or his ſcholers. So that it is written as a memoriall for thē that haue bene entred and brought vp in the Peripatericke ſect & doctrine. It ſeemeth alſo, that it was Ariſtotle aboue all other, that made Alexander take delight to ſtudy Phiſicke. For Alexander did not onely like the knowledge of ſpeculation, but would exerciſe practiſe alſo, & helpe his friends when they were ſicke: & made beſides certaine remedies, & rules to liue by: as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his owne nature he was much giuen to his booke, & deſired to reade much. He learned alſo the Iliades of Homer of Ariſtotles correctiō, which they call τὴν ἐκ τοῦ νάρθηκος the corrected, as hauing paſſed vnder the rule: & laid it euery night vnder his beds head with his dagger, calling it (as Oneſicrates writeth) the inſtitution of martiall diſcipline. And when he was in the high countries of ASIA, where he could not readily come by other bookes, he wrote vnto Harpalus to ſend them to him. Harpalus ſent him the hiſtories of Philiſtus, with diuers tragedies of Eurypides, Sophocles, and Æſchylus: & certaine hymnes of Teleſtus & Philoxenus. Alexander did reuerence Ariſtotle at the firſt, as his father, & ſo he tearmed him: becauſe from his naturall father he had life, but from him, the knowledge to liue. But afterwards he ſuſpected him ſomewhat, yet he did him no hurt, neither was he ſo friendly to him as he had bene: whereby men perceiued that he did not beare him the goodwill he was wont to do. This notwithſtanding, he left not that zeale and deſire he had to the ſtudie of Philoſophie, which he had learned from his youth, and ſtill continued with him. For he ſhewed diuerſe teſtimonies thereof. As the honour he did vnto Anaxarchus the Philoſopher. The fiftie talents which he ſent vnto Xenocrates, Dandamis, and Calanus: of whom he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but ſixteene yeares old, was left his Lieutenant in MACEDON, with the cuſtodie and charge of his great ſeale: at what time he alſo ſubdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled againſt him, and hauing won their citie by aſſault, he draue out the barbarous people, and made a Colonie of it of ſundrie nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to ſay, the citie of Alexander. He was with his father at the battell of CHÆRONEA againſt the GRECIANS, where it was reported, reported, that it was he that gaue charge firſt of all vpon the holy band of the THEBANS. Furthermore, there was an old oke ſeene in my time, which the countrimen commonly call Alexanders oke, becauſe his tent or pauilion was faſtened to it: and not farre from thence is the charnell houſe, where thoſe MACEDONIANS were buried that were ſlaine at the battell. For theſe cauſes, his father Philip loued him very dearely, and was glad to heare the MACEDONIANS call Alexander king, and himſelfe their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fel out in his court afterwards by reaſon of Philips new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and ſtrife amongſt the women: for the miſchiefe of diſſention and iealouſie of women, doth ſeparate the harts of kings one from another, whereof was chiefeſt cauſe, the ſharpeneſſe of Olympias, who being a iealous woman, fretting, and of a reuenging mind, did incenſe Alexander againſt his father. But the chiefeſt cauſe that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom Philip maried a maiden, falling in fancie with her when himſelfe was paſt mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vncle vnto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the mariage, and hauing in his cups, he perſwaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the feaſt, to pray to the gods, that they might haue a lawfull heire of Philip and Cleopatra, to ſucceed him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therwith threw a cup at his head, and ſaid vnto him: Why, traitor, what am I: doſt thou take me for a baſtard? Philip ſeeing that, roſe from the boord, and drew out his ſword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choler and wine, he fell downe on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, Lo, ſaid he to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of EVROPE into ASIA, and ſtepping onely from one bed to another, ye ſee him laid along on the ground. After this great inſolencie, he tooke his mother Olympias away with him, and carying her into his country of EPIRVS, he left her there, and himſelfe afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demaratus CORINTHIAN, a friend of king Philips, and very familiar with him, came to ſee him. Philip when he had curteouſly welcommed him, asked him how the GRECIANS did agree together. Truly, O king, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the GRECIANS, when your owne court is ſo full of quarrell and contention. Theſe words nipped Philip in ſuch ſort, and cauſed him to know his fault, that through Demaratus meanes, whom he ſent to perſwade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come backe againe. Now when Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (deſiring for neceſſities ſake, to enter in league and friendſhip with Philip) offered his eldeſt daughter in mariage vnto Aridæus king Philips ſon, and had ſent Ariſtocritus ambaſſador into MACEDON for that purpoſe: the friends of Alexander and his mother, began againe to inueigle him with new reports and ſuſpitions, how Philip by this great mariage would aduaunce Aridæus to his vtter vndoing, and leaue him his heire in the kingdome. Alexander being netled therewith, ſent one Theſſalus a player of tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorus: to perſwade him to leaue Aridæus, that was a baſtard and a foole, and rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleaſed Pexodorus far better, to haue Alexander his ſon in law, then Aridæus. Philip vnderſtanding this, went himſelf into Alexanders chamber, taking Philotas with him (the ſon of Parmenio) one of his familiars, and bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a baſe mind, and was vnworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would caſt himſelfe away, marying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a ſlaue and ſubiect of a barbarous king. Thereupon he wrote letters vnto CORINTH, that they ſhould ſend Theſſalus bound vnto him. And furthermore, he baniſhed out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius and Ptolomie, his ſonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe and placed thē in great authoritie about him. Shortly after, Pauſanias ſuſtaining villanie by the counſell and commandement of Attalus and Cleopatra, crauing iuſtice of Philip, & finding no amends he conuerted all his anger againſt him, and for ſpite ſlue him himſelfe. Of this murther, moſt men accuſed Queene Olympias, who (as it is reported) allured this yong man, hauing iuſt cauſe of anger to kill him. And Alexander alſo went not cleare from ſuſpition of this murther. For ſome ſay, that Pauſanias after this villanie was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had bene abuſed: who recited theſe verſes to him of Eurypides, in the tragedie of Medea, where ſhe ſaid in anger, that ſhe would be reuenged:

Both of the bridegroome and the bride,
And of the father in law.

Notwithſtanding, afterwards he cauſed diligent ſearch to be made, and all them to be ſeuerely puniſhed that were of the conſpiracie: and was angrie alſo that his mother Olympias had cruelly slaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON at twentie yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuied and hated of dangerons enemies, and euery way full of danger. For the barbarous nations that were neare neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of strangers, but desired to haue their naturall kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GREECE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but hauing a litle altered the gouernments, had through his insolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long bene acquainted to obey. Therupon Alexanders councell of MACEDON, being afraid of the troublesom time, were of opinion, that Alexander should vtterly forsake the affaires of GREECE, and not to follow them with extremitie, but that he should seeke to win the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled against him, and wisely to remedie these new stirs. But he far otherwise determined to stablish his safetie by courage and magnanimitie: perswading himselfe, that if they saw him stoope and yeeld at the beginning, how litle so euer it were, euery one would be vpon him. Thereupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them sodainly with his armie, by the riuer of DANVBY, where in a great battell he ouerthrew Syrmus, king of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, hauing intelligence that the THEBANS were reuolted, and that the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his armie towards the streight of Thermopiles, saying that he would make Demosthenes the Orator see (who in his orations, whilst he was in ILLYRIA, and in the country of the TRIBALLIANS, called him child) that he was growne a stripling passing through THESSALIE, and should find him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his armie vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to giue them of the citie occasion to repent them: and therefore only demaunded Phœnix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trumpet, pardon and safetie vnto all them that would yeeld vnto him. The THEBANS on the other side, demanded of him Philotas and Antipater, two of his chiefest seruants, & made the crier proclaime in the city, that all such as would defend the liberty of GREECE should ioyne with them. Then did Alexander leaue the MACEDONIANS at liberty to make war with all crueltie. The THEBANS also fought with greater courage & desire then they were able, considering that their enemies were many against one. And on the other side also, when the garrison of the MACEDONIANS which were within the castell of CADMÆA, made a sallie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironed of all sides, were slaine in maner euery one of them, their citie taken, destroyed, and razed euen to the hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the people of GREECE afraid by example of this great calamitie & miserie of the THEBANS, to the end none of thē should dare from thencefoorth once to rise against him. He would cloke this crueltie of his vnder the complaints of his confederates, the PHOCIANS & PLATEIANS: who complaining to him of the iniuries the THEBANS had offred, could not deny them iustice. Notwithstanding, excepting the priests, and the religious, and all such as were friends vnto any of the Lords of MACEDON, all the friends and kinsmen of the Poet Pindarus, & all those that had diswaded them which were the rebels: he sold all the rest of the city of THEBES for slaues, which amounted to the number of thirtie thousand persons, besides thē that were slaine at the battell, which were sixe thousand mo. Now amongst the other miseries & calamities of the poore city of THEBES, there were certain THRACIAN souldiers, who hauing spoiled and defaced the house of Timoclea, a vertuous lady and of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them: and their Captaine hauing rauished her by force, asked her, whether she had any where hidden any gold or siluer. The lady told him she had. Then leading him into her garden, she brought him vnto a wel: where she said she had cast al her iewels and precious things, when she heard the city was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN stooped to looke into the well: she standing behind him, thrust him in, & then threw stones enough on him, and so killed him. The souldiers when they knew it, tooke & and bound her, and so caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander saw her countenance, & marked her gate: he supposed her at the first to be some great lady, she followed the souldiers with such a maiestie and boldnesse. Alexander then asking her what she was: she answered, that she was the sister of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of CHÆRONEA, where being generall he was slaine, valiantly fighting for the defence of the libertie of GREECE. Alexander wondering at her noble answer and couragious deed, commanded no man should touch her nor her children, and so freely let her go whither she wold. He made league also with the ATHENIANS, though they were very

sory for their miserable fortune. For the day of the solemne feast of their mysteries being come, they left it off, mourning for the THEBANS: courteously entertaining all those, that flying from THEBES came to them for succour. But whether it was for that his anger was past him, following therein the nature of Lyons: or becausse that after so great an example of cruelty, he would shew a singular clemency againe: he did not only pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did also counsell them to looke wisely to their doings, for their city one day should command all GRECE, if he chanced to dye. Men report, that certainly he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt so cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke vpon it was cause that he afterwards shewed himselfe more mercifull vnto diuerse others. Afterwards also he did blame the fury of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being drunke, and the MACEDONIANS also to refuse him to go any further to conquer the INDIANS, which was an imperfection of his enterprise, and a minishing also of his honour. Besides, there was neuer THEBAN afterwards, that had escaped the furie of his victory, and did make any petition to him, but he had his sute. Thus was the state of THEBES as you haue heard. Then the GRECIANS hauing assembled a generall councell of all the states of GRECE within the straights of PELOPONNESVS: there it was determined that they would make warre with the PERSIANS. Whereupon they chose Alexander Generall for all GRECE. Then diuerse men comming to visite Alexander; as well philosophers, as gouernours of states, to congratulate with him for his election, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at CORINTH) would likewise come as the rest had done: but when he saw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept still in the suburbes of CORINTH, at a place called CRANINM, he went himselfe vnto him, and found him layd all along in the Sunne. When Diogenes saw so many comming towards him, he sate vp a litle, and looked full vpon Alexander. Alexander courteously spake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea sayd he, that I do: that thou stand out of my Sunne a litle. Alexander was so well pleased with this aunswer, and maruelled so much at the great boldnesse of this man, to see how small account he made of him: that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, and mocking him, he told them: Maisters say what you list, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being desirous to heare what the Oracle of Apollo DELPHIAN would say vnto him touching the successe of his iourney into ASIA: he went vnto the city of DELPHES. It chanced so, that he came thither in the dayes which they call vnfortunate, on which dayes no man vsed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he sent first vnto the Nunne which pronounced the Oracles to pray her to come to him. But she refused to come, alledging the custome which forbad her to go. Thereupon, Alexander went thither himselfe in person, and brought her out by force into the temple. She seeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs haue his will: told him, My sonne, for that I see thou art inuincible. Alexander hearing that, sayd he desired no other Oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was euen ready to go on with his voyage, he had diuerse signes and tokens from the gods: and amongst other, an image of the Poet Orpheus made of cypruss, in the city of LEBETHRES, in those dayes did sweate marueilously. Many men fearing that signe, Aristander the soothsayer bad Alexander be of good cheare, and hope well, for he should obtaine noble victories that should neuer be forgotten, the which should make the poets and musitians sweate to write and sing them. Then, for his army which he led with him, they that do set downe the least number, say that they were thirty thousand footmen, and fiue thousand horsmen: & they that say more, do write, foure and thirty thousand footmen, and foure thousand horsemen. Aristobulus writeth, that Alexander had no more but three score and ten talents to pay his souldiers with: and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouision of victuals, then for thirty dayes onely. And Onesicritus sayth moreouer, that he did owe two hundred talents. Now, notwithstanding that he began this warre with so small ability to maintaine it, he would neuer take ship before he vnderstood the state of his friends, to know what ability they had to go with him, and before he had giuen vnto some, lands, and vnto other, a towne, and to others againe, the custome of some hauen. Thus by his bounty, hauing in maner spent almost the reuenues of the crowne of MACEDON, Perdiccas asked him: My Lord, what will you keepe for your selfe? Hope, sayd he. Then, quoth Perdiccas againe, we will also haue some part, since we go with you: and so refused the reuenew which the king had giuen him for his pension. Many others did also the like. But such as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him any thing, he gaue them very franckly, and in ſuch liberality ſpent all the reuenew he had. With this deſire and determination, he went on to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and going to the city of ILIVM he did ſacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effuſions vnto the demy gods (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whoſe bodies were buried there) and ſpecially vnto Achilles, whoſe graue he annointed with oile, and ranne naked round about it with his familiars, according to the ancient cuſtome of funerals. Then he couered it with noſegayes and flowers, ſaying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull friend, and after his death an excellent herauld to ſing his praiſe. When he had done, and went vp and downe the city to ſee all the monuments and notable things there: one asked him, if he would ſee Paris harpe. He anſwered againe, he would very faine ſee Achilles harpe, who played and ſung vpon it all the famous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of PERSIA, hauing leauied a great army, ſent his Captaines and Lieutenants to tary Alexander at the riuer of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of neceſſity, being the onely barre to ſtop his entry into ASIA. Moreouer, the Captaines of the councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this riuer, and of the height of the banke on the other ſide, which was very high and ſteepe, and could not be won without fighting. And ſome ſayd alſo, that he ſhould haue ſpeciall care of the ancient regard of the moneth: becauſe the kings of MACEDON did neuer vſe to put their armie into the field in the moneth of Daſon, which is Iune. For that, ſayd Alexander, we will remedy ſoone: let them call it the ſecond moneth, Artemiſium, which is May. Furthermore Parmenio was of opinion, that he ſhould not meddle the firſt day, becauſe it was very late. Alexander made anſwer againe, that HELLESPONT would bluſh for ſhame, if he were now afraid to paſſe ouer the riuer, ſince he had already come ouer an arme of the ſea. Thereupon he himſelfe firſt entred the riuer with thirteene guidons of horſemen, and marched forwards againſt an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies ſhot at him, as he was comming vp the other banke, which was very high and ſteepe, and worſt of all, full of armed men and horſemen of the enemies: which ſtaied to receiue him in battell ray, thruſting his men downe into the riuer, which was very deepe, and ranne ſo ſwift, that it almoſt caried them downe the ſtreame: inſomuch that men thought him more raſh than wiſe, to leade his men with ſuch daunger. This notwithſtanding, he was ſo wilfully bent that he would needs ouer, and in the end with great ado recouered the other ſide, ſpecially becauſe the earth ſlidde away, by reaſon of the mudde. So when he was ouer, he was driuen to fight pell mell man to man, becauſe his enemie did ſet vpon the firſt that were paſſed ouer, before they could put themſelues into battell ray, with great cries, keeping their horſes very cloſe together, and fought firſt with their darts, and afterwards came to the ſword when their darts were broken. Then many of them ſet vpon him alone, for he was eaſily to be knowne aboue the reſt by his ſhield, and the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hung from the one ſide to the other, a maruellous faire white plume. Alexander had a blow with a dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roeſaces and Spithridates, both two chiefe Captaines of the PERSIANS, ſetting vpon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding ſtraight to Roeſaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him ſuch a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and ſtraight drew out his ſword. But ſo ſoone as they two had cloſed together, Spithridates comming at the one ſide of him, raiſed himſelfe vpon his ſtirrops, and gaue Alexander with all his might ſuch a blow on his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creaſt off his helmet, and one of the ſides of his plume, and made ſuch a gaſh, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very haire of his head. And as he was lifting vp his hand to ſtrike Alexander againe, great Clitus preuenting him, thruſt him through with a partiſan, and at the very ſame inſtant, Roeſaces alſo fell dead from his horſe with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his ſword. Now whileſt the horſemen fought with ſuch furie, the ſquadron of the battell of footmen of the MACEDONIANS had paſſed the riuer, and both the battels began to march one againſt the other. The PERSIANS ſtucke not manfully to it any long time, but ſtraight turned their backes and fled, ſauing the GRECIANS which tooke pay of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander ſetting vpon them, more of will then diſcretion, had his horſe killed vnder him, being thruſt through the flanke with a ſword. This was not Bucephall, but another horſe he had. All his men that were ſlaine or hurt at this battell, were hurt amongſt them valiantly fighting againſt deſperate men. It is reported that there were ſlaine at this firſt battell, twenty thouſand footmen of theſe barbarous people, and

and two thousand fiue hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobulus writeth, that there were slaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footmen. Alexander to honour their valiantnesse, caused euery one of their images to be made in brasse by Lysippus. And because he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victorie, he sent vnto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their targets, which he had won at the battell, and generally vpon all the other spoiles, he put this honorable inscription: Alexander the sonne of Philip, and the Grecians, excepting the Lacedæmonians, haue wonne this spoile vpon the barbarous Asians. As for plate of gold or siluer, also purple silkes, or other such precious things which he got among the PERSIANS: he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victory of Alexander, brought such a sudden change amongst the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the city selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe city of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the least through all the low countries and coasts vpon the sea, yeelded straight vnto him, and the rest also, sauing HALICARNASSVS and MILETVM, which did still resist him: howbeit at length he tooke them by force. When he had also conquered all thereabouts, he stood in doubt afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometime he had a maruellous desire, hotly to follow Darius whersoeuer he were, and to venture all at a battell. Another time againe, he thought it better first to occupy himselfe in conquering of these low countries, and to make himselfe strong with the money and riches he should find among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. In the country of LYDIA neare vnto the city XANTHVM, they say there is a spring that brake of it selfe, and ouerflowing the bankes about it, cast out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certaine caracters in old letters, which sayd: that the kingdome of the PERSIANS should be destroyed by the GRECIANS. This did further so encourage Alexander, that he made hast to cleare all the sea coast, euen as farre as CILICIA & PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good successe he had, running alongst all the coast of PAMPHILIA, gaue diuerse historiographers occasion to set forth his doings with admiration, saying that it was one of the wonders of the world, that the fury of the sea, which vnto all other was extreme rough, and many times would swell ouer the tops of the high rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Menander himselfe in a comedy of his doth witnesse this wonderfull happinesse of Alexander, when merily he sayth:

O great Alexander, how great is thy state?
For thou with thy selfe maist thus iustly debate:
If any man liuing I list for to call,
He commeth, and humbly before me doth fall.
And if through the sourges my iourney do ly,
The waues giue me way, and the sea becomes dry.

Yet Alexander himselfe simply writeth in his Epistles (without any great wonder) that by sea he passed a place called the ladder, and that to passe there, he tooke ship in the city of PHASELIDES. There he remained many dayes, and when he saw the image of Theodectes PHASELITAN, standing in the market place: he went in a daunce thither one euening after supper, and cast flowers and garlands vpon his image, honoring the memory of the dead, though it seemed but in sport, for that he was his companion when he liued, by meanes of Aristotle and his philosophy. After that he ouercame also the PISIDIANS, who thought to haue resisted him, and conquered all PHRYGIA besides. There in the city of GORDIVS, which is sayd to be the ancient seate of king Midas: he saw the charret that is so much spoken of, which is bound with the barke of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous people, that they beleeued it as a prophecy: that whosoeuer could vndoe the band of that barke, was certainly ordained to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing to vndoe the band, and finding no ends to vndoe it by, they were so many fold wreathed one within the other, he drew out his sword, and cut the knot in the middest: so that then many ends appeared. But Aristobulus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and bodie of the charret, and so seuered them asunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, and vnderstood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius Generall of his army by sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination to leade his army into the high countries of Asia. Then did king Darius himselfe come against Alexander, hauing leauied a great power at Svsa, of sixe hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his wisards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he saw all the armie of the Macedonians on a fire, and Alexander seruing of him in the selfe same attire that he himselfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predecessor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he suddenly vanished from him. By this dreame it plainely appeared, that the gods did signifie vnto him, that the Macedonians should haue noble successe in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all Asia, euen as king Darius had done, when he was but Asgandes vnto the king: and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bold also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in Cilicia, supposing it had bene for that he was affraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sickenesse he had, the which some say he got by extreme paines and trauell, and others also, because he washed himselfe in the riuer Cydnus, which was cold as Ise. Howsoeuer it came, there was none of the other phisitians that durst vndertake to cure him, thinking his disease vncurable, and no medicines to preuaile that they could giue him, and fearing also that the Macedonians would lay it to their charge, if Alexander miscaried. But Philip Acarnanian, considering his maister was very ill, and bearing himselfe of his loue and goodwill towards him, thought he should not do that became him, if he did not proue (seeing him in extremity and danger of life) the vtmost remedies of phisicke, what danger soeuer he put himselfe into: and therefore tooke vpon him to minister vnto Alexander, and perswaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and go to the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrote him a letter from the campe, aduertising him, that he should beware of Philip his phisitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches, that he would giue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his maister. Alexander when he had red this letter, layd it vnder his beds head, and made none of his neerest familiars acquainted therewith. When the houre came that he should take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the potion he should drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, and withall, chearfully tooke the cup of him, shewing no manner of feare or mistrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the sight, how one reading the letter, and the other drinking the medicine both at one instant, they looked one vpon another, howbeit not both with like chearfull countenance. For Alexander looked merily vpon him, plainely shewing the trust he had in his phisitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the phisitian also beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be so falsely accused, and straight lift vp his hands to heauen, calling the gods to witnesse, that he was innocent, and then came to Alexanders bed side, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly do as he would aduise him. The medicine beginning to worke, ouercame the disease, and draue for the time, to the lowest parts of his body, all his naturall strength and powers: in so much as his speech failed him, and he fell into such a weakenesse, and almost swouning, that his pulse did scant beate, and his sences were wel-neare taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few dayes recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed himselfe openly vnto the Macedonians: for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health vntill they had seene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a Macedonian: and banisht out of his countrey, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Darius meant to meete with Alexander within the straights and vallies of the mountaines: besought him to tary rather where he was, being a plaine open countrey round about him, considering that he had a great hoast of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was most for his aduantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius answered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replied: For that, ô king, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you vpon my life he will come to you, yea and is now onwards on his way comming towards you. All those perswasions of Amyntas could not turne Darius from making his campe to march towards Cilicia. At the selfe same time also, Alexander went towards Syria to meet with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them missed the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this hap, and making hast to meete with his enemy within the straights. Darius also seeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the ſtraights: began then to find the fault and error committed, for that he had ſhut himſelfe vp in the ſtraights (holden in on the one ſide with the mountaine, and on the other with the ſea, and the riuer of Pindarus that ranne betweene both) and that he was driuen to diſperſe his army into diuerſe companies, in a ſtony and ill fauored country, ill for horſemen to trauell, being on the contrary ſide a great aduantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footmen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wiſh it to fight for his aduantage: ſo could he tell excellently well how to ſet his men in battell ray to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the leſſe number by many then his enemy, yet he had ſuch pollicy and caſt with him, that he foreſaw all, and would not be enuironed: For he did put out the right wing of his battell a great deale further, then he did his left wing, and fighting himſelfe in the left wing in the formoſt rankes, he made all the barbarous people flie that ſtood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thigh with a blow of a ſword. Chares writeth, that Darius ſelfe did hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithſtanding Alexander ſelfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater, ſayth, that indeed he was hurt on the thigh with a ſword, howbeit it did put him in no danger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurt him. Thus hauing won a famous victory, and ſlaine aboue a hundred and ten thouſand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius becauſe he fled, hauing ſtill foure or fiue furlongs vantage before him: howbeit he tooke his charret of battell wherein he fought, and his bow alſo. Then he returned from the chaſe, and found the MACEDONIANS ſacking and ſpoiling all the reſt of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches (although they had left the moſt part of their cariage behind them in the city of DAMAS, to come lighter to the battell) but yet reſerued for himſelfe all king Darius tent, which was full of a great number of officers, of rich moueables, and of gold and ſiluer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting off his armour, he entred into the bath and ſayd: Come on, let vs go and waſh off the ſweate of the battell in Darius owne bath. Nay, replied one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bath: for the goods of the vanquiſhed are rightly the vanquiſhers. When he came into the bath, and ſaw the baſons and ewers, the boxes, and violles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chamber perfumed paſſing ſweetly, that it was like a paradiſe: then going out of his bath, and comming into his tent, ſeeing it ſo ſtately and large, his bed, the table, and ſupper, and all ready in ſuch ſumptuous ſort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and ſayd: This was a king indeed, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to go to his ſupper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongſt other Ladies taken priſoners, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmaried: who hauing ſeene his charret and bow, burſt out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of themſelues, thinking Darius had bene ſlaine. Alexander pawſed a good while and gaue no aunſwer, pittying more their misfortune, then reioycing at is owne good hap. Then he preſently ſent one Leonatus vnto them, to let them vnderſtand, that Darius was aliue, and that they ſhould not need to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome onely: and as for them, that they ſhould haue at his hands all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his hands. As theſe words pleaſed the captiue Ladies, ſo the deeds that followed, made them find his clemency to be no leſſe. For firſt he ſuffered them to bury as many of the PERSIAN Lords as they would, euen of them that had bene ſlaine in the battell, and to take as much ſilkes of the ſpoiles, iewels, and ornaments, as they thought good to honour their funerals with: and alſo did leſſen no part of their honour, nor of the number of their officers and ſeruants, nor of any iot of their eſtate which they had before, but did allow them alſo greater penſions, then they had before. But aboue all, the princelieſt grace, and moſt noble fauour that Alexander ſhewed vnto theſe captiue princeſſes, which had alwayes liued in honourable fame and chaſtitie, was this: That they neuer heard word, or ſo much as any ſuſpition that ſhould make them afraid to be diſhonoured or deflowred: but were priuately among themſelues vnuiſited or repayred vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had bene in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had bene kept in ſome cloſe monaſtery: although Darius wife (as it is written) was paſſing faire, as Darius alſo was a goodly prince, and that his daughters likewiſe did reſemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a king, as I ſuppoſe, to conquer himſelfe, then to ouercome his enemies: did neither touch them, nor any other maid or wife, before he maried them, Barſine onely excepted, who being left Memnons widow (Generall of king Darius by ſea) was taken by the city of DAMAS. She being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good entertainement (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kings daughter) Alexander was bold with her by Parmenioes procurement (as Ariſtobulus writeth) who intiſed him to imbrace the company of ſo excellent a woman, and paſſing faire beſides. Furthermore, beholding the other PERSIAN Ladies beſides which were priſoners, what goodly faire women they were: he ſpake it pleaſantly, that the Ladies of PERSIA made mens eyes ſore to behold them. Notwithſtanding, preferring the beauty of his continency, before their ſweete faire faces, he paſſed by without any ſparke of affection towards them, more then if they had bene images of ſtone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his Lieutenant in the low countries vpon the ſea coaſt, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a marchant of TARENTVM, had to ſell two goodly yong boyes, maruellous faire: and therefore that he ſent vnto him to know his pleaſure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was ſo offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O, my friends, what villany hath euer Philoxenus ſeene in me, that he ſhould deuiſe (hauing nothing to do there) to purchaſe me ſuch infamy? whereupon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull words, that he ſhould ſend that vile TARENTINE marchant Theodorus and his marchandiſe to the Diuell. He ſharply puniſhed alſo one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beauty bare the onely name in CORINTH) and bring him to him. Another time alſo, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vnder Parmenioes charge, had deflowred two of the ſouldiers wiues that were ſtrangers, and waged of him: he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter. And if he found them guilty of the rape, that then he ſhould put them both to death, as brute beaſts borne to deſtroy mankind. And in that letter he wrote thus of himſelfe: For my ſelfe, ſayd he, I haue neither ſeene, nor deſired to ſee Darius wife: neither haue I ſuffered any ſpeech of her beauty before me. Moreouer he ſayd, that he did vnderſtand that he was mortall by theſe two things: to wit, ſleepe, and luſt: for, from the weakneſſe of our nature proceedeth ſleepe and ſenſuality. He was alſo no greedy-gut, but temperate in eating, as he ſhewed by many proofes: but chiefly in that he ſayd vnto the princeſſe Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For when (for the loue ſhe bare him) ſhe daily ſent him ſundrie delicate diſhes of meate, tarts, and marchpaines, and beſides the meate it ſelfe, the paſtlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he anſwered that he could not tell what to do with them, for he had better cookes then thoſe appointed him by his gouernour Leonydas, to wit: for his dinner, to riſe before day, and to march by night: and for his ſupper, to eate litle at dinner. And my gouernour, ſayd he, would oftentimes open the cheſts where my bedding and apparell lay, to ſee if my mother had put any fine knackes or conceipts among them. Furthermore, he was leſſe giuen to wine, then men would haue iudged. For he was thought to be a greater bibber then he was, becauſe he ſate long at the boord, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound ſome tedious matter, and yet but when he was at leiſure. For hauing matters to do, there was neither feaſt, banket, play, mariage, nor any paſtime that could ſtay him: as they had done other Captaines. The which appeareth plainely by the ſhortneſſe of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deeds he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had leyſure, after he was vp in the morning, firſt of all he would do ſacrifice to the gods, and then would go to dinner, paſſing away all the reſt of the day, in hunting, writing ſome thing, taking vp ſome quarrell betweene ſouldiers, or elſe in ſtudying. If he went any iourney of no haſtie buſineſſe, he would exerciſe himſelfe by the way as he went, ſhooting in his bow, or learning to get vp or out of his charret ſuddenly as it ranne. Oftentimes alſo for his paſtime he would hunt the foxe, or catch birds, as appeareth in his booke of remembrances of euerie day. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and noint himſelfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers if his ſupper were readie. He would euer ſuppe late, and was very curious to ſee, that euerie man at his boord were alike ſerued, and would ſit long at the table, becauſe he euer loued to talke, as we haue told you before. Otherwiſe he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite vpon, and as pleaſant, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelineſſe to adorne a prince, ſauing that he would be ſome thing ouer buſie in glorying in his owne deedes, much like vnto a bragging ſouldier: neither was he contented himſelfe to pleaſe his owne humour that way, but would alſo ſuffer his familiars to ſooth him euen

to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would neither praise him in his presence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durst say lesse of the praises which they gaue him. For of the first they were ashamed, and by the second they fell in danger. After supper, he would wash himselfe againe, and sleepe vntill noone the next day following, and oftentimes all day long. For himselfe, he was nothing curious of daintie dishes: for when any did send him rare fruites, or fish, from the countries neare the sea side, he would send them abroad vnto his friends, and seldome keepe any thing for himself. His table notwithstanding was alwayes very honourably serued, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his conquests, till it came to the summe of ten thousand drachmaes a day. But there he stayed, and would not exceede that summe: and moreouer, commaunded all men that would feast him, that they should not spend aboue that summe. After this battell of Issvs, he sent vnto the citie of Damas, to take all the gold and siluer, the cariage, and all the women and children of the Persians which were left there, where the men of armes of the Thessalians sped them full well: for therefore did he send them thither, because he saw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the battell: and so were the rest of his armie also well stored with money. There the Macedonians hauing tasted first of the gold, siluer, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by sent do follow the tracke of beasts, euen so were they greedie to follow after the goods of the Persians. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the sea coast. Thither came the Kings of Cyprvs and Phoenicia, and deliuered vp to him the whole Iland and all Phoenicia, sauing onely the citie of Tyre. That citie he besieged seuen moneths together by land, with great bulwarkes, and diuers engines of batterie, and by sea, with two hundred gallies. During this siege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the citie, and called him by his name: and there were diuers Tyrians also that dreamed in likewise, that Apollo told them that he would go vnto Alexander, because he was not pleased with their doings in the citie. Thereupon they bound his image, (which was of a wonderfull bignesse) with great chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the base, as if he had bene a traitor that would haue yeelded himselfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauouring Alexander. Alexander had there also another dreame: for he dreamed he saw a Satyre a farre off sporting with him, and when he thought to haue come neare to haue taken him, he still escaped from him: vntill at the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his hands. The Soothsayers being asked what this dreame should signifie, answered probably, by deuiding Satyros into two, and then it is Σὰ τύρος: which signifieth the citie of Tyre shall be thine. And they do yet shew vnto this day, the fountaine where Alexander thought he saw the Satyre. Continuing this siege, he went to make warre with the Arabians, that dwell vpon the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great danger of being cast away, onely because he heard his tutor Lysimachus that followed him, say boastingly, that he was not inferiour, nor older then the Phœnix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horses, and went vp a foote: and Alexander was of so courteous a nature, that he would not leaue his tutor Lysimachus behind him (who was so wearie that he could go no further) but because it was darke night, and for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encourage his tutor, and in manner to carie him. By this meanes, vnwares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreouer, it was verie cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiuing diuerse fires which the enemies had made, some in one place, and some in another, trusting to his valiantnesse, hauing alwayes prouided remedie in extremitie, when the Macedonians were distressed, himselfe euer putting too his owne hand: he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous people that lay by the fire side, he snatched away a fire-brand, and ranne with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were so affrayd, that they ranne their way as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and set vpon him, he slue them euery man, and so lay there that night, himselfe and his men without daunger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the siege of Tyre, that fell out thus. Alexander caused the most part of his armie to take rest, being ouerharried and wearied with so many battels as they had fought: and sent a few of his men onely to giue assault vnto the citie, to keepe the Tyrians occupied, that they should take no rest. One day the Soothsayer Aristander sacrificing vnto the gods, hauing considered of the signes of the intrailes of the beasts:

Alexanders iourney against the Arabians. Antiliban mons.

The courage and agilitie of Alexander.

did assure them that were present, that the citie should be taken by the latter end of the moneth. Euery bodie laughed to heare him: for that day was the very last day of the moneth. Alexander seeing him amated, as one that could not tell what to say to it, seeking euer to bring those tokens to effect, which the Soothsayers did prognosticate: commaunded them that they should not reckon that day the thirtith day, but the seuen and twentith, and immediatly vpon it made the trumpet sound the allarme, and giue a hotter assault to the wall, then he had thought to haue done before. They fought valiantly on both sides, insomuch as they that were left in the campe, could not keepe in, but must needes runne to the assault to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS seeing the assault so hote on euery side, their hearts began to faile them, and by this meanes was the citie taken the selfe same day. Another time also, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe citie of SYRIA, there fell a clod of earth vpon his shoulder, out of the which there flew a bird into the ayre. The bird lighting vpon one of the engines of his batterie, was caught with the nets made of sinewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines. Aristander did prognosticate, that it signified he should be hurt in his shoulder, notwithstanding, that he should yet take the towne. And indeed it came so to passe. When he sent great presents of spoyles which he wanne at the sacke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and diuers others of his friends: among other things, he sent vnto Leonidas his Gouernour, fiue hundred talents waight of frankensence, and a hundred talents waight of myrrhe: remembring the hope he put him into when he was a child. For, as Alexander was vpon a day sacrificing vnto the gods, he tooke both his hands full of frankensence to cast into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his Gouernour Leonidas saw him, he sayd thus vnto him: When thou hast conquered the countrey where these sweete things grow, then be liberall of thy perfume: but now, spare that litle thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to mind at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this sort: We do send thee plentie of frankensence and myrrhe, because thou shouldst no more be a niggard vnto the gods. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer also, which was thought to be the preciousest thing and the richest, that was gotten of all the spoyles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he saw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thing to be put into it. Some sayd one thing, some sayd another thing: but he sayd, he would put the Iliades of Homer into it, as the worthiest thing. This is confirmed by the best Historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides words, be true: then it appeareth that he did profite himselfe much by Homer in this iourney. For it is reported that when he had conquered ÆGYPT, he determined to build a great citie, and to repleniſh it with a great number of GRECIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to inclose a certaine ground, which he had chosen by the aduise of his enginers and worke-maisters, the night before he had a maruellous dreame, that he saw an old man standing before him, full of white haires, with an honourable presence, and comming towards him said these verses:

Within the foming sea there lies a certaine Iland, right
Against the shore of Ægypt, which of auncient Pharos hight.

As soone as he rose the next morning, he went to see this Ile of PHAROS, the which at that time was a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Nylus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme land, being forced by mans hand. This, he thought the meetest place that could be, to build the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broade inough, that separateth a great lake on the one side, and the sea on the other, the which doth ioyne hard to a great hauen. Then he said that Homer was wonderfull in all his things, but that amongst others, he was an excellent Architector: and commaunded, that straight they should cast the platforme of the citie, according to the situation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to mark withal, wherfore they were driuen to take meale, & with that did marke out vpon the earth being blacke, the compasse of the towne that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall parts, either of them resembled the skirts and fashion of the MACEDONIAN cloake. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there rose vpon the sodaine out of the riuer or lake, such an infinite multitude of great foule of all sortes, that they couered the element as it had bene a cloud, and lighting within this circuite, did eate vp all the meale, and left not a crumme. Alexander liked not these signes. Notwithstanding, his Soothsayers bad him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a signe that he should build a citie there, so ſo plentifull of all things, that he ſhould maintaine all ſorts of people. Then he commaunded them, vnto whom he had giuen the charge of the building, that they ſhould go forward with their worke, and he himſelfe in the meane time, tooke his iourney to go viſit the temple of Iupiter Hammon. The iourney was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two daungers aboue all the reſt moſt ſpeciall: the firſt, lacke of water, becauſe they had to trauell many dayes iourney through a great deſert: the ſecond was, the danger of the riſing of the South wind by the way, to blow the ſand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there roſe ſuch a tempeſt in that deſert, that blew vp whole hils of ſand, which ſlue fiftie thouſand men of Cambyſes armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know theſe dangers very well: howbeit it was hard to diſſwade Alexander from any thing which he had a deſire vnto. For, fortune fauouring him in all his attempts, made him conſtant and reſolute in his determinations: and his noble courage beſides, made him inuincible in all things he tooke in hand; inſomuch as he did not onely compell his enemies, but he had power alſo of time and place. In that voyage, in ſtead of theſe former dangers ſpoken of, he had many helpes, the which are ſuppoſed were ſent him from the gods, by the oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certaine ſort they haue beleeued the oracles that were written of him. Firſt of all, the wonderfull water and great ſhowers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the firſt danger, and did quench their thirſt, and moiſted the dryneſſe of the ſand in ſuch ſort, that there came a ſweete freſh ayre from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to ſhew them the way, and that they wandred vp and downe they could not tell where: there came crowes vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying faſt when they ſaw them follow them, and ſtayed for them when they were behind. But Calliſthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noiſe of the crowes, they brought them againe into the right way which had loſt their way. Thus Alexander in the end, hauing paſſed through this wilderneſſe, he came vnto the temple he ſought for: where the prophet or chiefe prieſt ſaluted him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The prieſt anſwered him, and bad him take heede he did not blaſpheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearſing that he had ſpoken, asked him, if the murtherers that had conſpired the death of Philip his father were all puniſhed. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would graunt him to be King ouer all the world. The god anſwered him by the mouth of his prophet, he ſhould: and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great preſents vnto the god, and gaue money large to the prieſts, and miniſters of the temple. This is that the moſt part of writers do declare, touching Alexanders demaund, and the oracles giuen him. Yet did Alexander himſelfe write vnto his mother, that he had ſecret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his returne into MACEDON. Others ſay alſo, that the prophet meaning to ſalute him in the Greeke tongue to welcome him the better, would haue ſayd vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deare ſonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, becauſe the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the latter end, ſaying, O Paidios, to wit, O ſonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that miſtaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumour ſtraight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his ſon. It is ſayd alſo, that he heard Pſammon the Philoſopher in ÆGYPT, and that he liked his words very well, when he ſayd that god was king of all mortall men. For (quoth he) he that commaundeth all things, muſt needes be god. But Alexander ſelfe ſpake better, and like a Philoſopher, when he ſayd: that god generally was father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the beſt ſort for himſelfe. To conclude, he ſhewed himſelfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made as though he certainly beleeued that he had bene begotten of ſome god: but vnto the GRECIANS he ſpake more modeſtly of diuine generation. For in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the citie of SAMOS, he ſaid: I gaue ye not that noble free citie but it was giuen you, at that time by him whom they called my Lord and father: meaning Philip. Afterwards alſo being ſtriken with an arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My friends, ſaid he, This bloud which is ſpilt, is mans bloud, and not as Homer ſaid,

No ſuch as from th'immortall gods doth flow.

And one day alſo in a maruellous great thunder, when euery man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rhetoritian being preſent, ſaid vnto him: O thou ſonne of Iupiter, wilt thou do as much? No, ſaid

he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my friends, as thou wouldst haue me: disdaining the seruice of fish to my boord, because thou seest not princes heads serued in. And the report goeth also, that Alexander vpon a time sending a litle fish vnto Hephæstion, Anaxarchus should say as it were in mockerie, that they which aboue others seeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the world, or else as litle as others haue. By these proofes and reasons alleaged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of him selfe, to thinke that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to keep other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceiued of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA into ÆGYPT, he made many sacrifices, feasts, and processions in honour of the gods, sundrie daunces, tragedies, and such like pastimes goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which striued euery one to exceed the other. For the kings of the CYPRIANS were the setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lot a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defray the charges of these pastimes. These kings were very earnest who should do best, but specially Nicocreon, king of SALAMINA, in CYPRVS: and Pasicrates, Lord of the citie of SOLES. For it fell out to their lot to furnish two of the excellentest players, Pasicrates furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Thessalus: whom Alexander loued singularly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victour, by the Iudges deputed to giue sentence. For when he went from the playes, he told them he did like the Iudges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would haue bene contented to haue giuen the one halfe of his Realme, not to haue seene Thessalus ouercome. Athenodorus being condemned vpon a time by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the feasts of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were plaied, and a fine set on his head for his absence: he besought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would release his penaltie. Alexander would not so do, but sent thither his money whereof he was condemned, and payed it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycon SCARPHIAN, an excellent stage-player had pleased Alexander well, and did foist in a verse in his Comedie, containing a petition of ten talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certaine of his friends also, to pray him to take ten thousand talents for the ransome of all those prisoners he had in his hands, and for all the countries, lands and signiories on this side the riuer of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in mariage, that from thenceforth he might be his kinsman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his councell. Amongst them Parmenio said vnto him: If I were Alexander, quoth he, surely I would accept this offer. So would I indeed, quoth Alexander againe, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would submit himself, he would vse him curteously: if not, that then he would presently march towards him. But he repented him afterwards, when king Darius wife was dead with child: for without dissimulation it grieued him much, that he had lost so noble an occasion to shew his curtesie and clemencie. This notwithstanding, he gaue her bodie honourable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongst the eunuches of the Queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women: who stealing out of Alexanders camp, taking his horse-backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: O gods, what wretched hap haue the PERSIANS! that haue not only had the wife and sister of their king taken prisoners euen in his life time, but now that she is dead in trauell of child, she hath bene depriued of princely buriall. Then spake the eunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious king, and for all due honor that might be wished her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queene Statira your wife whilst she liued prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any part or iot of their honor they were wont to haue before, sauing onely to see the light of your honour, the which, god Oromasdes graunt to restore againe (if it be his will) vnto your Maiestie: neither was there any honor wanting at her death (to set forth her stately funerals) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as mercifull in victorie, as he is valiant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in mind for very griefe: tooke the Eunuch aside into the secretest place of his tent, and said vnto him: If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIANS, become a MACEDONIAN, but doest in thy heart acknowledge Darius for thy soueraigne Lord and maister: I pray they, and do also coniure thee, by the reuerence thou beares vnto this bright light of the Sunne, and to the right hand of the King, that thou do tell me truly.

And

Are these the least euils which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death? And did she not in her life make vs more miserable by her dishonour, then if we had dishonourably fallen into the hands of a cruell enemie? For, what honest communication I pray thee, can a yong victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a prisoner: hauing done her so much honour as he hath done? Darius going on with these speeches, Tireus the eunuch fell downe on his knees, and besought him not to say so, neither to blemish the vertue of Alexander in that sort, nor yet so to dishonour his sister and wife deceased, and thereby also to depriue himselfe of the greatest comfort he could wish to haue in his calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemie that had greater vertues then a man could possibly haue: but rather that he should wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had shewed himselfe chaster to the Ladies, then valiant against the PERSIANS. And therewithall, the eunuch confirmed the great honestie, chastitie, and noble mind of Alexander, by many great and deepe othes. Then Darius comming out among his friends againe, holding vp his hands vnto the heauens, made this prayer vnto the gods: O heauenly gods, creators of men, and protectors of Kings and Realmes: first, I beseech you graunt me, that restoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good state, I may leaue the Realme vnto my successors, with that glorie and fame I receiued it of my predecessors: that obtaining victorie, I may vse Alexander with that great honor and courtesie, which he hath in my miserie shewed vnto those I loued best in the world. Or otherwise if the time appointed be come, that the kingdome of PERSIA must needes haue end, either thorough diuine reuenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: then good gods yet graunt, that none but Alexander after me, may sit in Cyrus throne. Diuers writers do agree, that these things came euen thus to passe. Now Alexander hauing conquered all ASIA on this side of the riuer of Euphrates, he went to meete with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thousand fighting men. It was told him by some of his friends to make him laugh, that the slaues of his armie had deuided themselues in two parts, and had chosen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the first, they began to skirmish onely with clods of earth, and afterwards with fistes, but at the last, they grew so hote, that they came to plaine stones and staues, so that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes haue the two Generals fight hand to hand one with the other: and Alexander selfe did arme him that was called Alexander, and Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the armie thereupon was gathered together to see this combat betweene them, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was sharpe betweene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priuiledge to go after the PERSIAN manner. Thus it is written by Eratosthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gausameles, which signifieth in the PERSIAN tongue, the house of the cammell. For some one of the auncient kings of PERSIA that had escaped from the hands of his enemies, flying vpon a dromedarie cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammell there. There fell out at that time an eclipse of the Moone, in the moneth called Boedromion (now August) about the time that the feasts of the mysteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleuenth night after that, both the armies being in sight each of other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went himselfe by torch-light viewing his bands and companies. Alexander on the other side whilest his MACEDONIAN souldiers slept, was before his tent with Aristander the Soothsayer, and made certaine secret ceremonies and sacrifices vnto Apollo. The auncient Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, specially Parmenio, seeing all the valley betwixt the riuer of Niphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noise as of a confused multitude of people that filled their campe with the sound thereof: they were amazed, and consulted, that in one day it was in maner vnpossible to fight a battell with such an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counsell him to giue battell by night, because the darknesse thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the sight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable answer: I will not steale victorie, quoth he. This answer seemed very fond and arrogant to some, that he was so pleasant, being neare so great daunger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a present noble courage, and a deepe consideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby to giue Darius no manner of occasion (if he were ouercome) to take heart againe, and to proue

another battell, accuſing the darkneſſe of the night as cauſe of his ouerthrow: as he had done at the firſt conflict, imputing his ouerthrow to the mountaines, the ſtraights, and the ſea. For, ſayd he, Darius wil neuer leaue to make warres with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, hauing ſo large a realme as he hath, and ſuch a world of people beſides: but then he will no more hazard battell, when his heart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he ſeeth his armie at noone dayes ouerthrowne by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and layd him downe to ſleepe, and ſlept all that night more ſoundly then he was wont to do before: inſomuch as the Lords and Princes of his campe coming to waite vpon him at his vprising, maruelled when they found him ſo ſound aſleepe, and therefore of themſelues they commanded the ſouldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiuing that time came faſt vpon them, Parmenio went into Alexanders chamber, and comming to his beds ſide, called him twiſe or thriſe by name, till at the laſt he awaked him, and asked him how it chanced that he ſlept ſo long, like one that had alreadie ouercome, and that did not thinke he ſhould fight as great and dangerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, ſayd Alexander, laughing on him: doeſt thou not thinke we haue alreadie ouercome, being troubled no more with running after Darius vp and downe a countrey vtterly deſtroyed, as we ſhould otherwiſe haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue come to battell, and deſtroyed the countrey before vs? Now Alexander did not only ſhew himſelfe before the battell, but euen at the very inſtant of the battell, a noble man of courage, and of great iudgement. For Parmenio leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue ſuch a fierce onſet vpon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them giue backe: and Mazeus alſo, king Darius Lieutenant, ſent certaine troupes of horſmen out of their battell, to giue charge vpon them that were left in the campe to guard the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, ſent immediatly to aduertiſe Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be loſt, if he did not ſend preſently to aide the rereward. When theſe newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had alreadie giuen the ſignall of battell vnto his men for to giue charge. Whereupon he anſwered the meſſenger that brought him theſe newes, that he ſhould tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wan the battell, they ſhould not onely ſaue their owne cariage, but alſo win the cariage of their enemies: and if it were their chance to loſe it, then that they ſhould not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their ſlaues, but onely to thinke to die honourably, valiantly fighting for his life. Hauing ſent this meſſage vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet. The reſt of his armour for his bodie, he had put it on before in his tent, which was, a CICILIAN caſſocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many folds of canuas with oylet-holes, which was gotten among the ſpoiles at the battell of ISSVS. His head-peece was as bright as ſiluer, made by Theophilus the armourer: his coller ſute-like to the ſame, all ſet full of precious ſtones, and he had a ſword by his ſide maruellous light, and of excellent temper, which the King of the CITIBIANS had giuen him, vſing commonly to fight with his ſword at any ſet battell. His coate-armour was maruellous rich, and of ſumptuous workmanſhip, farre aboue all the reſt he wore. It was of the workmanſhip of Hellicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a preſent, and this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did ſet his men in battell ray, or made any oration vnto them, or did ride alongſt the bands to take view of them: he alwayes vſed to ride vpon another horſe to ſpare Bucephal, becauſe he was then ſomewhat old: notwithſtanding, when he meant indeed to fight, then Bucephal was brought vnto him, and as ſoone as he was gotten vp on his back, the trumpet ſounded, and he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long exhortations to encourage the men of armes of the THESSALIANS and the other GRECIANS alſo, and when they had all promiſed him they would ſticke to him like men, and prayed him to leade them, and giue charge vpon the enemies: he tooke his launce in his left hand, and holding vp his right hand vnto heauen, beſought the gods (as Calliſthenes writeth) that if it were true he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would pleaſe them that day to helpe him, and to encourage the GRECIANS. The Soothſayer Ariſtander was then on horſe-backe hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, and a crowne of gold on his head, who ſhewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies. This maruellouſly encouraged all the armie that ſaw it, and with this ioy, the men of armes of Alexanders ſide, encouraging one another, did ſet ſpurres to their horſe to charge vpon the enemies. The battell of the footmen of the PERSIANS, began a litle to giue way, and before the foremoſt could come to giue them charge, the barbarous people turned their

their backes, and fled. The chaſe was great: Alexander driuing them that fled vpon the middeſt of their owne battell, where Darius ſelfe was in perſon, he ſpied him a farre off ouer the foremoſt rankes in the middeſt of his battell, being a goodly tall Prince, ſtanding in a chariot of warre, compaſſed in round with great troupes of horſemen, all ſet in goodly ordinance to receiue the enemie. But when they ſaw Alexander at hand with ſo grimme a looke, chaſing them that fled, through thoſe that yet kept their rankes: there fell ſuch a feare among them, that the moſt part diſperſed themſelues. Notwithſtanding, the beſt and moſt valianteſt men fought it out to the death before their King, and falling dead one vpon another, they did let them that the enemies could not ſo well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the laſt gaſpe, did yet take both men and horſes by the legges to hinder them. Darius then ſeeing nothing but terrour and deſtruction before his eyes, and that the bands which he had ſet before him for ſafegard, came backe vpon him, ſo as he could not deuiſe how to turne his chariot forward nor backward, the wheeles were ſo hindered and ſtayed with the heapes of dead bodies, and that the horſe alſo being ſet vpon and hid in manner in this conflict, fell to leaping and plunging for feare, ſo that the charrettiers could no longer guide nor driue them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had fole, and ſo ſaued himſelfe flying vpon her. And yet had he not thus eſcaped, had not Parmenio once againe ſent vnto Alexander to pray him to come and aide him: becauſe there was yet a great ſquadron whole together that made no countenance to flie. Somewhat there was in it, that they accuſed Parmenio that day to haue dealt but ſlackly and cowardly, either becauſe his age had taken his courage from him, or elſe for that he enuied Alexanders greatneſſe and proſperitie, who againſt his will became ouer great, as Calliſthenes ſaid. In fine, Alexander was angrie with the ſecond meſſage, and yet told not his men truly the cauſe why, but faining that he would haue them leaue killing, and becauſe alſo night came on: he cauſed the trumpet ſound retraite, and ſo went towards his armie, whom he thought to be in diſtreſſe. Notwithſtanding, newes came to him by the way, that in that place alſo, they had giuen the enemies the ouerthrow, and that they fled euery way for life. The battell hauing this ſucceſſe, euery man thought that the kingdome of the PERSIANS was vtterly ouerthrowne, and that Alexander likewiſe was become onely King of all ASIA: whereupon he made ſumptuous ſacrifices vnto the gods, and gaue great riches, houſes, lands and poſſeſſions vnto his friends and familiars. Furthermore, to ſhew his liberalitie alſo vnto the GRECIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would haue all tyrannies ſuppreſſed throughout all GREECE, and that all the GRECIANS ſhould liue at libertie vnder their owne lawes. Particularly alſo he wrote vnto the PLATÆIANS, that he would reedifie their citie againe, becauſe their predeceſſors in time paſt, had giuen their countrey vnto the GRECIANS, to fight againſt the barbarous people for the defence of the common libertie of all GREECE. He ſent alſo into ITALY vnto the GROTONIANS, part of the ſpoile, to honour the memorie of the valiantneſſe, and good will of Phayllus their citizen, who in the time of the warres with the MEDES (when all the GRECIANS that dwelt in ITALY had forſaken their naturall countrimen of GREECE it ſelfe, becauſe they thought they could not otherwiſe ſcape) went with a ſhip of his vnto SALAMINA, which he armed and ſet forth at his owne charges, becauſe he would be at the battell, and partake alſo of the common danger with the GRECIANS: ſuch honour did Aelxander beare vnto proweſſe, that he loued to reward and remember the worthy deedes of men. Then Alexander marching with his armie into the countrey of BABYLON, they all yeelded ſtraight vnto him. When he came into the countrey of the ECBATANIANS, he maruelled when he ſaw an opening of the earth, out of the which there came continuall ſparkes of fire as out of a well: and that hard by alſo the earth ſpued out continually a kind of * maund or chalkie clay ſomewhat liquid, of ſuch abundance, as it ſeemed like a lake. This maund or chalke is like vnto a kind of lime or clay, but it is ſo eaſie to be ſet a fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightneſſe onely of the light that commeth out of the fire, it is ſet a fire, and doth alſo ſet the ayre a fire which is betweene both. The barbarous people of that countrey, being deſirous to ſhew Alexander the nature of that Naptha, ſcattered the ſtreete that led to his lodging, with ſome of it. Then the day being ſhut in, they fired it at one of the ends, and the firſt drops taking fire, in the twinckling of an eye, all the reſt from one end of the ſtreete to the other was of a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in bathe at that time, and waited vpon by a page called Steuen: (a hard fauoured boy, but yet that had an excellent ſweete voice to ſing)

The flying of Darius.

Alexanders third victorie of Darius, and liberalitie to all men.

* The ſtrength and power of Naptha, in the countrey of Ecbatania.

one Athenophanes an ATHENIAN, that alwayes nointed and bathed the King, and much delighted him with his pleasant conceits, asked him if he would see the triall of this Naptha vpon Steuen: for if the fire took and went not out, then he would say it had a wonderful force, and was vnquenchable. The page was contented to haue it proued vpon him. But so soone as they had laid it on him, and did but touch it only, it tooke straight of such a flame, and so fired his body, that Alexander himself was in a maruellous perplexitie withall. And sure had it not bene by good hap, that there were many by, ready with vessels full of water to put into the bath, it had bene vnpossible to haue saued the boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet so he scaped narrowly, and besides was sicke long after. Now some apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, saying, that therewith she rubbed the crowne and lawne she gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her mariage, so much spoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could cast fire of themselues, neither did the fire light by chance. But by oyling them with this Naptha she wrought a certaine aptnesse to receiue more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride sate. For the beames which the fire casteth out, haue ouer some bodies no other force, but to heat and lighten them. But such as haue an oily drie humour, and thereby a simpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire: it easily enflameth & setteth a fire, by the forcible impression of his beames. Howbeit they make a great question of the cause of this naturall force of Naptha, * or whether this liquid substance and moist humour that taketh fire so easily, doth come of the earth that is fattie & apt to conceiue fire. For the country about BABYLON is very hot, insomuch as oftē times barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp again, as if the earth by vehement inflammation had a strong blast to cast it out: and men in the extreamest heate of the sommer, do sleepe there, vpon great leather budgets filled ful of fresh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his Lieutenant and Gouernor of that countrey, desiring to set forth and beautifie the gardens of the Kings palace and walkes of the same, with all maner of plants of GREECE: he brought all the rest to good passe, sauing iuie only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer died, because the heat and temper of the earth killed it, and the iuy of it selfe liketh fresh aire and a cold ground. This digression is somewhat from the matter, but peraduenture the Reader wil not think it troublesome, how hard socuer he find it, so it be not ouer tedious. Alexander hauing won the citie of SVSA, he found within the castle foure thousand talents in ready coine, gold and siluer, besides other infinite treasure and inestimable, amongst the which (it is said) he found to the value of fiue thousand talents weight of * purple HERMIONA silk, which they had safe locked vp and kept the space of two hundred yeares saue ten, & yet the colour kept as fresh as if it had bene newly made. Some say that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it with honie, in silkes, which before had bene died red, and with white oile in white silkes. For, there are silkes seene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. Dino writeth furthermore, that the kings of PERSIA made water to be brought from the riuers of Nylus and Ister (otherwise called Danubie) which they did lock vp with their other treasure for a confirmation of the greatnes of their Empire, & to shew that they were Lords of the world. The waies to enter into PERSIA being very hard of passage, and in maner vnpassable, (both for the ilnesse of the waies, as also for the guard that kept them, which were the choisest men of PERSIA) Darius also being fled thither: there was one that spake the Greek and PERSIAN tongue (whose father was borne in the countrey of LYCIA, and his mother a PERSIAN) that guided Alexander into PERSIA, by some compasse fetched about not very long, according to the oracles answer of Alexander giuen by the mouth of the Nun Pythias, when he was a child: that a LYCIAN should guide and leade him against the PERSIANS. There was then great slaughter made in PERSIA of the prisoners that were taken. For Alexander himselfe writeth, that he commaunded the men should be put to the sword, thinking that the best way to serue his turne. It is said also, that there he found a maruellous treasure of gold and siluer in readie money, as he had done before in the citie of SVSA: the which he caried away with all the rest of the Kings rich wardrobe, and with it laded ten thousand moyles, and fiue thousand camels. Alexander entring into the castle of the chiefe citie of PERSIA, saw by chaunce a great image of Xerxes lie on the ground, the which vnwares was throwne downe by the multitude of the souldiers that came in thronging one vpon another. Thereupon he stayed, and spake vnto it as if it had bene aliue, saying: I cannot tell whether I should passe by thee, and let thee lie, for the warre thou madest sometime against the GRECIANS: or whether I should lift thee vp, respecting the noble mind and vertues thou haddest.

Alexanders iourney into Persia.

Alexander found a maruellous treasure in Persia.

In

In the end, when he had ſtood mute a long time, conſidering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refreſh his wearie armie, becauſe it was the winter quarter, he remained there 4. moneths together. The report goeth that the firſt time that Alexander ſate vnder the cloth of ſtate of king Darius, all of rich gold: Demarathus CORINTHIAN (who firſt began to loue him, euen in his father Philips time) burſt out in teares for ioy (good old man) ſaying, that the GRECIANS long time dead before, were depriued of this bleſſed hap, to ſee Alexander ſit in king Xerxes princely chaire. After that, preparing againe to go againſt Darius, he would needs make merry one day, and refreſh himſelfe with ſome banquet. It chanced ſo, that he with his companions was bidden to a priuate feaſt priuatly, where was aſſembled ſome fine curtiſans of his familiars, who with their friends tarried at the banquet. Amongſt them was that famous Thais, borne in the countrey of ATTICA, and then concubine to Ptolomy, king of ÆGYPT after Alexanders death. She finely praiſed Alexander, and partly in ſporting wiſe, began to vtter matter in affection of her countrey, but yet of greater importance then became her mouth: ſaying, that that day ſhe found her ſelfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for all the paines ſhe had taken, trauelling through all the countries of ASIA, following of his armie, now that ſhe had this fauor and good hap to be merrie and pleaſant, in the proud and ſtately pallace of the great kings of PERSIA. But yet it would do her more good for a recreation to burne Xerxes houſe with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the citie of ATHENS: and her ſelfe to giue the fire to it, before ſo noble a Prince as Alexander. Becauſe euer after it might be ſayd, that the women following his campe had taken more noble reuenge of the PERSIANS, for the wrongs and iniuries they had done vnto GRECE: then all the Captaines of GRECE that euer were had done, either by land or ſea. When ſhe had ſaid, Alexanders familiars about him, clapped their hands and made great noiſe for ioy, ſaying: that it were as good a deed as could be poſſible, and perſwaded Alexander vnto it. Alexander yeelding to their perſwaſions, roſe vp, and putting a garland of flowers vpon his head, went foremoſt himſelfe: and all his familiars followed after him, crying and dauncing all about the caſtle. The other MACEDONIANS hearing of it alſo, came thither immediatly with torches light and great ioy, hoping that this was a good ſigne that Alexander meant to returne againe into MACEDON, and not to dwell in the countrey of the barbarous people, ſith he did burne and deſtroy the kings caſtle. Thus, and in this ſort it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwiſe: that it was not burnt with ſuch ſport, but by determination of the counſell. But howſoeuer it was, all they graunt, that Alexander did preſently repent him, and commanded the fire to be quenched ſtraight. For his liberalitie, that good will and readineſſe to giue, increaſed with his conqueſts: and when he did beſtow gifts of any, he would beſides his gift, euer giue them good countenance, on whom he beſtowed his grace and fauour. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Ariſto being Colonell of the PÆONIANS, hauing ſlaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and ſaid: ſuch a preſent, O king, by vs, is euer rewarded with a cup of gold. Yea, quoth Alexander, ſmiling vpon him with an emptie cup. But I drinke to thee this cup full of good wine, and do giue thee cup and all. Another time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle loden with gold of the Kings: and when the poore moyle was ſo wearie that ſhe could no longer carie her burden, the moyletter put it vpon his owne back, and loded himſelf withall, carying it ſo a good pretie way: howbeit in the end being ouerloden, was about to throw it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burden he caried. When it was told him: well, quoth he to the moyletter, be not wearie yet but carie it into the tent, for I giue it thee. To be ſhort, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with thoſe that would aske him ſomewhat. He wrote alſo vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his friend, if he would refuſe his gifts. It ſeemed that he had giuen nothing vnto a yong boy called Serapion (who euer did ſerue them the ball that plaid at tennis) becauſe he asked him nothing. Wherefore the King playing on a time, this yong boy threw the ball to others that played with him, and not to himſelfe. The King maruelling at it, at the length ſaid vnto him: Why, my boy, doeſt thou not giue me the ball? Becauſe your Maieſtie doth not aske it me, quoth he. Alexander then vnderſtanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, and did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him alſo one Proteas, a pleaſant conceited man, and that could ieaſt finely. It chanced vpon ſome occaſion that Alexander fell out with him: whereupon ſome of his friends were interceſſors vnto the King for him, and beſought him to pardon him: & Proteas himſelf alſo being preſent, craued pardon with teares in his eies. Alexander therupon forgaue him. Then preſently replied Proteas, I deſire it may pleaſe your Grace, that I may receiue ſome teſtimonie to aſſure me I am in your fauor. Thereupon the king ſtraight commaunded one to giue him fiue talents. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familiars and guard about him, were very great, as it appeared plainely by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him, to this effect: I know thou ſpareſt not to giue thy friends large gifts, and that thou makeſt much of them: but thereby thou makeſt them kings fellowes, they get many friends, and leaue thee poſt alone without any. His mother did many times write ſuch like matters vnto him, the which Alexander kept very ſecret, ſauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephæſtion being preſent drew neare, & read the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had read it, he pluckt the ſeale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vſe to ſeale his letters, and put it to Hephæſtions mouth. He gaue alſo vnto the ſon of Mazeus (that was the chiefeſt man about Darius) a ſecond gouernment, beſides that which he had before, and greater then the firſt. This young nobleman refuſed it, ſaying: why, and it pleaſe your Grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio alſo, Bagoas houſe, where (as it is reported) he found a thouſand talents worth of the ſpoiles and goods of the SVSIANS. He wrote alſo vnto Antipater, that he ſhould keepe a guard about his perſon, for he had many enemies that lay in wait for him. He did ſend alſo many goodly preſents vnto his mother, but withal he wrote vnto her, that ſhe would meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpon her the office of a captain. She ſtorming at it, he patiently did brook her anger. Antipater another time, writing a long letter vnto him againſt his mother Olympias: when he had read it ouer, Loe, ſaid he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye wil wipe out ten thouſand ſuch letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiuing on a time, that his friends became very diſſolute and licencious in diet and life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked ſhooes nailed with ſiluer nailes, that Leonatus alſo cauſed diuers camels to be loden amongſt his cariage with powder of ÆGYPT, to put vpon him when he wreſtled or vſed any other exerciſe of bodie, and that alſo they caried after Philotus, toiles for chaſe and hunting, of a hundreth furlong long, and that there were alſo that vſed precious perfumes and ſweet ſauors when they bathed themſelues, more then there were that rubbed themſelues with plaine oyle, and that they had fine chamberlaines to rub them in the bath, and to make their beds ſoft and delicate: he wiſely and curteouſly rebuked them and ſaid: I maruell, ſaid he, that you which haue fought in ſo often and great battels, do not remember that they which trauell, do ſleepe more ſweet and ſoundly, then they that take their eaſe and do nothing: and that you do not mark, that comparing your life, with the maner of the life of the PERSIANS, to liue at pleaſure is a vile thing, and to trauel is princely. And how I pray you, can a man take paine to dreſſe his own horſe, or to make cleane his launce or helmet, that for ſlothfull curioſities ſake, diſdaineth to rub his owne bodie with his fingers? Are you ignorant that the tipe of honour in all our victorie conſiſteth, in ſcorning to do that which we ſee them do, whom we haue vanquiſhed and ouercome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint themſelues with hardneſſe: he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard himſelfe more dangerouſly, then euer he had done before. Whereupon an Ambaſſador of LACEDÆMON being preſent to ſee him fight with a Lion, and to kill him, ſayd vnto him: truly your Grace hath fought well with this Lion, and tried which of you two ſhould be King. Craterus after that, cauſed this hunting to be ſet vp in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES: where are the images of the Lion, of the dogges, and of the King fighting with the Lion, and of himſelfe alſo that came to helpe him, all thoſe images being of copper, ſome made by Lyſippus, the reſt by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put himſelfe vnto all ieopardies, as well to exerciſe his ſtrength and courage, as alſo to allure his men to do the like. This notwithſtanding his friends and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding rich, they would needes liue delicately and at eaſe, and would take no more paines, miſliking vtterly to go vp and downe the countries to make warre here and there, and thereupon began a litle to find fault with Alexander, and to ſpeake euill of him. Which at the firſt Alexander tooke quietly, ſaying, that it was honour for a King to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſlaundered and ill ſpoken of, for doing of good. And yet the leaſt good turnes he did vnto his friends, did ſhew his heartie loue and honour he bare them, as ſhall appeare vnto you by ſome examples that follow. Peuceſtas being bitten by a beare, did let his friends vnderſtand by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vnto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus: Send me word at the leaſt yet how thou doeſt, & whether any of thy fellowes did forſake thee at the hunting, to the end they may be puniſhed.

Hephæſtion

Hephæſtion being abſent about certaine buſineſſe he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a beaſt called Ichnewmon, Craterus vnfortunately croſſing Perdiccas dart, was ſtricken through both his thighes. Peuceſtas being cured of a great diſeaſe, Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phiſition that had cured him, and gaue him thankes. Craterus alſo being ſicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine ſacrifices for the recouerie of his health, and ſent vnto him, willing him to do the like. And when the Phiſition Pauſanias meant to giue him a drinke of Elleborus, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what danger he was in, and prayed him to be carefull how he receiued that medicine. He did alſo put Ephialtes and Ciſſus in priſon, who brought him the firſt newes of Harpalus flying, becauſe they did wrongfully accuſe and ſlaunder him. When he had commaunded there ſhould be a bill made of all the old mens names, and diſeaſed perſons that were in his campe, to ſend them home againe into their countrey: there was one Eurylochus Ægeian, that made his name be billed among the ſicke perſons, and it was found afterwards that he was not ſicke, and confeſſed that he did it onely to follow a young woman called Teleſippa, with whom he was in loue, who was returning homewards towards the ſea ſide. Alexander asked him, whether this woman were free or bond: he anſwered him, that ſhe was a curtizan free borne. Then ſayd Alexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I cannot force her to tarie: but ſeeke to win her by giftes and faire words to be contented to tarie, ſithence ſhe is a free woman. It is a wonderfull thing to ſee what paines he would take, to write for his friends, euen in ſuch trifles as he did. As when he wrote into Cilicia for a ſeruant of Seleucus that was fled from his maiſter, ſending ſtraight commaundement, that they ſhould carefully lay for him. And by another letter he commendeth Peuceſtas, for that he had ſtayed and taken one Nicon, a ſlaue of Craterus. And by one other letter alſo vnto Megabizus, touching another bondman that had taken ſanctuarie in a temple, he commaunded him alſo to ſeeke to entiſe him out of the ſanctuarie, to lay hold on him if he could, but otherwiſe not to meddle with him in any caſe. It is ſaid alſo, that at the firſt when he vſed to ſit in iudgement to heare criminall cauſes, whilſt the accuſer went on with his complaint and accuſation: he alwayes vſed to lay his hand vpon one of his eares, to keepe that cleane from the matter of accuſation, thereby reſeruing it to heare the purgation and iuſtification of the perſon condemned. But afterwards, the number of accuſations that were brought before him, did ſo prouoke and alter him, that he did beleeue the falſe accuſations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothing put him more in rage, then when he vnderſtood they had ſpoken ill of him: and then he was ſo fierce, as no pardon would be graunted, for that he loued his honour more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went againſt Darius, thinking that he meant to fight againe: but vnderſtanding that Beſſus had taken him, then he gaue the Theſſalians leaue to depart home into their countrey, and gaue them two thouſand talents ouer and aboue their ordinarie pay. Alexander had then a maruellous long, hard, and painefull iourney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thouſand and three hundreth furlongs, inſomuch as the moſt part of his men were euen wearie, and done for lacke of water. It chaunced him one day to meete with certaine Macedonians that caried (vpon moyles) goate skinnes full of water, which they had fetched from a riuer. They ſeeing Alexander in manner dead for thirſt, being about noone, ranne quickly to him, and in a head-peece brought him water. Alexander asked them, to whom they caried this water. They anſwered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet would haue your Grace to liue: for though we loſe them, we may get more children. When they had ſaid ſo, Alexander tooke the helmet with water, and perceiuing that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thruſt out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had giuen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it: for, ſaid he, if I drinke alone, all theſe men here will faint. Then they ſeeing the noble courage and curteſie of Alexander, cried out that he ſhould leade them: and therewithall beganne to ſpurre their horſes, ſaying, that they were not wearie nor a thirſt, nor did thinke themſelues mortall, ſo long as they had ſuch a King. Euerie man was alike willing to follow Alexander, yet had he but threeſcore onely that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, paſſing ouer much gold and ſiluer, which was ſcattered abroade in the place, and going alſo by many chariots full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the ſpurre, vntill they had ouertaken the foremoſt that fled, thinking to haue found Darius amongſt them.

But at the length, with much ado, they found him layed along in a coach, hauing many wounds vpon his bodie, ſome of darts and ſome of ſpeares. So he being almoſt at the laſt caſt, called for ſome drinke, and dranke cold water, which Polyſtratus gaue him. To whom when he had drunk, he ſaid: this is my laſt miſhap my friend, that hauing receiued this pleaſure, I cannot requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the gods Alexander, for the liberalitie and curteſie which he hath ſhewed vnto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my ſake. At theſe laſt words, he tooke Polyſtratus by the hand, and ſo gaue vp the ghoſt. Alexander came immediatly after, and plainely ſhewed that he was ſorie for his death and misfortune: and vndoing his owne cloke, he caſt it vpon the body of Darius. After that, hauing by good hap gotten Beſſus into his hands, he tare him in peeces with two high ſtraight trees which he bowed downewards, and tied his legges to each of them: ſo that when the trees were let go, they gaue a ſodaine cruell ierke vp, and caried either tree a peece of his bodie with it. Then Alexander hauing giuen Darius corſe princely buriall, and embalmed him: he ſent it vnto his mother, and receiued his brother Exathres for one of his friends. From thence he went into the country of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his armie, where he ſaw the gulfe of the ſea Caſpium, which he thought of no leſſe greatneſſe, then the ſea of PONTVS, howbeit calmer then the other ſeas be. He could not then certainely find out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelyhood he thought it was ſome breaking out of the lake or marriſh of Meotin. Yet ſome ancient naturall Philoſophers ſeemed to know truly what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conqueſt, they wrote, that of the foure chiefeſt gulfes of the ſea, that commeth from the Ocean, and do enter within maine land, that which is more Northerly, is the ſea Caſpium, which they call alſo Hyrcanium. As Alexander went through the country, certaine barbarous people ſodainly ſet vpon them that led Bucephal his horſe, and tooke him: but with that he was in ſuch a rage, that he ſent a Herauld into their countrey to proclaime open warres vpon them, and that he would put man, woman, and child to the ſword, if they brought him not his horſe againe. Whereupon, when his horſe was returned home, and that they yeelded vp their cities and forts into his hands, he did vſe them all very curteouſly, and moreouer did giue them money for the ranſome of his horſe, which they reſtored. Departing thence, he entred into the countrey of PARTHIA. There hauing leyſure enough, he began to apparel himſelf after the faſhion of the barbarous people, becauſe he thought thereby the better to win the hearts of the countrimen, framing himſelf vnto their own faſhions: or elſe to trie the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, to ſee how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS (which he meant to bring them vnto) in reuerencing of him as they did their King, by litle and litle acquainting them to allow the alteration and change of his life. This notwithſtanding, he would not at the firſt take vp the apparell of the MEDES, which was very ſtrange, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without breeches, nor did weare a long gowne trayling on the ground, nor a high coptanct hat, but tooke a meane apparell, betwixt the MEDES and the PERSIANS, more modeſt then the one, and more coſtly then the other: and yet at the firſt he did not weare it, but when he would talke with the barbarous people, or elſe priuately amongſt his friends and familiars. Afterwards notwithſtanding, he ſhewed himſelf openly to the people in that apparell, when he gaue them audience. This ſight grieued the MACEDONIANS much: but they had his vertues in ſuch admiration, that they thought it meete in ſome things he ſhould take his owne pleaſure, ſithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his legge broken with an arrow, and another time, had ſuch a blow with a ſtone full in his necke, that it made him ſpurre-blind a great while after, and yet neuertheleſſe he neuer eſchewed any bodily danger: for he paſſed ouer the riuer of Orexartes, which he tooke to be Tanais, and hauing in battell ouerthrowne the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chaſe aboue an hundreth furlongs, notwithſtanding that at that inſtant he had a looſeneſſe of bodie. Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the AMAZONES, as many writers do teſtifie: among the which are theſe, Clitarchus, Polycritus, Oneſicritus, Antigenes and Hiſter. But Chares, Ptolomie, Anticlides, and Philon THEBAN, Philip the Hiſtoriographer, Hecateus ERETRIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all theſe do write that it was not true: and it ſeemeth alſo that Alexander ſelfe doth confirme it. For, writing all things particularly vnto Antipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the King of SCYTHIA offered him his daughter in mariage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON. It is alſo ſayd, that Oneſicritus long time after that did reade vnto King Lyſimachus, the fourth booke of his hiſtorie wher-

where he did speake of the AMAZON. Lysimachus smiling, sayd vnto him: Why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit it or not credit it, Alexanders estimation thereby is neither impaired nor aduanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MACEDONIANS, being weary with this long warre, would go no further: he left all the rest of his army behind, and tooke only twenty thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen of the choisest men of his army, and with them inuaded the countrey of HYRCANIA. There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of ASIA had but seene them as it were in a dreame, and if they should now returne backe into MACEDON, hauing but onely stirred them, and not altogether subdued ASIA: the people offended with them, would set vpon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women. Neuertheless, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, protesting therewith against them that would go, how they did forsake him, his friends, and those who had so good hearts towards him, as to follow him in so noble a iourney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the MACEDONIANS. This selfe matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Antipater: and there he writeth furthermore, that hauing made this oration vnto them, they all cried out, and bad him leade them into what part of the world he would. When they had granted their goodwils, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne the rest of the common sort, who followed the example of the chiefest. Thereupon he did frame himselfe the more to liue after the fashion of the countrey there, and enterchangeably also to bring the men of that countrey vnto the maner of the MACEDONIANS: being perswaded that by this mixture and enterchange of maners one with another, he should by friendship more then force, make them agree louingly together, when that he should be so farre from the countrey of PERSIA. For this purpose therefore, he chose thirty thousand of their children of that country, and set them to learne the Greeke toung, and to be brought vp in the discipline of wars, after the MACEDONIANS maner: and gaue them schoolemaisters and Captaines to traine them in each faculty. And for the marying of Roxane, he fancied her, seeing her at a feast where he was: which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduise and counsell loued her. For the barbarous people were very proud of this match, when as they saw him make alliance with them in this sort, insomuch as they loued him better then they did before, because they saw in those things he was alwayes so chast and continent, that notwithstanding he was maruellously in loue with her, yet he would not dishonorably touch this yong Lady, before he was maried vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander considering that of the two men which he loued best, Hephæstion liked well of his match, and went apparelled as himselfe did, and that Craterus contrarily did still vse the MACEDONIAN maner: he dealt in all affaires with the barbarous people, by Hephæstion, and with the GRECIANS and MACEDONIANS, by Craterus. To be short, he loued the one, and honored the other: saying that Hephæstion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereupon these two persons bare one another grudge in their harts, and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: insomuch as on a time being in INDIA, they drew their swords and fought together, and diuerse of their friends ranne to take part with either side. Thither came Alexander selfe also, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephæstion, and called him foole and bedlem, saying, dost thou not know, that whatsoeuer he be that should take Alexander from me, he should neuer liue? Priuatly also, he sharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them friends together, swearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men liuing, neuertheless if euer he found that they fell out together againe, they should both die for it, or him at the least that first began to quarrell. So euer after that, they say there was neuer foule word nor deed betweene them, not so much as in sport onely. There was also one Philotas, the sonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the MACEDONIANS, who next vnto Alexander was the most valiant man, the patientest to abide paine, the liberallest, and one that loued his men and friends better then any noble man in the campe whatsoeuer. Of him it is reported, that a friend of his came to him on a time to borow money: and he commaunded straight one of his men to let him haue it. His purse-bearer answered him, that he had none. Why, sayd his maister, doest thou tell me so? Hast thou not plate, and apparell to sell or gage to helpe him to some? Howbeit otherwise, he had such pride and glory to shew his riches, to apparell himselfe so sumptuously, and to be more fine and princked then became a priuate man, that this made him to be hated: because he tooke vpon him to be a great man, and to looke bigge on the matter, which became him so ill fauoredly, and therefore euerie man through his owne folly, fell in misliking with him. Insomuch as his owne father sayd one day vnto him: Son I pray thee be more humble and lowly. This Philotas had long before bene complained vpon vnto Alexander, because that when the cariage of king Darius army (which was in the city of DAMAS) was taken after the battell of CILICIA, among many prisoners that were taken & brought vnto Alexanders campe, there was one Antigona, a passing faire yong curtisan, borne in the city of PIDNA. Philotas found meanes to get her, and like a yong man that was in loue with her, making merry with her at the table, fondly let fall braue words and boasts of a souldier, saying that what notable things were done, they were done by himselfe and his father: and called Alexander at euery word, young man, and sayd that by their meanes he held his name and kingdome. This curtisan told one of her friends what he sayd, and that friend told another friend, and so went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the curtisan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom she told as much as she had sayd before. Alexander bad her still make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he sayd of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circumuented, did euer frequent her company, and would be bold commonly to speake many fooliſh and vndiscreet words against the king, sometime in anger, and sometime againe in a brauery. Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest proofe and cause to accuse Philotas, yet he dissembled it for that time, and would not be knowne of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or else for that he was affraid of their great power and authority. About that time there was one Limnus Chalæstrian a MACEDONIAN, that layd great and secret wait to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a yong man called Nicomachus, intised him to helpe him to do this deed. The young man wisely denied it, and told the same to his brother called Balinus. He went vnto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great importãce to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the king (but why no man could tell) telling them that the king had greater matters in hand, and was not at leisure. Then they went vnto another, and he brought them vnto Alexander, vnto whom first they opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him: & by the way they told also, how they had bin twise before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with them. That angred Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also when Limnus was slaine by him, whom he sent to apprehẽd him, resisting him for that he would not be taken: and thought that by his death he had lost a great meanes to come to the light of this treason and conspiracy. Then Alexander frowning vpon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they began to speake boldly, that it was time for the king to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalæstrian of himselfe durst haue entred into that treason, but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, set on by a greater personage then he: and therefore that it stood Alexander vpon to examine them straightly, which had cause to keepe this treason secret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto such words and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought a thousand accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of diuerse Lords and familiars of the king put to the torture, Alexander selfe being behind a hanging, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he heard how faintly and pitifully he besought Hephæstion to take pity vpon him, he sayd vnto himselfe: Alas, poore Philotas, thou that hast so faint a heart, how durst thou take vpon thee so great matters? In fine, Philotas was put to death, and immediatly after he was executed, Alexander sent also with speed vnto the Realme of MEDIA to kill Parmenio, who was his Lieutenant there, and one that had serued king Philip his father, in his greatest affaires, and he onely of all other the old seruants of his father had procured Alexander to take in hand the conquest of ASIA: and who also of three sons which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and afterwards was slaine himselfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his friends affraid of him, and specially Antipater: who secretly sent Ambassadours vnto the ÆTOLIANS, to make league with them, because they themselues also were affraid of Alexander, for that they had put the Oeniades to death. Alexander hearing that, sayd, that he himselfe, and not the sonnes of the Oeniades, would be reuenged on the ÆTOLIANS. Not long after that, followed the murther of Clitus, the which to heare it simply told, would seeme much more cruell than the death of Philotas. But reporting the cause and the time together in which it chaunced: it will be found that it was not of set purpose, but by chaunce and vnfortunately, that Alexander being ouercome with with wine, did vnluckily wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certaine men of the low countries from the sea side, that brought apples of GRECE vnto Alexander. Alexander wondering to see them so greene and faire, sent for Clitus to shew him them, and to giue him some of them. Clitus by chance did sacrifice at that time vnto the gods, and left his sacrifice to go vnto Alexander: howbeit, there were three weathers that followed him, on whom the accustomed sprincklings had bene done already to haue sacrificed them. Alexander vnderstanding that, told it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis LACONIAN, both did aunswer him, that it was an ill signe. Alexander thereupon gaue order straight, that they should do sacrifice for the health of Clitus, and specially for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he saw Clitus in a mourning gowne, sitting amongst the sonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clitus did not make an end of his sacrifice, but came straight to supper to the king, who had that day sacrificed vnto Castor and Pollux. At this feast there was old drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses sung and made by a Poet, called Pranichus (or as others say, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bene ouercome by the barbarous people, and onely to shame them, and to make the company laugh. With these verses, ancient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grew angry with the Poet that made them, and the minstrell that sung them. Alexander on the other side, and his familiars, liked them verie well, and commanded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being ouertaken with wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proud and arrogant, fell into greater choler, and sayd: that it was neither well nor honestly done in that sort to speake ill of those poore MACEDONIAN Captaines (and specially amongst the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they that laughed them to scorne, although their fortune were worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and sayd, that saying so, he pleaded for himselfe, calling cowardlinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing vp, sayd againe: But yet this my cowardlinesse saued thy life, that calleth thy selfe the sonne of the gods, when thou turnedst thy backe from Spithridates sword: and the bloud which these poore MACEDONIANS did shed for thee, and the wounds which they receiued on their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee so great, that thou disdainest now to haue king Philip for thy father, and wilt needs make thy selfe the sonne of Iupiter Hammon. Alexander being moued with these words, straight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these proud words of thine, which thou vsest continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS to rebell against me? Clitus answered againe, Too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and seruice to receiue such reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long since are dead and gone, not now to see the MACEDONIANS scourged with rods of the MEDES, & compelled to curry fauour with the PERSIANS, to haue accesse vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander againe answering and reuiling him: the graue st men sought to pacifie this stirre and tumult. Alexander then turning himselfe vnto Xenodochus CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: Do you not thinke (sayd he) that the GRECIANS are amongst the MACEDONIANS, as demy gods that walke among brute beasts? Clitus for all this would not giue ouer his impudency and malapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openly what he had to say, or else not to bid free men come to sup with him that were wont to speake franckly: if not, to keepe with the barbarous slaues that honored his PERSIAN girdle, and long white garment. Then could Alexander no longer hold his choler, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, & threw it at Clitus, and looked for his sword, the which Aristophanes, one of his gard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when euery man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented: he immediatly rose from the boord, and called his gard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN tongue (which was a signe of great trouble to follow after it) and commanded a trumpeter to sound the allarme. But he drawing backe, would not sound: whereupon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the trumpeter was greatly commended afterwards, for that he onely kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clitus, whereupon his friends with much ado thrust him out of the hall: but he came in againe at another doore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearsed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedy:

Alas for sorow, euill wayes
Are into Greece crept now a dayes.

The 777 yeare of Alexander sonne of Philip.

Alexanders dreame of Clitus.

The malapertnesse of Clitus against Alexander.

Alexander slue Clitus, and grieuously repented him.

Then Alexander taking a partisan from one of his gard, as Clitus was comming towards him, and had lift vp the hanging before the doore, he ranne him through the body, so that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, died presently. Alexanders choler had left him straight, and he became maruellous sorowfull: and when he saw his friends round about him say neuer a word, he pluckt the partisan out of his body, and would haue thrust it into his owne throte. Howbeit his gard about him caught him by the hands, and caried him perforce into his chamber: and there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, and the next day following, vntill such time as he was able to cry no more, but lying on the ground, only lay sighing. His friends hearing his voyce no more, were afraid, and came into his chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, sauing Aristander the Soothsayer, who remembred him of his dreame he had of Clitus before, which was a prognostication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his destiny before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander. Afterwards they brought in Callisthenes the Philosopher, a kinsman of Aristotles, and Anaxarchus borne in ABDERA. Of these two, Callisthenes sought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensiue to comfort Alexanders sorow. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by himselfe in the study of Philosophy, being accounted a braine-sicke man, and one that despised his companions: he comming into Alexanders chamber also with him, cried out at the doore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the great whom all the world lookes vpon, and is afraid of. See where he lyes, weeping like a slaue on the ground, that is afraid of the law, and of the reproch of men: as if he himselfe should not giue them law, and stablish the bounds of iustice or iniustice, sithence he hath ouercome to be Lord and maister, and not to be subiect and slaue to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the Poets say, that Iupiter hath Themis, to wit, right and iustice placed on either hand of him? what signifieth that, but all that the prince doth, is holy, right, and iust? These words of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorowfull heart of king Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders manners afterwards more fierce and dissolute. For, as he thereby did maruellously grow in fauour with the king, euen so did he make the company of Callisthenes (who of himselfe was not very pleasant, because of his grauity and sowrenesse) much more hateful and misliked then before. It is written also that there was certaine talke one night at king Alexanders boord touching the seasons of the yeare, and temperatnesse of the aire, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the country they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter also sharper then in GREECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stifly maintained it, in so much as Callisthenes sayd vnto him: and yet must thou graunt, that it is colder here then there. For there all the winter time thou couldest go with a single cloake on thy backe onely, and here thou must haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy boord. This galled Anaxarchus to the quicke, and made him more angry then before: and for the other Rhetoritians and flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him followed of young men for his eloquence, and beloued also of old men for his honest life, the which was very graue, modest, & contented with his owne, desiring no mans else. Whereby men found, that the reason he alledged for following of Alexander in this voyage, was true: for he sayd that he came to be an humble suter to the king to restore his banished citizens into their countrey againe, and to repleniish their city with inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be enuied, yet did he himselfe giue his enemies occasion to accuse him. For oftentimes being inuited by the king to supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and say nothing, shewing by his grauity and silence, that nothing pleased him that was either sayd or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe sayd on a time vnto him:

Callisthenes, & Anaxarchus, do comfort Alexander.

The cause vvhy Callisthenes vvas enuied.

I cannot thinke that person wise,
That in his owne case hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, diuerse requesting him to make an Oration on the sudden in commendation of the MACEDONIANS: he made such an eloquent Oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him, rose from the boord, and clapping their hands for ioy, cast nosegayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time sayd vnto him that, which the Poet Euripides sayd:

It is no maistery to be eloquent,
In handling of a plenteous argument.

Nay,

Nay, but vtter then thy eloquence in reprouing of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their faults, they may learne to amend. Then Calliſthenes changing copy, ſpake boldly many things againſt the MACEDONIANS: declaring, that the diſſention amongſt the GRECIANS did increaſe king Philips power, alledging theſe verſes:

Where diſcord reignes in realme or towne, Euen wicked folke do winne renowne.

But by this occaſion, he purchaſed himſelfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS: in ſo much, as Alexander ſelfe ſayd at that time, that he had not ſo much ſhewed his eloquence, as the malice he bare vnto the MACEDONIANS. Hermippus the hiſtoriographer writeth that one Strabus a clearke of Calliſthenes did afterwards tell it vnto Ariſtotle in this ſort: and that Calliſthenes ſeeing king Alexander offended with him, did recite theſe verſes of Homer three or foure times as he went:

Patroclus who farre paſſed thee,
Was ſlaine, as thou art like to bee.

And therefore very wiſely ſayd Ariſtotle, that Calliſthenes was eloquent, but not wiſe. For like a philoſopher, he ſtoutly ſtood againſt kneeling to the king, and ſayd that openly, which the nobleſt and ancienteſt men among the MACEDONIANS durſt but whiſper one in anothers eare, though they did all vtterly miſlike it: wherby he did yet deliuer GREECE from a great ſhame, and Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that maner of adoration of his perſon. This notwithſtanding, he vndid himſelfe becauſe he would ſeeme rather by preſumption to bring him to it, then by reaſon to perſwade him. Chares MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander hauing drunke at a certaine feaſt where he hapned to be, reached his cup vnto one of his friends, who after he had taken it of him, roſe vp firſt on his feete, and dranke alſo, turning him towards the gods, and firſt making ſolemne reuerence, he went and kiſſed Alexander, and then ſate him downe againe. All the reſt that were at the feaſt, did the like one after another, and Calliſthenes alſo, who tooke the cup when it came to his turne (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hepheſtion) after he had drunke, came to the king to kiſſe him, as others had done. Howbeit one Demetrius called Phidon, ſayd vnto the king: kiſſe him not, I pray your grace, for he of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head aſide, and would not kiſſe him. Then cried Calliſthenes out aloud: Well, quoth he, then I will go my way, with leſſe then others, by a kiſſe. And thus began Alexanders grudge firſt againſt Calliſthenes, by meanes whereof Hepheſtion was credited the better, when he ſayd that Calliſthenes had promiſed him to reuerence Alexander, although that he had broken promiſe. After him alſo Lyſimachus, Agnon, and diuerſe others began to play their parts againſt him, ſaying, that this Sophiſter went bragging vp and downe, as if he had deſtroyed a whole tyranny, and that all the yong men followed him to honour him, as if among ſo many thouſand ſouldiers, neuer a man of them had ſo noble a hart as he. And therefore, when the treaſon of Hermolaus againſt Alexanders perſon was diſcouered, they found the accuſation probable, the which ſome falſe detracters had informed againſt Calliſthenes: who had aunſwered Hermolaus that asked him, how he could come to be famous aboue all men, Thus: in killing the famouſeſt perſon. And to animate him to go forward with this treaſon, he had told him further, that he ſhould not be affraid of a golden bed, but remember he had to do with a man, which was ſometime ſicke and hurt as other men were. This notwithſtanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolaus confederates, that would once name Calliſthenes, what torments ſoeuer they abid, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexander ſelfe alſo writing of this treaſon immediatly after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alcetas, ſayd, that their ſeruants which had bene racked and put to the torture, did conſtantly affirme that they onely had conſpired his death, and no man elſe was priuie vnto it. But afterwards, he ſent another letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accuſed Calliſthenes, and ſayd, that his ſeruants had already bene ſtoned to death by the MACEDONIANS, howbeit that he himſelfe would afterwards alſo puniſh the maiſter, and thoſe that had ſent vnto him, and that had receiued the murtherers into their cities, who came of purpoſe to kill him. And therein he plainely ſhewed the ill will he bare vnto Ariſtotle, for that Calliſthenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinſman, and the ſonne of Hero, Ariſtotles neece. Some ſay, that Alexander truſſed Calliſthenes vp. Others againe report, that he died of ſickneſſe in priſon. Neuertheleſſe Chares writeth, that Calliſthenes was kept priſoner ſeuen moneths together, becauſe he ſhould haue had his iudgement

Ariſtotle thought Calliſthenes eloquent, but not wiſe.

Calliſthenes ſuſpected, treaſon againſt Alexander.

Alexander offended with Ariſtotle.

The death of Calliſthenes the rhetorician.

in open councell euen in the preſence of Ariſtotle himſelfe: howbeit, being very fat, he was eaten in the end by lyce, and ſo died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting againſt the MALLIANS OXYDRACIANS, in the conqueſt of INDIA, but theſe things chanced a good while after. Demaratus CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great deſire to go ſee Alexander: and when he had ſeene him, he ſayd that the GRECIANS which were dead long before, were depriued of that bliſſe and happineſſe, that they could not ſee Alexander ſit in the royall ſeate of king Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the kings good will vnto him, for he died of a ſickneſſe ſoone after he came vnto his campe, and Alexander did honour his funerals: for all the army in their armour did caſt vp a mount of earth faſhioned like a tombe, which was a great compaſſe about, and foure ſcore cubits high. His aſhes afterwards were brought with an honorable conuoy, vnto the ſea ſide, in a charret with foure horſes richly ſet out. Alexander being ready to take his iourney to go conquer INDIA, perceiuing that his army was very heauy and vnweildſome to remoue, for the wonderfull cariage and ſpoiles they had with them: the carts one morning being loden, he firſt burnt his owne cariage, & next his friends, and then commanded that they ſhould alſo ſet the cariage of the MACEDONIANS on fire, which counſell ſeemed more dangerous to be reſolued of, then the proofe of the execution fell out difficult. For there were very few of them that were angry therwith, and the moſt part of them (as if they had bene ſecretly moued by ſome god) with loud cries of ioy, one of them gaue vnto another ſuch neceſſary things as they had need of, & afterwards of themſelues did burne and ſpoile all the reſt. This made Alexander much more rigorous thē he was before, who beſides that he was already become cruel inough, & without mercy or pardon, did ſharply puniſh euery man that offended. For hauing commanded Menander one of his friends, to keepe him a ſtrong hold: he put him to death, becauſe he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he himſelfe ſlue Orſodates (a Captaine of the barbarous people) with a dart, for that he rebelled againſt him. About that time, there was an eaw that had eaned a lambe, which had vpon her head, the forme and purple colour of the kings hat, after the PERSIAN maner called Tiara, hauing two ſtones hanging on each ſide of it. Alexander abhorred this monſtrous ſigne, inſomuch as he purged himſelfe by certaine BABYLONIAN prieſts, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpoſe, and ſayd vnto his friends: that this monſter did not ſo much moue him for reſpect of himſelfe, as it did for them, fearing that the gods after his death had predeſtined the force and power of his kingdome to fall into the hands of ſome baſe cowardly perſon. This notwithſtanding, another ſigne and token which chanced in the necke of that, did take away this feare and diſcouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kings cariage, as he digged in a certaine place by the riuer of Oxus, to ſet vp the kings tent and his lodging, he found a certaine fat and oily veine, which after they had drawne out the firſt, there came out alſo another clearer, which differed nothing, neither in ſmell, taſt, nor ſauour, from naturall oile, hauing the gloſſe and fatneſſe ſo like, as there could be diſcerned no difference betweene them: the which was ſo much more to be wondred at, becauſe that in all that country there were no oliues. They ſay alſo, that the water of the riuer ſelfe of Oxus is very ſoft, and maketh their skins fat, which waſh or bath themſelues therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander ſelfe wrote vnto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongſt the greateſt ſignes which the gods had ſent vnto him. The ſoothſayers did interprete this wonder, that it was a ſigne, that he ſhould haue a noble, but yet a painfull voyage: for the gods, ſayd they, haue giuen oyle vnto men to refreſh their wearineſſe. And truly ſo did he ſuſtaine many dangers in thoſe wrres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greateſt loſſe he had of his men, was for lacke of victuals, and by the infection of the aire. For he, ſtriuing to ouercome fortune by valiantneſſe, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impoſſible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withſtand a noble hart. It is reported, that when he went to beſiege a ſtrong hold which Siſimethres kept, being thought vnſaltable, and that his ſouldiers were in diſpaire of it: he asked one Oxyathres, what hart Siſimethres had. Oxyathres anſwered him, that he was the verieſt coward in the world. O, that is well, quoth Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou ſayeſt, ſithence the Captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it on a ſudden, by putting Siſimethres in a great feare. After that alſo, he did beſiege another peece of as great ſtrength and difficultie to aſſault as the other, and making the young ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to the aſſault, he called one of them vnto him, whoſe name alſo was Alexander, vnto whom he ſayd thus: Alexander, this day thou muſt fight like a man, and it be but for thy names ſake. The young young man did not forget his words, for he fought so valiantly, that he was slaine, for whom Alexander was very sorie. Another time when his men were afraid, and durst not come neare vnto the city of NISA to assault it, because there ran a very deepe riuer hard by the walles: he came to the riuers side, & said: Oh, what a coward am I, that neuer learned to swim? and so prepared himselfe to swim ouer vpon his shield. After he had caused them to retire from the assault, there came ambassadours vnto him from the cities besieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondred at him at the first, when they saw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonie about him: but much more, when a chaire was brought him to sit downe on, that he commaunded the oldest man amongst them called Acuphis, to take it to him, and sit him downe. Acuphis maruelling at Alexanders great curtesie, asked him: what they should do for him, thencefoorth to be his good friends. I will, said Alexander, that they from whom thou commest as Ambassadour vnto vs, do make thee their king: and withall that they do send me a hundred of their best men for hostages. Acuphis smiling, answered him againe: But I shall rule them better, ô king, if I send you the worst and not the best. There was a king called Taxiles a very wise man, who had a great countrie in INDIA, no lesse in bignesse and circuit then all ÆGYPT, and as full of good pasture and fruites as any country in the world could be: who came on a time to salute Alexander, and said vnto him: What should we need, Alexander, to fight, and make wars one with another, if thou comest not to take away our water, & our necessarie commoditie to liue by: for which things, men of iudgment must needs fight? As for other goods, if I be richer then thou, I am readie to giue thee of mine: & if I haue lesse, I will not thinke scorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me some of thine. Alexander being pleased to heare him speake thus wisely, imbraced him, and said vnto him: Thinkest thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all these goodly faire words? no, no, thou hast won nothing by that: for I will fight & contend with thee in honestie and courtesie, because thou shalt not exceede me in bountie and liberalitie. So Alexander taking diuers giftes of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles: he dranke to him one night at supper, and said: I drinke to thee a thousand talents in gold. This gift misliked Alexanders friends: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hearts of many of those barbarous Lords and Princes of that countrie. There was a certaine number of souldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikest men of all that countrie: who being mercenarie souldiers, were euer entertained in seruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in diuers places. Alexander hauing made peace with them in a citie where they were kept in: when they came abroad vpon suretie of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the sword. There was but this onely fault, to blemish the honour of his noble deeds in all his warres: for in all things else, he shewed mercie and equitie. Furthermore, the graue Philosophers and wise men of INDIA did greatly trouble him also. For they reproued the kings and princes of the INDIANS, for that they yeelded vnto Alexander, and procured the free cities to take armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke diuerse of their cities. For king Porus, Alexander selfe writeth in his Epistles, all his actes at large which he did against him. For he saith, that both their campes lying on either side of the riuer of Hydaspes, king Porus set his Elephants vpon the banke of the riuer with their heades towards their enemies, to keepe them from passing ouer: and that he himselfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his campe, to acquaint his men not to be afraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no Moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, and the choice of his horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle Iland. When he was come into the Iland, there fell a wonderfull shower of raine, great winds, lightnings and thunders vpon his campe, insomuch as he saw many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle Iland. This notwithstanding, he did not leaue to get ouer to the other side of the riuer. The riuer being swollen with the great floud of raine that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: so that Alexander when he had passed ouer the riuer, and was come to the other side, found himselfe in very ill case, for that he could hardly keepe his feete, because the earth was very slippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on euery side. It is written of him, that then he said vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take such paines, and put my selfe into so many dangers, onely to be praised of you? Thus Onesicritus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of timber pinned together, whereupon they had passed ouer the streame of the maine riuer: and that they waded through the other arme or gut of the water which had broken the earth, vp to their breasts with their harnesse on their backes. Furthermore, when he had passed ouer both waters, he rode with his horsemen twenty furlongs before the battell of his footemen: thinking that if his enemies came to giue him charge with their men of armes, that he was the stronger: and if they would also aduaunce their footmen forward, that his footmen also should come time enough. One of the twaine fell out as he had guessed: for a thousand horsemen and threescore charrets armed with his enemies, gaue him charge before their great company, whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, and slue foure hundred of the men at armes in the field. King Porus then knowing by those signes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed ouer the riuer: he marched towards him with all his armie in battell ray, sauing a few which he left behind to resist the MACEDONIANS, if they shewed force to passe ouer the riuer. Alexander being afraid of the great multitude of his enemies, and of the terrour of the Elephants, did not giue charge vpon the middest of the battell, but being himselfe in the left wing, gaue charge vpon the corner of the enemies left wing, and also commaunded them that were in the right wing to do the like. So both the ends of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ran vnto the Elephants, and gathered themselues together about them. Thus the battell being begun, the conflict continued long, insomuch as the enemies were scantly all ouerthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Most writers agree, that Porus was foure cubites and a shaft-length high, and that being vpon an Elephants backe, he wanted nothing in height and bignesse to be proportionable for his mounture: albeit it were a very great Elephant, and besides that the Elephant did shew great wit and care to saue the king his maister. For whilest he perceiued his maister was strong enough, he lustily repulsed those which came to assaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, hauing many wounds vpon his body, and arrowes sticking in it: then being afraid lest his maister should fall downe from his backe, he softly fell on his knees, and gently taking his darts and arrowes with his trunke, which he had in his bodie, he pluckt them all from him one after another. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, how he should handle him. Princely, answered Porus. Alexander asked him againe, if he would say any thing else. I comprehend all, said he, in this word, Princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his prouinces and realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Lieutenant: but gaue him many other countries also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fifteene seuerall nations, fiue thousand of no small cities, besides an infinit number of villages, and thrice as many other countries: he made Philip one of his friends, his Lieutenant of all those countries. His horse Bucephall died at this battell, not in the field, but afterwards whilest he was in cure for the wounds he had on his bodie: but as Onesicritus saith, he died euen worne for very age. Alexander was as sorie for his death, as if he had lost any of his familiar friends: and for proofe thereof, he built a great citie in the place where his horse was buried, vpon the riuer of Hydaspes, the which he called after his name, BVCEPHALIA. It is reported also, that hauing lost a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vp of a whelpe, and loued very dearely: he built also a citie, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he heard it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This last battell against king Porus, killed the MACEDONIANS hearts, and made them that they had no desire to go any further to conquer INDIA. For finding that they had such ado to ouercome them, though they were but twenty thousand footemen, and two thousand horse, they spake ill of Alexander when he went about to compell them to passe ouer the riuer of Ganges, vnderstanding by the countrimen that it was two and thirtie furlongs ouer, and a hundred fadom deepe: and how that the banke of the riuer was full of souldiers, horsemen and Elephants. For it was reported, that the kings of the GANGARIDES, and the PRÆSIANS were on the other side with foure score thousand horsemen, two hundred thousand footmen, eight thousand charrets or carts of warre well armed, and sixe thousand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor friuolous tale: for a king called Androcottus (who raigned not long after) gaue vnto Seleucus, fiue hundred Elephants at one time, and conquered all INDIA with sixe hundred thousand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refusall, kept close in his tent for certaine daies, and lay vpon the ground, saying, that he did not thanke them for all that they had done thitherunto, vnlesse they passed ouer the riuer of Ganges also, and that to returne backe againe, it was as much as to confesse that he had bene ouercome. At the length, when he saw and considered that there was great reason in his friends perswasions which laboured to comfort him him, and that his ſouldiers came to the doore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beſeeching him to leade them backe againe: in the end he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to returne. This notwithſtanding, before he departed from thoſe partes, he put foorth many vaine and falſe deuices to make his name immortall among that people. He made armours of greater proportion then his owne, and mangers for horſes, higher then the common ſort: moreouer, he made bits alſo farre heauier then the common ſort, and made them to be throwne and ſcattered abroad in euery place. He built great altars alſo in honour of the gods, the which the kings of the PRÆSIANS haue in great veneration at this day, and paſſing ouer the riuer, do make ſacrifices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androcottus at that time was a very yong man, and ſaw Alexander himſelfe, and ſaid afterwards, that Alexander had wel-neare taken and won all the countrey, the king which then raigned, was ſo hated of all his ſubiects for his wicked life, and baſe parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to ſee the great ſea Oceanum, and made diuerſe boates with oares, in the which he eaſily went downe the riuers at his pleaſure. Howbeit, this his pleaſant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes and did aſſaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in aſſailing the citie of the MALLIANS, (which they ſay are the warlikeſt men of all the INDIANS) he was almoſt ſlaine there. For hauing with darts repulſed the enemies from the wall, he himſelfe was the firſt man that ſet foote on a ladder to get vp, the which brake aſſoone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper. Then the barbarous people comming together againſt the wall, did throw at him from beneath, and many times lighted vpon him. Alexander hauing few of his men about him, made no more ado, but leaped downe from the wall in the middeſt of his enemies, and by good happe lighted on his feete. His harneſſe making a great noiſe with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had ſeene ſome light or ſpirite go before them: ſo that at the firſt they all betooke them to their legges, and rannne ſcatteringly here and there. But after that, when they came againe to themſelues, and ſaw that he had but two Gentlemen onely about him, they came and ſet vpon him of all handes, and fought with him at the ſword or puſh of the pike, and ſo hurt him very ſore through his armour: but one among the reſt, being ſomewhat farther off, gaue him ſuch a terrible blow with an arrow, that he ſtrake him through his cuiraces, and ſhot him in at the ſide vnder his breaſt. The blow entred ſo into his bodie, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had ſtriken him with his arrow, ranne ſodainly to him with a cimiter drawne in his hand: howbeit as Peuceſtas and Limnæus ſtepped before him, and were both hurt, Limnæus was ſlaine preſently, and Peuceſtas fought it out, till at the length Alexander ſelfe ſlue the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many grieuous wounds vpon his bodie. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke, that ſo aſtonied him, that he leaned againſt the wall looking vpon his enemies. In the meane time the MACEDONIANS compaſſing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a ſwound, and was paſt knowledge: whereupon there ranne a rumour ſtraight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much a do to cut the arrow aſunder that was of wood: ſo his cuiraces being plucked off with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrowe head out of his bodie, which ſtucke in one of his bones: the which (as it is reported) was foure fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he ſwounded ſo oft, that he was almoſt dead. This notwithſtanding, he ouercame the danger, and eſcaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer himſelfe, and neuer came out of his tent: vntill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, and made great noiſe about his tent, deſirous to ſee him. Then he put on a night-gowne, and came out amongſt them all: and after he had done ſacrifice vnto the gods for recouery of his health, he went on his iourney againe, and in the ſame did conquer many great countries, and tooke diuerſe goodly cities. He did alſo take ten of the wiſe men of the countrey, which men do all go naked, and therefore are called GYMNOSOPHISTÆ, (to wit, Philoſophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell againſt him, and had done great hurt vnto the MACEDONIANS. And becauſe they were taken to be the ſharpeſt and readieſt of anſwer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard queſtions, and told them he would put the firſt man to death, that anſwered him worſt, and ſo the reſt in order: and made the eldeſt among them Iudge of their anſwers. The queſtion he asked the firſt man, was this:

1 Whether the dead or the liuing were the greater number? He anſwered, The liuing: for the dead, ſaid he, are no more men.

2 The secõd man he asked: Whether the earth or the sea brought forth most creatures? He answered, The earth. For the sea, said he, is but a part of the earth.

3 To the third man: Which of all beasts was the subtilest? That (said he) which man hitherto neuer knew.

4 To the fourth: Why he did make Sabbas rebel? Because, said he, he should liue honourably, or die vilely.

5 To the fift, Which he thought was first, the day, or the night? He answered, the day, by a day. The king finding his answer straunge, added too this speech: Strange questions must needs haue straunge answers.

6 Comming to the sixt man, he asked him: How a man should come to be beloued? If he be a good man, said he, not terrible.

7 To the seuenth, How a man should be a god? In doing a thing, said he, impossible for a man.

8 To the eight: Which was the stronger, life, or death? Life, said he, that suffereth so many troubles.

9 And vnto the ninth and last man: how long a man should liue? Vntill, said he, he thinke it better to die then to liue.

When Alexander had heard these answers, he turned vnto the Iudge, and bade him giue his iudgement vpon them. The Iudge said, they had all answered one worse then another. Then shalt thou die first, said Alexander, because thou hast giuen such sentence: Not so, ô king, quoth he, if thou wilt not be a lyer: because thou saidest, that thou wouldest kill him first, that had answered worst. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewards. He sent Onesicritus also vnto the other wise men of the INDIANS, which were of greatest fame among them, and that led a solitarie and quiet life, to pray them to come vnto him. This Onesicritus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cinikes scholer. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wise men, very sharply and proudly bade him put off his clothes to heare his words naked: or otherwise that he would not speake to him, though he came from Iupiter himselfe. Yet Dandamis answered him more gently. For he hauing learned what manner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, said: that they seemed to haue bene wise men, and well borne, notwithstanding that they had reuerenced the law too much in their life time. Others write notwithstanding, that Dandamis said nothing else, but asked why Alexander had taken so painefull a iourney in hand, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus, (whose right name otherwise was Sphines) king Taxiles perswaded him to go vnto Alexander: who because he saluted those he met in the INDIAN toung, saying, Cale, as much to say, as God saue ye: the GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did shew Alexander a figure and similitude of his kingdome, which was this. He threw downe before him a dry seare peece of leather, and then put his foot vpon one of the ends of it. The leather being troden downe on that side, rose vp in all parts else, and going vp and downe withall, still treading vpon the sides of the leather: he made Alexander see, that the leather being troden downe on the one side, did rise vp of all sides else, vntill such time as he put his foot in the midst of the leather, and then all the whole leather was plaine alike. His meaning thereby, was to let Alexander vnderstand, that the most part of his time he should keepe in the middest of his countrie, and not to go farre from it. Alexander continued seuen moneths trauelling vpon the riuers, to go see the great sea Oceanum. Then he tooke ship and sailed into a litle Iland called SCYLVSTIS, howbeit others call it PSITVLCIS. There he landed, made sacrifices vnto the gods, & viewed the greatnesse and nature of the sea Oceanum, and all the situation of the coast vpon that sea, as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers vnto the gods, that no conquerour liuing after him should go beyond the bounds of his iourney and conquest, and so returned homeward. He commaunded his ships should fetch a compasse about, and leaue INDIA on the right hand: and made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleet, and Onesicritus chiefe Pilote. He himselfe in the meane time went by land through the countrie of the ORITES, and there he found great scarcitie of victuals, and lost many of his men: so that he caried not out of INDIA the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in all, sixe score thousand footmen, and fifteene thousand horsemen. Some of them died of grieuous diseases: others, by ill diet: others, by extreame heate and drought, and the most of them by hunger, trauelling through this barren country, where the poore men liued hardly, and had only a few sheepe which they fed with sea fish, that made their flesh sauour very ill fauouredly. At the length, when in threescore dayes iourney he had painefully fully trauelled through this country, he then entred into the countrie called GEDROSIA, where he found great plentie of all kind of victuals, which the gouernors, kings and princes, neighbours vnto the same, did send vnto him. After he had refreshed his armie there a litle, he went through the country of CARMANIA, where he continued seuen daies together banquetting, going still through the country. For night and day he was feasting continually with his friends vpon a scaffold longer then broad, rising vp of height, and drawne with 8. goodly horse. After that scaffold followed diuers other charrets couered ouer, some with goodly rich arras, and purple silke, others with trim fresh boughs which they renewed at euery fields end: and in those were Alexanders other friends and Captaines with garlands of flowers vpon their heads, which dranke and made mery together. In all this army, there was neither helmet, pike, dart, nor target seene: but gold & siluer bowles, cups, and flagons in the soldiers hands, all the way as they went, drawing wine out of great pipes & vessels which they caried with thē, one drinking to another, som marching in the fields going forward, and others also set at the table. About them were the minstrels playing and piping on their flutes and shalmes, and women singing and dancing, and fooling by the way as they went. In all this dissolute marching through the country, and in the midst of their drunkennesse, they mingled with it sport: that euery man did striue to counterfeit all the insolencies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus himself had bene there in person, & had led the mummery. When he came vnto the kings castle of GEDROSIA, he staid there also certain daies to refresh his army with feasting & banquetting. It is said, that one day when he had drunk hard, he went to see the games for dancing, and amongst them, the games which a young man called Bagoas had set forth, (with whom Alexander fell in liking) and bare the bell. This Bagoas being in his dauncing garments, came through the Theater, and sate him down by Alexander. The MACEDONIANS were so glad of it, that they shouted & clapped their hands for ioy, crying out aloud to kisse him: so that in fine he tooke him in his armes and kissed him before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall vnto him: who made report what he had seene and done in his nauigation. Alexander was so glad of that, as he was desirous to saile by sea himselfe: and so entring into the sea Oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great fleete of ships, to compasse in all the coasts of ARABIA and AFRICKE, and thence into Mare Mediterraneū, by the streights of the pillars of Hercules. To this intent he built a great number of ships in the city of THAPSACVS, & sent for mariners, shipmasters and Pilots out of all parts. But now the difficulty of the iourny which he tooke vpon him for the conquest of INDIA, the danger he was in when he fought with the MALLIANS, and the number of his men which he lost besides which was very great, all these things considered together, making men beleeue that he should neuer returne with safetie: they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to rise against him, and gaue his Gouernors & Lieutenants of prouinces occasion to commit great insolencies, robberies and exactions of people. To be short, it put all his kingdome in broile & sedition. Insomuch as Olympias and Cleopatra rising against Antipater, they deuided his gouernment betweene thē: Olympias chusing for her the kingdome of EPIRVS: and Cleopatra the kingdome of MACEDON. Which when Alexander had heard, he said his mother was the wisest: for the realme of MACEDON would neuer haue suffered a woman to raigne ouer them. Therupon he sent Nearchus back againe to the sea, determining to fill all the sea coasts with war. As he trauelled through the countries far from the sea, he put his captains and gouernors to death, which had reuolted against him: and of those he slue Oxiathres, one of Abulites sons, by his owne hand, running him through with a pike. And when Abulites selfe also had brought Alexander 3000. talents only, without any other prouision made for victuals for his army: he made him put the mony before his horse, which wold not once touch it. Then said he vnto him, I pray thee to what purpose serueth this prouision? & therwithall immediatly committed him to prison. As he came through the country of PERSIA, he first renewed the old custome there, which was: that as oftentimes as the kings did returne home from any far iourny, they gaue vnto euery woman a crowne a peece. It is said therfore that for this cause, some of their naturall kings many times did not returne again into their country: and that Ochus amongst others did not so much as once returne backe againe, willingly banishing himself out of his country, of niggardlinesse, because he would not be at this charge. After that, Cyrus tomb (king of PERSIA) being found & broken vp, he put him to death that did it, although he were a MACEDONIAN of the city of PELLA, (and none of the meanest) called Polymachus. When he had read the inscription written vpon it in the PERSIAN tong, he would needs haue it also written in the Greeke toung: and this it was: O man, what so thou art, and whence soeuer thou commest, for I know thou shalt come: I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Persia: I pray thee enuie me not for this litle earth that coureth my body. These words pierced Alexanders heart, when he considered the vncertaintie of worldly things. There also Calanus the INDIAN Philosopher, hauing had a fluxe a litle while, prayed that they would make him a stacke of wood, such as they vse to burne dead bodies on, and then rode thither on horsebacke: and after he had made his prayer vnto the gods, he cast those sprinklings vpon him, which were vsed to be sprinkled at the funerals of the dead. Then cutting off a locke of his haire before he went vp on the woodstacke, he bad all the MACEDONIANS that were there farewell, and shooke them by the hands, praying them that day to be merrie, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would see shortly after in the citie of BABYLON. When he had said these words, he laid him downe vpon the woodstacke, couered his face, and neuer stirred hand nor foot, nor quitched when the fire tooke him, but did sacrifice himselfe in this sort, as the maner of his countrie was, that the wise men should so sacrifice themselues. Another INDIAN also, who followed Iulius Cæsar, did the like many yeares after in the citie of ATHENS: and there is his tombe yet to be seene, commonly called the INDIANS tombe. When Alexander came from seeing this sacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diuerse of his friends and Captaines to supper to him, and there did bring foorth a crowne for a reward vnto him that dranke best. He that dranke most of all other, was one Promachus, that dranke foure gallons of wine, and wan the crowne worth a talent: but he liued not aboue three daies after. And of other also that fell in sport to quaffing, who should drinke most, there died of them (as Chares writeth) one and fortie persons: of an extreame cold that tooke them in their drunkennesse and wine. When they were in the citie of SVSA, he maried certaine of his friends, and himself also maried Statira, one of king Darius daughters, disposing also of the other PERSIAN Ladies (according to their estate and birth) vnto his best friends. He made also a solemne feast of common mariages amongst the MACEDONIANS, of them that had bene maried before. At which feast, it is written, that nine thousand persons sitting at the boords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honour of the gods. And there also amongst other wonderfull gifts, he did pay all the debts the MACEDONIANS ought vnto their creditours, the which amounted vnto the summe of ten thousand talents, sauing a hundred and thirtie lesse. Whereupon Antigenes with one eye, falsly putting in his name amongst the number of the debters, and bringing in one that said he had lent him money, Alexander caused him to be payed: but afterwards when it was proued to his face, that there was no such matter, Alexander then was so offended with him, that he banished him his court, and depriued him of his Captaineship, notwithstanding that he had before shewed himselfe a valiant man in the warres. For when he was but a young man, he was shot into the eye, before the citie of PERINTHE, which king Philip did besiege, and at that present time they would haue pluckt the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would suffer them to pull it out, before he had first driuen his enemies within the walles of their citie. He tooke this infamie very inwardly, and he was so sorie for it, that euery man might see he was like to die for sorrow. Then Alexander fearing he should die, did pardon him, and bade him besides keepe the money which was giuen him. Now the 30000. young boyes which Alexander had left to the gouernment of Captaines, to traine and exercise them in the discipline of warre: they being growne strong men, and lustie youths, excellently well trained and readie in armes: Alexander reioyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discourage the MACEDONIANS, and made them greatly afraid, because they thought that from thencefoorth the king would make lesse account of them. For when Alexander would haue sent the sicke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low country to the sea side: they answered him, that so doing he should do them great wrong, to send these poore men from him in that sort, (after they had done him all the seruice they could) home to their country & friends, in worse case then he took thē from thence. And therefore they said, if he would send away some, let him send them all away as men vnseruiceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly young dauncers about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was maruellously offended with their proud words, insomuch that in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinarie guard, and tooke other PERSIANS in their place, making some the guard about his owne person, others, his vshers, heraulds, and ministers to execute his will and commaundement. The poore MACEDONIANS seeing Alexander thus waited on, and themselues so shamefully reiected: they let fall their stoutnesse, and after

after they had commoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare themselues for spite and malice. In fine, when they had laid their heads together, they consented to go vnto his tent and without weapons, naked in their shirts to yeeld themselues vnto him weeping and howling, beseeching him to do with them what pleased him, and to vse them like wretched vnthankefull creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somewhat pacified, did not receiue them the first time, neither did they also go their waies, but remained there two daies and nights together in this pitifull state, before the dore of his tent, lamenting vnto him, and calling him their soueraigne and king, vntill that he came himselfe out of his tent the third day, and seeing the poore wretches in this grieuous and pitifull state, he himselfe fell a weeping a long time. So, after he had a litle rebuked them, he called them curteously, and gaue the impotent and sicke persons leaue to depart home, rewarding them very honorably. Furthermore he wrote vnto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he shold alwaies giue them the highest place in all common sports and assemblies, and that they should be crowned with garlands of flowers. Moreouer, he commaunded that the orphans whose parents were slaine in the wars, should receiue the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the citie of Ecbatana, in the kingdome of Medea, and that he had dispatched his waightiest causes: he gaue himselfe againe vnto publike sports, feasts, & pastimes, for that there were newly come vnto him out of Greece, 3000. excellent maisters and deuisers of such sports. About that time it chaunced, that Hephæstion fell sicke of an ague. But he being a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he should haue done, but hauing spied oportunitie that his Phisitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to see the sports and pastimes: he went to dinner, and eate a rosted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had caused to be set in water: wherupon his feauer took him so sorely, that he liued not long after. Alexander vnwisely tooke the chaunce of his death, and commaunded all the haires of his horse and mules to be presently shorne, in token of mourning, and that all the battlements of the walles of cities also should be ouerthrown, and hung vp poore Glaucus his Phisitian vpon a crosse, & commaunded that no minstrell should be heard play of any kind of instrument within his campe: vntill that there was brought him an oracle from Iupiter Hammon, commaunding that Hephæstion should be worshipped and sacrificed vnto, as a demy god. In the end, to passe ouer his mourning and sorrow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto a hunting of men, and there subdued the people of the Cossæians, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and slue man, woman, and child. And this was called the sacrifice of Hephæstions funerals. Alexander furthermore being desirous to bestow tenne thousand talents cost vpon his obsequies and funerals, and also to exceede the charge by the rareneſse and excellencie of workemanship: amongest all other excellent workemaisters, he desired one Stasicrates, for he had euer passing inuention, and his worke was alwaies stately and sumptuous in any new things he tooke in hand. For he talking one day with Alexander, told him, that of all the mountaines he knew in the world, he thought there was none more excellent to resemble the statue or image of a man, then was mount Atho in Thracia: and that if it were his pleasure, he would make him the noblest and most durable image, that should be in the world, which in his left hand should hold a citie to containe ten thousand persons, and out of his right hand, there should run a great riuer into the sea. Yet Alexander would not hearken to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more straunge inuentions, and farre greater cost. Now as he was ready to take his iourney to go vnto Babylon: Nearchus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great sea Oceanum, by the riuer of Euphrates, and told him, how certaine Chaldean Soothsayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he should not go into Babylon. Howbeit Alexander made no reckening of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the wals of Babylon, he saw a great number of crowes fighting and killing one of another, and some of them fell downe dead hard by him. Afterwards being told him that Apollodorus the gouernor of the city of Babylon, hauing sacrificed vnto the gods, to know what should happen to him, he sent for the soothsayer Pythagoras, to know of him if it were true. The soothsayer denyed it not. Then Alexander asked him, what signes he had in the sacrifice. He answered, that the liuer of the beast had no head. O gods, said Alexander then, this is an ill signe: notwithstanding he did Pythagoras no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not beleeue Nearchus words. For this respect therefore Alexander lay much abroad in the country frō Babylon, and did take his pleasure rowing vp and down the riuer of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill signes and tokens one vpon another, that made him affraid. For there was a tame asse that killed one of the greateſt and goodlieſt Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his feet. An other time when Alexander had put off his clothes, to be nointed to play at tennis: when he ſhould put on his apparell againe, the yong gentlemen that played with him, found a man ſet in his chaire of eſtate, hauing the kings diademe on his head, and his gowne on his back, and ſaid neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was? It was long before he made them anſwer, but at the length comming to himſelfe, he ſaid his name was Dionyſius, borne in MESSINA: and being accuſed for certain crimes committed, he was ſent from the ſea thither, where he had bene a long time priſoner, and alſo that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, and vndone his irons, & that he commanded him to take the kings gowne, and his diademe, and to ſit him downe in his chaire of eſtate, and ſay neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counſell of his Soothſayers: but then his mind was troubled, and feared that the gods had forſaken him, and alſo grew to ſuſpect his friends. But firſt of all, Alexander feared Antipater and his ſons, aboue all other. For one of them called Iolas, was his firſt cup-bearer: and his brother called Caſſander, was newly come out of GREECE vnto him. The firſt time that Caſſander ſaw ſome of the barbarous people reuerencing Alexander, he hauing bene brought vp with the libertie of GREECE, and had neuer ſeene the like before: fell into a loude laughing very vnreuerently. Therwith king Alexander was ſo offended, that he tooke him by the haire of his head with both his hands, and knocked his head & the wall together. Another time alſo when Caſſander did anſwer ſome that accuſed his father Antipater: king Alexander tooke him vp ſharpely, and ſaid vnto him: What ſayeſt thou, ſaid he? Doeſt thou thinke that theſe men would haue gone ſo long a iourney as this, falſly to accuſe thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Caſſander againe replyed vnto Alexander and ſaid, that that was a manifeſt proofe of their falſe accuſation, for that they did now accuſe him being ſo farre off, becauſe they thought they could not ſodainly be diſproued. Alexander thereat fell a laughing a good, and ſaid, lo, theſe are Ariſtotles quiddities to argue pro & contra: but this will not ſaue you from puniſhment, if I find that you haue done theſe men wrong. In fine, they report that Caſſander tooke ſuch an inward feare and conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of MACEDON, and had all GREECE at his commandement: going vp and downe the city of DELPHES, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander, which put him into ſuch a ſodaine feare, that the haires of his head ſtood vpright, and his body quaked in ſuch ſort, that it was a great time before he could come to himſelfe againe. Now after that Alexander had left his truſt and confidence in the gods, his mind was ſo troubled and affraid, that no ſtraunge thing happened vnto him, (how litle ſoeuer it was) but he tooke it ſtraight for a ſigne and prediction from the gods: ſo that his tent was alwaies full of Prieſts and Soothſayers that did nothing but ſacrifice and purifie, and tend vnto diuinements. So horrible a thing is the miſtruſt and contempt of the gods, when it is begotten in the hearts of men, and ſuperſtition alſo ſo dreadfull, that it filleth the guiltie conſciences and fearefull hearts like water diſtilling from aboue: as at that time it filled Alexander with all follie, after that feare had once poſſeſſed him. This notwithſtanding, after that he had receiued ſome aunſwers touching Hephæſtion from the Oracle of Iupiter Hammon, he left his ſorrow, and returned againe to his banquets and feaſting. For he did ſumptuouſly feaſt Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bath according to his manner, being readie to go to bed, Medius one of his Captaines beſought him to come to a banquet to him to his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, ſo that he got an ague by it. But that came not (as ſome write) by drinking vp Hercules cup all at a draught: neither for the ſodaine paine he felt betweene his ſhoulders, as if he had bene thruſt into the backe with a ſpeare: for all theſe were thought to be written by ſome for lies and fables, becauſe they would haue made the end of this great tragedy lamentable and pitiful. But Ariſtobulus writeth, that he had ſuch an extreame feuer and thirſt withall, that he dranke wine, and after that fell a rauing, and at the length died the thirtieth day of the moneth of Iune. In his houſhold booke of things paſſed daily, it is written, that his feuer being vpon him, he ſlept at his hote houſe on the eighteenth day of Iune. The next morning after he was come out of his hote houſe, he went into his chamber, and paſſed away all that day with Medius, playing at dice: and at night very late, after he had bathed himſelfe and ſacrificed vnto the gods, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that night. And the twentieth day alſo, bathing himſelfe againe, and making his ordinarie ſacrifice to the gods, he did ſit downe to eate within his ſtoue, hearkening vnto Nearchus that told him ſtraunge things he had ſeene in the

the great sea Oceanum. The one and twentieth day also hauing done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, and felt himselfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feauer: and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be set vp by the fish ponds, where he commoned with his captaines touching certaine roomes that were void in his army, and commanded them not to place any men that were not of good experience. The three and twentieth day hauing an extreame feauer vpon him, he was caried vnto the sacrifices, and commaunded that his chiefest Captaines onely should remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner sort, as Centeniers or Lieutenants of bands, that they should watch and ward without. The foure and twentieth day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on the other side of the lake, where he slept a litle, but the feuer neuer left him: and when his Captaines and Noblemen came to do him humble reuerence, and to see him, he lay speechlesse. So did he the fiue and twentieth day also: insomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came and knocked at the pallace gate, and cried out vnto his friends and familiars, and threatned them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereupon the gates were opened, and they comming in their gownes went vnto his bed side to see him. That selfe day Python and Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to know if they should bring king Alexander thither. The god answered them, that they should not remoue him from thence. The eight and twentieth day at night Alexander died. Thus it is written word for word in maner, in the houshold booke of remembrance. At that present time, there was no suspisition that he was poisoned. Yet they say, that sixe yeares after, there appeared some proofe that he was poisoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was said he gaue him poison in his drinke. They that thinke it was Aristotle that counselled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poison was brought: they say, that Agnothemis reported it, hauing heard it of king Antigonus owne mouth. The poison (as some say) was cold as ice, and falleth from a rocke in the territorie of the city of NONACRIS, and it is gathered as they would gather a dew into the horne of the foot of an asse, for there is no other kind of thing that will keepe it, it is so extreame cold and piercing. Others maintaine, and say, that the report of his poysoning is vntrue: and for proofe thereof they alleadge this reason, which is of no small importance, that is: That the chiefest Captaines fell at great variance after his death, so that the corps of Alexander remained many daies naked without buriall, in a hote drie countrie, and yet there neuer appeared any signe or token vpon his body, that he was poisoned, but was still a cleane and faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with child, for the which the MACEDONIANS did her great honour: but she did malice Statira extreamely, and did finely deceiue her by a counterfeit letter she sent, as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come vnto him. But when she was come, Roxane killed her and her sister, and then threw their bodies into a wel, and filled it vp with earth, by Perdiccas helpe and consent. Perdiccas came to be king, immediatly after Alexanders death, by means of Aridæus, whom he kept about him for his guard and safetie. This Aridæus, being borne of a strumpet and common woman, called Philinna, was halfe lunatike, not by nature nor by chance: but as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young towardly boy, by drinkes which Olympias caused to be giuen him, and thereby continued franticke.

THE LIFE OF Julius Cæsar.

Cæsar ioyned with Cinna & Marius.

AT what time Sylla, was made Lord of all, he would haue had Cæsar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but whē he ſaw he could neither with any promiſe nor threat bring him to it, he tooke her ioynter away from him. The cauſe of Cæſars ill will vnto Sylla, was by meanes of mariage: for Marius the elder, maried his fathers owne ſiſter, by whome he had Marius the younger, whereby Cæſar and he were couſin germaines. Sylla being troubled in waightie matters, putting to death ſo many of his enemies, when he came to be conquerour, he made no reckening of Cæſar: and he was not contented to be hidden in ſafetie, but came and made ſute vnto the people for the Prieſthoodſhip that was voide, when he had ſcant any haire on his face. Howbeit he was repulſed by Syllaes meanes, that ſecretly was againſt him. Who, when he was determined to haue killed him, ſome of his friends told him, that it was to no purpoſe to put ſo young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not conſider that there were many Marians in that yong boy. Cæſar vnderſtāding that, ſtale out of Rome, and hid himſelfe a long time in the country of the Sabines, wandring ſtill from place to place. But one day being caried frō houſe to houſe, he fell into the hands of Syllaes ſouldiers, who ſearched all thoſe places, & tooke them whom they found hidden. Cæſar bribed the Captaine, whoſe name was Cornelius, with two talents which he gaue him. After he had eſcaped thē thus, he went vnto the ſea ſide & took ſhip, and ſailed into Bithynia to go vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bin with him a while, he tooke ſea againe, & was taken by pyrats about the Ile of Pharmacvsa: for thoſe pyrates kept all vpon that ſea coaſt, with a great fleet of ſhips and boates. They asking him at the firſt 20. talents for his ranſome, Cæſar laughed them to ſcorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of himſelfe promiſed them 50. talents. Thē he ſent his men vp & down to get him this mony, ſo that he was left in maner alone among theſe theeues of the Cilicians, (which are the cruelleſt butchers in the world) with one of his friends, and two of his ſlaues only: and yet he made ſo litle reckening of thē, that when he was deſirous to ſleepe, he ſent vnto them to command them to make no noiſe. Thus was he 38. daies among them, not kept as priſoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exerciſe himſelfe in any ſport or paſtime they would go to. And other while alſo he would write verſes, and make orations, and call them together to ſay them before them: and if any of them ſeemed as though they had not vnderſtood him, or paſſed not for them, he called them them blockheads and brute beasts,and laughing, threatened them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merry with the matter as could be,and tooke all in good part, thinking that this his bold speech,came through the simplicity of his youth. So when his ransome was come from the city of MILETVM,they being paid their mony,and he againe set at liberty: he then presently armed and manned certaine shippes out of the hauen of MILETVM,to follow those theeues whom he found yet riding at anker in the same Iland.So he tooke the most of them,and had the spoile of their goods,but for their bodies,he brought them into the city of PERGAMVS, & there committed them to prison,whilst he himselfe went to speake with Iunius, who had the gouernment of ASIA,as vnto whom the execution of these pirats did belong, for that he was Prætor of that countrey. But this Prætor hauing a great fancy to be fingering of the money,because there was good store of it: answered,that he would consider of these prisoners at better leysure. Cæsar leauing Iunius there,returned againe vnto PERGAMVS, and there hung vp all these theeues openly vpon a crosse,as he had oftentimes promised them in the Ile he would do,when they thought he did but ieast. Afterwards when Syllaes power began to decay, Cæsars friends wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home againe. But he sailed first vnto RHODES, to study there a time vnder Apollonius the son of Molon, whose scholer also Cicero was, for he was a very honest man, and an excellent good Rhetoritian. It is reported that Cæsar had an excellent naturall gift to speake wel before the people,and besides that rare gift,he was excellently well studied,so that doubtlesse he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time,& gaue place to the first,because he wold be the first and chiefest man of war and authority,being not yet come to the degree of perfection to speake wel,which his nature could haue performed in him,because he was giuen rather to follow wars and to mannage great matters,which in the end brought him to be Lord of all ROME. And therefore in a booke he wrote against that which Cicero made in the praise of Cato,he prayeth the readers not to compare the style of a souldier, with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. When he was returned againe vnto ROME, he accused Dolabella for his ill behauiour in the gouernment of his Prouince, and he had diuerse cities of GREECE that gaue in euidence against him. Notwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Cæsar to requite the goodwill of the GRECIANS, which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, tooke their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prætor of MACEDON: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driuen to appeale before the Tribunes at ROME, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he could haue no iustice in GREECE against the GRECIANS. Now Cæsar immediatly wanne many mens good wils at ROME,through his eloquence, in pleading of their causes: and the people loued him maruellously also, because of the courteous manner he had to speake to euery man, and to vse them gently, being more ceremonious therein then was looked for in one of his yeares. Furthermore, he euer kept a good boord, and fared well at his table, and was very liberall besides: the which indeede did aduaunce him forward, and brought him in estimation with the people. His enemies iudging that this fauour of the common people would soone quaile, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence: suffered him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growne to be of great strength and power. But in fine, when they had thus giuen him the bridle to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though indeede in sight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and commonwealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not so litle a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will soone make it strong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnesse. Thereupon, Cicero like a wise shipmaister that feareth the calmenesse of the sea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the commonwealth, found out his craft and malice,which he cunningly cloked vnder the habite of outward curtesie and familiaritie. And yet, said he, when I consider how finely he combeth his faire bush of haire, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scratch his head with one finger only: my mind giues me then, that such a kind of man should not haue so wicked a thought in his head,as to ouerthrow the state of the commonwealth.But this was long time after that. The first shew and proofe of the loue and goodwill which the people did beare vnto Cæsar,was: whē he sued to be Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand footmen) standing against Caius Pompilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him.But the second and more manifest proofe then the first,was at the death of his aunt Iulia, the wife of Marius the elder.

Cæſar made the funerall oration, at the death of his aunt Iulia.

For being her nephew, he made a ſolemne oration in the market place in cõmendation of her, & at her burial did boldly venture to ſhew forth the images of Marius: the which was the firſt time that they were ſeene after Syllaes victorie, becauſe that Marius and all his confederates had bene proclaimed traitors and enemies to the commonwealth. For when there were ſome that cried out vpon Cæſar for doing of it: the people on the other ſide kept a ſtirre, and reioyced at it, clapping of their handes and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honour againe into Rome, which had ſo long time bene obſcured and buried. And where it had bene an auncient cuſtome of long time that the Romaines vſed to make funerall orations in praiſe of old Ladies and matrons when they died, but not of young women: Cæſar was the firſt that praiſed his own wife with funerall oration when ſhe was dead, the which alſo did increaſe the peoples goodwilles the more, ſeeing him of ſo kind and gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treaſurer vnder Antiſtius Vetus Prætor, whome he honoured euer after: ſo that when himſelfe came to be Prætor, he made his ſonne to be choſen Treaſurer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that office, he maried his third wife Pompeia, hauing a daughter by his firſt wife, Cornelia, which was maried vnto Pompey the Great. Now for that he was very liberall in expences, buying (as ſome thought) but a vaine and ſhort glorie of the fauour of the people: (where indeede he bought good cheape the greateſt things that could be.) Some ſay, that before he bare any office in the commonwealth, he was growne in debt, to the ſumme of thirteene hundred talents. Furthermore, becauſe he was made ouerſeer of the worke, for the high way called Appius way, he diſburſed a great ſumme of his owne money towards the charges of the ſame. And on the other ſide, when he was made Ædilis, for that he did ſhew the people the paſtime of three hundred and twentie couple of ſword players, and did beſides exceede all other in ſumptuouſneſſe in the ſports and common feaſts which he made to delight them withall, (and did as it were drowne all the ſtately ſhewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he ſo pleaſed the people, and wan their loue therewith, that they deuiſed daily to giue him new offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factions in Rome, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very ſtrong and of great power, and the other of Marius, which then was vndeer foote and durſt not ſhew it ſelfe. But Cæſar becauſe he would renew it againe, euen at that time when he being Ædilis, all the feaſts and common ſports were in their greateſt ruffe: he ſecretly cauſed images of Marius to be made, and of victories that caried triumphs, & thoſe he ſet vp one night within the Capitoll. The next morning when euery man ſaw the gliſtering of theſe golden images excellently well wrought, ſhewing by the inſcriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had won vpon the Cimbres: euery one maruelled much at the boldneſſe of him that durſt ſet them vp there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon it ran ſtraight through all the citie, & euery man came thither to ſee them. Then ſome cried out vpon Cæſar, and ſaid it was a tyranny which he meant to ſet vp, by renewing of ſuch honors as before had bene troden vnder foot and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a bait to gage the peoples good wils, which he had ſet out in the ſtately ſhewes of his cõmon playes, to ſee if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide ſuch parts to be plaid, & a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction on the other ſide, incouraging one another, ſhewed thẽſelues ſtraight a great number gathered together, & made the mount of the Capitoll ring againe with their cries and clapping of hands: inſomuch as the teares ran down many of their cheeks for very ioy, when they ſaw the images of Marius, & they extolled Cæſar to the skies, iudging him the worthieſt man of all the kinred of Marius. The Senat being aſſembled therupon, Catulus Luctatius one of the greateſt authority at that time in Rome, roſe, & vehemẽtly inueighed againſt Cæſar, & ſpake that then which euer ſince hath bin noted much: that Cæſar did not now couertly go to worke, but by plaine force ſought to alter the ſtate of the cõmonwealth. Neuertheles, Cæſar at that time anſwered him ſo, that the Senate was ſatisfied. Thereupon they that had him in eſtimation did grow in better hope then before, and perſwaded him, that hardily he ſhould giue place to no man, and that through the goodwill of the people, he ſhould be better then all they, and come to be the chiefeſt man of the city. At that time, the chiefe Biſhop Metellus died, and two of the notableſt men of the citie, and of greateſt authoritie (Iſauricus and Catulus) contended for his roome: Cæſar notwithſtanding their contention, would giue neither of them both place, but preſented himſelfe to the people, and made ſute for it as they did. The ſute being equall betwixt either of them, Catulus, becauſe he was a man man of greater calling and dignity than the other, doubting the vncertainty of the election: sent vnto Cæsar a good summe of money, to make him leaue off his sute. But Cæsar sent him word againe, that he would lend a greater summe then that, to maintaine the sute against him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the doore of his house, Cæsar weeping, kissed her, and sayd: Mother, this day thou shalt see thy sonne chiefe Bishop of ROME, or banished from ROME. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the strife well debated: Cæsar wanne the victory, and made the Senate and Noble men all affraid of him, for that they thought that thencefoorth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Piso fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him for that he did not bewray Cæsar, when he knew that he was of conspiracy with Catiline, and had oportunity to haue done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth, but vtterly to destroy the Empire of ROME, he scaped out of the hands of iustice for lacke of sufficient proofe, before his full treason and determination was knowne. Notwithstanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the city, companions of his conspiracy: vnto whom, whether Cæsar did giue any secret helpe or comfort, it is not well knowne. Yet this is manifest, that when they were conuinced in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Consull, asking euery mans opinion in the Senate, what punishment they should haue, and euery one of them till it came to Cæsar, gaue sentence they should die: Cæsar then rising vp to speake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and sayd, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their custome did beare it, to put men of such Nobility to death (but in an extremity) without lawfull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in prison in some city of ITALIE, where Cicero thought best, vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowne: the Senate then might at their pleasure quietly take such order therein, as might appeare best vnto their wisedomes. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vttered with such a passing good grace and eloquence, that not onely they which were to speake after him did approue it: but such also as had spoken to the contrary before, reuoked their opinion and stucke to his, vntill it came to Cato and Catulus to speake. They both did sharply inueigh against him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cæsar suspected to be of the conspiracy, and stoutly spake against him, insomuch that the offenders were put into the hands of the officers to be put to death. Cæsar comming out of the Senate, a company of yong men which garded Cicero for the safety of his person, did set vpon him with their swords drawne. But some say, that Curio couered Cæsar with his gowne, and tooke him out of their hands. And Cicero selfe, when the yong men looked vpon him, beckened with his head that they shold not kill him, either fearing the fury of the people, or else that he thought it too shamefull and wicked a part. But if that were true, I maruell why Cicero did not put it into his booke he wrote of his Consulship. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for that he tooke not the oportunity offered him against Cæsar, onely for ouermuch feare of the people, that loued him very dearely. For shortly after, when Cæsar went into the Senate, to cleare himselfe of certaine presumptions and false accusations obiected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer than they were wont: the people came about the councell-house, and called out aloud for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the insurrection of the poore needy persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæsar, and did also moue the people to stirre: did perswade the Senate to make a franke distribution of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This distribution did put the commonwealth to a new charge of fiue hundred and fifty Myriades. This counsell quenched a present great feare, and did in happy time scatter and disperse abroad the best part of Cæsars force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer sought any alteration in the common-wealth, but contrarily he himself had a great misfortune fel on his house, which was this. There was a yong Noble man of the order of the PATRICIANS, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence, but otherwise as insolent and impudent a person, as any was else in ROME. He became in loue with Pompeia Cæsars wife, who misliked not withall: notwithstanding she was so straightly looked to, and Aurelia (Cæsars mother) an honest Gentlewoman had such an eye of her, that these two louers could not meete as they would, without great perill and difficulty. The ROMAINES do vse to honor a goddesse which they call the good goddesse, as the GRECIANS, haue her whom they call Gynæcia, to wit, the goddesse of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS do claime to be peculiar vnto them, saying: that she is king Midas mother. Howbeit the Romaines hold opinion, that it is a nimph of the woods maried vnto the god Faunus. The Grecians, they say also, that she was one of the mothers of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for proofe hereof, on her feast day, the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twigges, and leaues of vine branches, and also they make as the tale goeth, a holy dragon for this goddesse, and do set it by her: besides, it is not lawfull for any man to be present at their sacrifices, no not within the house it selfe where they are made. Furthermore, they say that the women in these sacrifices do many things amongst themselues, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast came, the husband (whether he were Prætor or Consull) and all his men and the boyes in the house, do come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the house at her pleasure, and there the sacrifices and ceremonies are done the most part of the night, and they do besides passe the night away in songs and musicke. Pompeia, Cæsars wife, being that yeare to celebrate this feast, Clodius who had yet no haire on his face, and thereby thought he should not be bewrayed: disguised himselfe in a singing wenches apparell, because his face was very like vnto a yong wench. He finding the gates open, being secretly brought in by her chamber-maid that was made priuy vnto it: she left him, and ranne to Pompeia her mistresse, to tell her that he was come. The chamber-maid taried long before she came againe, insomuch as Clodius being weary waiting for her where she left him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one place to another in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still shunning the light, and was by chance met withall by one of Aureliaes maides, who taking him for a woman, prayed her to play. Clodius refusing to play, the maid pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then aunswered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeiaes women. So Aureliaes maid knowing him by his voice, ranne straight where the lights and Ladies were, and cried out, that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women therewith were so amazed, that Aurelia caused them presently to leaue off the ceremonies of the sacrifice, and to hide their secret things, and hauing seene the gates fast locked, went immediatly vp and downe the house with torch-light to seeke out this man: who at the last was found out in the chamber of Pompeiaes maid, with whom he hid himselfe. Thus Clodius being found out, and knowne of the women, they thrust him out of the doores by the shoulders. The same night the women told their husbands of this chaunce as soone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumour through the city, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he deserued, not onely to be punished of them whom he had slandered, but also of the commonwealth and the gods. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did indite him, and accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefest of the Nobilitie and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burthened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne sister, which was maried vnto Lucullus. Notwithstanding the people stoutly defended Clodius against their accusations: and this did helpe him much against the Iudges, which were amazed, and afraid to stirre the people. This notwithstanding, Cæsar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius accuser to be a witnesse against him, he answered, he knew nothing of that they obiected against Clodius. This aunswer being cleane contrary to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Cæsar, why then he had put away his wife: Because I will not, sayd he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Cæsar spake truly as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to saue Clodius. So Clodius was discharged of this accusation, because the most part of the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the feare they stood one way of the daunger of the common people if they condemned him: and for the ill opinion on the other side of the Nobility, if they did quit him. The gouernement of the prouince of Spaine being fallen vnto Cæsar for that he was Prætor: his creditors came and cried out vpon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Cæsar being vnable to satisfie them, was compelled to go vnto Crassus, who was the richest man of all Rome, and that stood in need of Cæsars boldnesse and courage to withstand Pompeys greatnesse in the commonwealth. Crassus became his surety vnto his greediest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirty talents: whereupon they suffered Cæsar to depart to the gouernment of his prouince. In this iourney it is reported, that passing ouer the mountaines of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many housholds, and yet poore cottages. him, asked him merily, if there were any contending for offices in that towne, and whether there were any ſtrife there amongſt the noble men for honor. Cæſar ſpeaking in good earneſt, aunſwered: I cannot tell that ſayd he, but for my part, I had rather be the chiefeſt man here, then the ſecond perſon in ROME. Another time alſo when he was in SPAINE, reading the hiſtory of Alexanders acts, when he had read it, he was ſorowfull a good while after, and then burſt out in weeping. His friends ſeeing that, maruelled what ſhould be the cauſe of his ſorow. He anſwered them, Do ye not thinke ſayd he, that I haue good cauſe to be heauy, when king Alexander being no older then my ſelfe is now, had in old time wonne ſo many nations and countries: and that I hitherunto haue done nothing worthy of my ſelfe? Therefore when he was come into SPAINE, he was very carefull of his buſineſſe, and had in few dayes ioyned ten new enſignes more of footmen, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward againſt the CALLÆCIANS and LVSITANIANS, he conquered all, and went as farre as the great ſea Oceanum, ſubduing all the people which before knew not the ROMAINES for their Lords. There he tooke order for pacifying of the warre, and did as wiſely take order for the eſtabliſhing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them friends one with another, but ſpecially he pacified all ſutes of law, and ſtrife, betwixt the debtors and creditors, which grew by reaſon of vſury. For he ordained that the creditors ſhould take yearely two parts of the reuenew of their debtors, vntill ſuch time as they had payed themſelues: and that the debtors ſhould haue the third part themſelues to liue withall. He hauing won great eſtimation by this good order taken, returned from his gouernement very rich, and his ſouldiers alſo full of rich ſpoiles, who called him Imperator, to ſay ſoueraigne Captaine. Now the ROMAINES hauing a cuſtome, that ſuch as demanded honour of triumph, ſhould remaine a while without the city, and that they on the other ſide which ſued for the Conſulſhip, ſhould of neceſſity be there in perſon: Cæſar comming vnhappily at that very time when the Conſuls were choſen, he ſent to pray the Senate to do him that fauour, that being abſent he might by his friends ſue for the Conſulſhip. Cato at the firſt did vehemently inuey againſt it, vowching an expreſſe law to the contrary. But afterwards, perceiuing that notwithſtanding the reaſons he alleaged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Cæſar) fauored his requeſt: yet he cunningly ſought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, in dilating his oration vntill night. Cæſar thereupon determined rather to giue ouer the ſute of his triumph, and to make ſute for the Conſulſhip: and ſo came into the city, and had ſuch a deuice with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato onely. His deuiſe was this, Pompey and Craſſus, two of the greateſt perſonages of the city of ROME being at iarre together, Cæſar made them friends, and by that meanes got vnto himſelfe the power of them both: for, by colour of that gentle act & friendſhip of his, he ſubtilly (vnwares to them all) did greatly alter & change the ſtate of the comonwealth. For it was not the priuate diſcord betweene Pompey and Cæſar, as many men thought, that cauſed the ciuill warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioyned all their powers firſt to ouerthrow the ſtate of the Senate and Nobility, and afterwards they fell at iarre one with another. But Cato, that then foreſaw and prophecied many times what would follow, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwards they found him a wiſer man, then happy in his counſell. Thus Cæſar being brought vnto the aſſembly of the election, in the middeſt of theſe two noble perſons, whom he had before reconciled together: he was there choſen Conſull, with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gaine-ſaying, or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he began to put foorth lawes meeter for a ſeditious Tribune of the people, then for a Conſull: becauſe by them he preferred the deuiſion of lands, and diſtributing of corne to euery citizen gratis, to pleaſe them withall. But when the Noblemen of the Senate were againſt his deuice, he deſiring no better occaſion, began to cry out, and to proteſt, that by the ouerhardneſſe and auſterity of the Senate, they draue him againſt his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon hauing Craſſus on the one ſide of him, and Pompey on the other, he aſked them openly in the aſſembly, if they did giue their conſent vnto the lawes which he had put foorth. They both anſwered, they did. Then he prayed them to ſtand by him againſt thoſe that threatned him with force of ſword to let him. Craſſus gaue him his word, he would. Pompey alſo did the like, and added thereunto, that he would come with his ſword and target both, againſt them that would withſtand him with their ſwords. Theſe words offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeete for his grauity, and vndecent for the maieſty and honor he caried, and moſt of all vncomely for the preſence of the Senate whom he ſhould haue reuerenced: and were

ſpeeches fitter for a raſh light headed youth, then for his perſon. Howbeit the common people on the other ſide, they reioyced. Then Cæſar becauſe he would be more aſſured of Pompeys power and friendſhip, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made ſure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, & promiſed him in exchange Pompeys daughter, the which was ſure alſo vnto Fauſtus the ſonne of Sylla. And ſhortly after alſo, Cæſar ſelfe did mary Calphurnia, the daughter of Piſo, whom he cauſed to be made Conſull, to ſucceed him the next yeare following. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witneſſe, that it was a ſhamefull matter, and not to be ſuffered, that they ſhould in that ſort make hauocke of the Empire of Rome, by ſuch horrible bawdy matches, diſtributing among themſelues through thoſe wicked mariages, the gouernements of the prouinces, and of great armies. Calphurnius Bibulus, fellow Conſull with Cæſar, perceiuing that he did contend in vaine, making all the reſiſtance he could to withſtand this law, and that oftentimes he was in danger to be ſlaine with Cato, in the market place and aſſembly: he kept cloſe in his houſe all the reſt of his Conſulſhip. When Pompey had maried Iulia, he filled all the market place with ſouldiers, and by open force authoriſed the lawes which Cæſar made in the behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procured that Cæſar had Gavle on this ſide and beyond the Alpes, and all Illyria, with foure legions graunted him for fiue yeares. Then Cato ſtanding vp to ſpeake againſt it: Cæſar bad his officers lay hold on him, and cary him to priſon, thinking he would haue appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato ſayd neuer a word, when he went his way. Cæſar perceiuing then, that not onely the Senators and Nobility were offended, but that the common people alſo for the reuerence they bare vnto Catoes vertues, were aſhamed, and went away with ſilence: he himſelfe ſecretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this part, there were few Senators that would be Preſident of the Senate vnder him, but left the city, becauſe they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Conſidius, that on a time boldly told him, the reſt durſt not come to councell, becauſe they were afraid of his ſouldiers. Cæſar aunſwered him again: and why then, doeſt not thou keepe thee at home, for the ſame feare? Conſidius replied, becauſe my age taketh away feare from me: far hauing ſo ſhort a time to liue, I haue no care to prolong it further. The ſhamefulleſt part that Cæſar played while he was Conſull, ſeemeth to be this: when he choſe P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offered his wife ſuch diſhonor, and prophaned the holy ancient myſteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne houſe. Clodius ſued to be Tribune to no other end, but to deſtroy Cicero: and Cæſar ſelfe alſo departed not from Rome to his army before he had ſet them together by the eares, and driuen Cicero out of Italy. All theſe things they ſay he did, before the warres with the Gavles. But the time of the great armies and conqueſts he made afterwards, and of the warre in the which he ſubdued all the Gavles (entring into another courſe of life farre contrary vnto the firſt) made him to be knowne for as valiant a ſouldier and as excellent a Captaine to leade men, as thoſe that afore him had bene counted the wiſeſt and moſt valianteſt Generals that euer were, and that by their valiant deeds had atchieued great honour. For whoſoeuer would compare the houſe of the Fabians, of the Scipioes, of the Metellians, yea thoſe alſo of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey ſelfe:

Whoſe fame aſcendeth vp vnto the heauens:

It will appeare that Cæſars proweſſe and deeds of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard countries where he made warres: another, in enlarging the realmes and countries which he ioyned vnto the Empire of Rome: another, in the multitude and power of his enemies whom he ouercame: another, in the rudeneſſe and auſtere nature of men with whom he had to do, whoſe maners afterwards he ſoftned and made ciuill: another, in courteſie and clemency which he vſed vnto them whom he had conquered: another, in great bounty and liberality beſtowed vpon them that ſerued vnder him in thoſe warres: and in fine, he excelled them all in the number of battels he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had ſlaine in battell. For in leſſe then ten yeares warre in Gavle he tooke by force and aſſault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred ſeuerall nations: and hauing before him in battell thirtie hundred thouſand ſouldiers, at ſundry times, he ſlue ten hundred thouſand of them, and tooke as many more priſoners. Furthermore, he was ſo entirely beloued of his ſouldiers, that to do him ſeruice (where otherwiſe they were no more then other men in any priuate quarrell) if Cæſars honour were touched, they were inuincible, and would ſo deſperately venture themſelues, and with ſuch such fury, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainely by the example of Acilius: who in a battell by sea before the city of MARSEILLES, bording one of his enemies ships, one cut off his right hand with a sword, but yet he forsooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in his enemies faces, and made them flie, so that he wanne their ship from them. And Cassius Scæua also, in a conflict before the city of DYRRACHIVM, hauing one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his shoulder striken through with a dart, and his thigh with another, and hauing receiued thirty arrowes vpon his shield, he called to his enemies, and made as though he would yeeld vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their shoulders from his body with his sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, and at the length saued himselfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in BRITAINE also, when the Captaines of the bands were driuen into a marish or bogge full of mire and dirt, and that the enemie did fiercely assaile them there: Cæsar then standing to view the battell, he saw a priuate souldier of his thrust in among the Captaines, and fought so valiantly in their defence, that at the length he draue the barbarous people to flye, and by his meanes saued the Captaines, which otherwise were in great daunger to haue bene cast way. Then this souldier being the hindmost man of all the Captaines, marching with great paine through the mire and dirt, halfe swimming, and halfe on foote: in the end got to the other side, but left his shield behind him. Cæsar wondring at his noble courage, ranne to him with ioy to imbrace him. But the poore souldier hanging downe his head, the water standing in his eyes, fell downe at Cæsars feete, and besought him to pardon him, for that he had left his target behind him. And in AFRICKE also, Scipio hauing taken one of Cæsars ships, and Granius Petronius abord on her amongst other, not long before chosen Treasurer: he put all the rest to the sword but him, and sayd he would giue him his life. But Petronius aunswered him againe: that Cæsars souldiers did not vse to haue their liues giuen them, but to giue others their liues: and with those words he drew his sword, and thrust himselfe through. Now Cæsars selfe did breed this noble courage and life in them. First, for that he gaue them bountifully, and hid honor them also, shewing thereby, that he did not heape vp riches in the warres to maintaine his life afterwards in wantonnesse and pleasure, but that he did keepe it in store, honourably to reward their valiant seruice: and that by so much he thought himselfe rich, by how much he was liberall in rewarding of them that had deserued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder so much at his valiantnesse in putting himselfe at euery instant in such manifest daunger, and in taking so extreme paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedy desire of honour that set him on fire, and pricked him forward to do it: but that he alwayes continued all labour and hardnesse, more then his body could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the constitution of his body, he was leane, white, and soft skinned, and often subiect to headach, and otherwhile to the falling sickenesse (the which tooke him the first time, as it is reported, in CORDVBA, a city of SPAINE) but yet therefore yeelded not to the disease of his body, to make it a cloake to cherish him withall, but contrarily, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his sicke body fighting alwayes with his disease, trauelling continually, liuing soberly, and commonly lying abroad in the field. For the most nights he slept in his coach or litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwayes able to do something: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the countrey to see townes, castles, and strong places. He had alwayes a secretary with him in his coach, who did still write as he went by the way, and a souldier behind him that caried his sword. He made such speed the first time the came from ROME, when he had his office, that in eight dayes he came to the riuer of Rhone. He was so excellent a rider of horse from his youth, that holding his hands behind him, he would gallop his horse vpon the spurre. In his warres in GAVLE, he did further exercise himselfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupy two secretaries at once with as much as they could write: and as Oppius writeth, more then two at a time. As it is reported, that Cæsar was the first that deuised friends might talke together by writing ciphers in letters, when he had no leisure to speake with them for his vrgent businesse, & for the great distance besides from ROME. How litle account Cæsar made of his diet, this example doth proue it. Cæsar supping one night in MILLANE with his friend Valerius Leo, there was serued sperage to his boord, and oyle of perfume put into it in stead of sallet oyle. He simply eate it, and found no fault, blaming his friends that were offended: and told them, that it had bene inough for them to haue abstained to eate of that they misliked, and not to shame their friend, and how that he lacked good manner that found fault with his friend. Another time as he trauelled through the countrey, he was driuen by fowle weather on the sudden to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, and that was so narrow, that one man could but scarce lye in it. Then he sayd to his friends that were about him: Greatest roomes are meetest for greatest men, and the most necessary roomes for the sickest persons. And thereupon he caused Oppius that was sicke to lye there all night: and he himselfe, with the rest of his friends, lay without doores, vnder the easing of the house. The first warre that Cæsar made with the GAVLES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGVRINIANS, who hauing set fire of all their good cities, to the number of twelue, and foure hundred villages besides, came to inuade that part of GAVLE which was subiect to the ROMAINES, as the CIMBRI and TEVTONS had done before: vnto whom for valiantnesse they gaue no place, and they were also a great number of them (for they were three hundred thousand soules in all) whereof there were a hundred, foure score, and ten thousand fighting men. Of those, it was not Cæsar himselfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenant, that ouerthrew them by the riuer of Arax. But the HELVETIANS themselues came suddenly with their army to set vpon him, as he was going towards a city of his confederates. Cæsar perceiuing that, made hast to get him some place of strength, and there did set his men in battell ray. When one brought him his horse to get vp on which he vsed in battell, he sayd vnto them: When I haue ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to follow the chase, but now let vs giue them charge. Therewith he marched forward on foote, and gaue charge: and there fought it out a long time, before he could make them flie that were in battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their carts. For there, they that before had fled from the battell, did not onely put themselues in force, and valiantly fought it out: but their wiues and children also fighting for their liues to the death, were all slaine, and the battell was scant ended at midnight. Now if the act of this victory was famous, vnto that he also added another as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had escaped from this battell, he gathered together againe aboue a hundred thousand of them, and compelled them to returne home into their countrey which they had forsaken, and vnto their townes also which they had burnt: because he feared the GERMAINES would come ouer the riuer of Rheyne, and occupy that countrey lying voide. The second warre he made, was in defence of the GAVLES against the GERMAINES: although before, he himselfe had caused Arioüistus their king, to be receiued for a confederate of the ROMAINES. Notwithstanding, they were growne very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainely, that hauing any occasion offered them to enlarge their territories, they would not content them with their owne, but meant to inuade and possesse the rest of GAVLE. Cæsar perceiuing that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young Gentlemen of noble houses of ROME, who thought to haue gone to the warres with him, as onely for their pleasure and gaine: he called them to councell, and commanded them that were afraid, that they should depart home, and not put themselues in danger against their wils, sith they had such womanish faint-harts to shrinke when he had need of them. And for himselfe, he sayd, he would set vpon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, saying, that the enemies were no valianter then the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferiour vnto Marius. This oration being made, the souldiers of the tenth legion sent their Lieutenants vnto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fell out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iourney with good will to serue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlongs of the campe of the enemies. Arioüistus courage was well cooled, when he saw Cæsar was come, and that the ROMAINES came to seeke out the GERMAINES, where they thought, and made account, that they durst not haue abidden them: and therefore nothing mistrusting it would haue come so to passe, he wondred much at Cæsars courage, and the more when he saw his owne army in a maze withall. But much more did their courage fall, by reason of the foolish women propheciers they had among them, which did foretell things to come: who, considering the waues and trouble of the riuers, and the terrible noise they made running downe the streame, did forewarne them not to fight, vntill the new Moone. Cæsar hauing intelligence thereof, and perceiuing that the barbarous people thereupon stirred not: thought it best then to set vpon them, being discouraged with this superstitious feare, rather rather then loosing time, he should tary their leisure. So he did skirmish with them euen to their forts, and litle hils where they lay, and by this meanes prouoked them so, that with great fury they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chase, with great slaughter, three hundred furlong, euen vnto the riuer of Rheyn: and he filled all the fields thitherto with dead bodies and spoyles. Howbeit Ariouistus flying with speed, got ouer the riuer of Rheyn, and escaped with a few of his men. It is sayd that there were slaine foure score thousand persons at this battell. After this exploit, Cæsar left his army amongst the SEQVANES to winter there: and he himselfe in the meane time, thinking of the affaires at ROME, went ouer the mountaines into GAVLE about the riuer of Po, being part of his prouince which he had in charge. For there, the riuer called Rubico, deuideth the rest of ITALIE from GAVLE on this side the Alpes. Cæsar lying there, did practise to make friends in ROME, because many came thither to see him: vnto whom he graunted their sutes they demanded, and sent them home also, partly with liberall rewards, and partly with large promises and hope. Now during all this conquest of the GAVLES. Pompey did not consider how Cæsar enterchangeably did conquer the GAVLES with the weapons of the ROMAINES, and wanne the ROMAINES againe with the money of the GAVLES. Cæsar being aduertised that the BELGÆ (which were the warlikest men of all the GAVLES, and that occupied the third part of GAVLE) were all vp in armes, and had raised a great power of men together: he straight made towards them with all possible speed, and found them spoyling and ouerrunning the countrey of the GAVLES, their neighbours, and confederates of the ROMAINES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting cowardly, he ouerthrew the most part of them which were in a troupe together, and slue such a number of them, that the ROMAINES passed ouer deepe riuers and lakes on foot, vpon their dead bodies, the riuers were so full of them. After this ouerthrow, they that dwelt neerest vnto the sea side, and were next neighbors vnto the Ocean, did yeeld themselues without any compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his army against the NERVIANS, the stoutest warriers of all the BELGÆ. They dwelling in the wood countrey, had conueyed their wiues, children and goods, into a maruellous great forrest, as farre from their enemies as they could: and being about the number of sixscore thousand fighting men and more, they came one day and set vpon Cæsar, when his army was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, litle looking to haue fought that day. At the first charge, they brake the horsemen of the ROMAINES, and compassing, in the twelfth and seuenth legion, they slue all the Centurions and Captaines of the bands. And had not Cæsar selfe taken his shield on his arme, and flying in amongst the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: and the tenth legion also seeing him in danger, run vnto him from the top of the hill where they stood in battell, and broken the rankes of their enemies: there had not a ROMAINE escaped aliue that day. But taking example of Cæsars valiantnesse, they fought desperatly beyond their power, and yet could not make the NERVIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in maner slaine in the field. It is written that of threescore thousand fighting men, there escaped onely but fiue hundred: & of foure hundred Gentlemen and counsellers of the ROMAINES, but three saued. The Senate vnderstanding it at ROME, ordained that they should do sacrifice vnto the gods, and keepe feasts and solemne processions fifteene dayes together without intermission, hauing neuer made the like ordinance at ROME, for any victory that euer was obtained. Because they saw the danger had bene maruellous great, so many nations rising as they did in armes together against him: and further, the loue of the people vnto him made his victory much more famous. For when Cæsar had set his affaires at a stay in GAVLE, on the other side of the Alpes: he alwayes vsed to lye about the riuer of Po in the winter time, to giue direction for the establishing of things at ROME, at his pleasure. For, not onely they that made sute for offices at ROME were chosen Magistrates, by meanes of Cæsars money which he gaue them, with the which, bribing the people, they bought their voices, and when they were in office, did all that they could to increase Cæsars power and greatnesse: but the greatest and chiefest men also of the Nobility, went vnto LVKE vnto him. As Pompey, Crassus, Appius Prætor of SARDINIA, and Nepos, Proconsull in SPAINE. Insomuch that there were at one time, sixscore sergeants carying rods and axes before the Magistrates: and aboue two hundred Senators besides. There they fell in consultation, and determined that Pompey and Crassus should againe be chosen Consuls the next yeare following. Furthermore, they did appoint, that Cæsar should haue money againe deliuered him to pay his army, and besides, did proroge the time of his gouernment fiue yeares further. This was thought a very ſtrange and an vnreaſonable matter vnto wiſe men. For they themſelues that had taken ſo much mony of Cæſar, perſwaded the Senate to let him haue money of the common treaſure, as though he had had none before: yea to ſpeake more plainly, they compelled the Senate vnto it, ſighing and lamenting to ſee the decrees they paſſed. Cato was not there thē, for they had purpoſely ſent him before into CYPRVS. Howbeit Faonius that followed Catoes ſteps, when he ſaw that he could not preuaile, nor withſtand them, he went out of the Senate in choler, and cried out amongſt the people, that it was a horrible ſhame. But no man did harken to him: ſome for the reuerence they bare vnto Pompey, and Craſſus, and others fauoring Cæſars proceedings, did put all their hope and truſt in him: and therefore did quiet themſelues, and ſtirred not. Then Cæſar returning into GAVLE beyond the Alpes vnto his army, found there a great warre in the country. For two great nations of GERMANY had not long before paſſed ouer the riuer of Rheyn, to conquer new lands: and the one of theſe people were called IPES, and the other TENTERIDES. Now touching the battell which Cæſar fought with them, he himſelfe doth deſcribe it in his Cōmentaries, in this ſort. That the barbarous people hauing ſent Ambaſſadours vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time, they notwithſtanding, againſt law of armes, came and ſet vpon him as he trauelled by the way, inſomuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrew fiue thouſand of his horſemen, who nothing at all miſtruſted their comming]. Againe, that they ſent him other Ambaſſadours to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith cauſed his whole army to march againſt them, thinking it a folly, and madneſſe, to keepe faith with ſuch trayterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Canutius writeth, that the Senate appointing againe to do new ſacrifice, proceſſions, and feaſts, to giue thankes to the gods for this victory: Cato was of contrary opinion, that Cæſar ſhould be deliuered into the hands of the barbarous people, for to purge their city and commonwealth of this breach of faith, and to turne the curſe vpon him, that was the author of it. Of theſe barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thouſand perſons) they were all in maner ſlaine, ſauing a very few of them, that flying from the battell got ouer the riuer of Rheyn againe, who were receiued by the SICAMBRIANS, another people of the GERMAINES. Cæſar taking this occaſion againſt them, lacking no good will of himſelf beſides, to haue the honor to be counted the firſt ROMAINE that euer paſſed ouer the riuer of Rheyn with an army: he built a bridge ouer it. This riuer is maruellous broad, and runneth with great fury. And in that place ſpecially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great breadth from one ſide to the other, and it hath ſo ſtrong and ſwift a ſtreame beſides: that men caſting downe great bodies of trees into the riuer (which the ſtreame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes and force thereof maruellouſly ſhake the poſts of the bridge he had ſet vp. But to preuent the blowes of thoſe trees, and alſo to breake the furie of the ſtreame: he made a pile of great wood aboue the bridge a good way, and did forcibly ramme them in to the bottome of the riuer, ſo that in ten dayes ſpace, he had ſet vp and finiſht his bridge of the goodlieſt carpenters worke, and moſt excellent inuention to ſee to, that could be poſſibly thought or deuiſed. Then paſſing ouer his army vpon it, he found none that durſt any more fight with him. For the SVVEVIANS, which were the warlikeſt people of all GERMANY, had gotte themſelues with their goods into wonderfull great valleys and bogges, full of woods and forreſts. Now when he had burnt all the countrey of his enemies, and confirmed the league with the confederates of the ROMAINES: he returned backe againe into GAVLE after he had taried eighteene dayes at the moſt in GERMANIE, on the other ſide of the Rheyn. The iourney he made alſo into ENGLAND was a noble enterpriſe, and very commendable. For he was the firſt that ſailed the Weſt Ocean with an army by ſea, and that paſſed through the ſea Atlanticum with his army, to make warre in that ſo great and famous Iland (which many ancient writers would not beleeue that it was ſo indeed, and did make them vary about it, ſaying it was but a fable and a lye) and was the firſt that enlarged the ROMAINE Empire, beyond the earth inhabitable. For twiſe he paſſed ouer the narow ſea againſt the firme land of GAVLE, and fighting many battels there, did hurt his enemies more, then enrich his owne men: becauſe, of men hardly brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon his warre had not ſuch ſucceſſe as he looked for, and therefore taking pledges onely of the king, and impoſing a yearely tribute vpon him, to be payed vnto the people of ROME, he returned againe into GAVLE. There he was no ſooner landed, but he found letters ready to be ſent ouer the ſea vnto him: in

in the which he was aduertiſed from Rome, of the death of his daughter, that ſhe was dead with child by Pompey. For the which, Pompey and Cæſar both, were maruellous ſorowfull: and their friends mourned alſo, thinking that this alliance which maintained the common wealth (that otherwiſe was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now ſeuered, and broken a ſunder, and the rather likely, becauſe the child liued not long after the mother. So the common people at Rome tooke the corps of Iulia, in deſpite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the field of Mars. Now Cæſar being driuen to deuide his armie (that was very great) into ſundry garriſons for the winter time, and returning againe into Italie as he was wont: all Gavle rebelled againe, and had raiſed great armies in euery quarter to ſet vpon the Romaines, and to aſſay if they could diſtreſſe their forts where they lay in garriſon. The greateſt number and moſt warlike men of theſe Gavles, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix: and firſt did ſet vpon the garriſons of Cotta, and Titurius, whom they ſlue, and all the ſouldiers they had about them. Then they went with three ſcore thouſand fighting men to beſiege the garriſon which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almoſt taken them by force, becauſe all the ſouldiers were euery man of them hurt: but they were ſo valiant and couragious, that they did more then men (as they ſay) in defending of themſelues. Theſe newes being come to Cæſar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all poſſible ſpeed, and leauying ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers, made haſt to helpe Cicero that was in ſuch diſtreſſe. The Gavles that did beſiege Cicero, vnderſtanding of Cæſars comming, raiſed their ſiege incontinently, to go and meete him: making account that he was but a handfull in their hands, they were ſo few. Cæſar to deceiue them, ſtill drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Captaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies, and commaunded his men in no wiſe to ſtirre out to skirmiſh with them, but compelled them to raiſe vp the rampers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were afraid, becauſe the enemies ſhould the leſſe eſteeme of them: vntill that at length he tooke oportunity, by their diſorderly comming to aſſaile the trenches of his campe (they were growne to ſuch a preſumptuous boldneſſe and brauery) and then ſallying out vpon them, he put them all to flight with ſlaughter of a great number of them. This did ſuppreſſe all the rebellions of the Gavles in thoſe partes, and furthermore, he himſelfe in perſon went in the middeſt of winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a new ſupply out of Italie of three whole legions in their roome, which he had loſt: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legion he himſelfe had leauied in Gavle about the riuer of Po. During theſe ſtirres, brake foorth the beginning of the greateſt and moſt daungerous warre that he had in all Gavle, the which had bene ſecretly practiſed of long time by the chiefeſt and moſt warlike people of that country, who had leauied a wonderfull great power. For euery where they leauied multitudes of men, and great riches beſides, to fortifie their ſtrong holds. Furthermore the countrey where they roſe, was very ill to come vnto, and ſpecially at that time being winter, when the riuers were froſen, the woods and forreſts couered with ſnow, the medowes drowned with flouds, and the fields ſo deepe of ſnow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the marriſhes nor riuers to be diſcerned, all was ſo ouerflowne and drowned with water: all which trou'les together were inough (as they thought) to keepe Cæſar from ſetting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the Gavles were of this conſpiracy, but two of the chiefeſt were the Avernians and Carnvtes: who had choſen Vercingentorix for their Lieutenant Generall, whoſe father the Gavles before had put to death, becauſe they thought he aſpired to make himſelfe king. This Vercingentorix deuiding his army into diuerſe parts, and appointing diuerſe Captaines ouer them, had gotten to take his part, all the people and countries there abouts, euen as farre as they that dwell towards the ſea * Adriaticke, hauing further determined (vnderſtanding that Rome did conſpire againſt Cæſar) to make all Gavle riſe in armes againſt him. So that if he had but taried a litle longer, vntill Cæſar had entred in his ciuill warres: he had put all Italy in as great feare and danger, as it was when the Cimbri did come and inuade it. But Cæſar, that was valiant in all aſſayes and dangers of warre, and that was very skilfull to take time and oportunity: ſo ſoone as he vnderſtood the newes of the rebellion, he departed with ſpeed, and returned backe the ſelfe ſame way which he had gone, making the barbarous people know, that they ſhould deale with an army inuincible, and which they could not poſſibly withſtand, conſidering the great ſpeed he had made with the ſame, in ſo ſharpe and hard a winter. For where they would not poſſibly haue beleeued, that a poſt or currer could haue come in ſo ſhort a time from the place where he was vnto them: they wondred when they ſaw him burning and deſtroying the countrey, the townes and ſtrong forts where he came with his army, taking all to mercy that yeelded vnto him: vntill ſuch times as the HEDVI tooke armes againſt him, who before were wont to be called the brethren of the ROMAINES, and were greatly honoured of them. Wherefore Cæſars men when they vnderſtood that they had ioyned with the rebels, they were maruellous ſory, and halfe diſcouraged. Thereupon, Cæſar departing from thoſe partes, went through the country of the LINGONES, to enter the countrey of the *BVRGONIANS, who were confederates of the ROMAINES, and the neareſt vnto ITALY on that ſide, in reſpect of all the reſt of GAVLE. Thither the enemies came to ſet vpon him, and to enuiron him of all ſides, with an infinite number of thouſands of fighting men. Cæſar on the other ſide taried their comming, and fighting with them a long time, he made them ſo afraid of him, that at length he ouercame the barbarous people. But at the firſt, it ſeemeth notwithſtanding, that he had receiued ſome ouerthrow: for the ARVERNIANS ſhewed a ſword hanged vp in one of their temples, which they ſayd they had won from Cæſar. Inſomuch as Cæſar ſelfe comming that way by occaſion, ſaw it, and fell a laughing at it. But ſome of his friends going about to take it away, he would not ſuffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was a holy thing. Notwithſtanding, ſuch as at the firſt had ſaued themſelues by flying, the moſt of them were gotten with their king into the city of ALEXIA, the which Cæſar went and beſieged, although it ſeemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as alſo for the multitude of ſouldiers they had to defend it. But now during this ſiege, he fell into a maruellous great daunger without, almoſt incredible. For an army of three hundred thouſand fighting men of the beſt men that were among all the nations of the GAVLES, came againſt him, being at the ſiege of ALEXIA, beſides them that were within the city, which amounted to the number of threeſcore and ten thouſand fighting men at the leaſt: ſo that perceiuing he was ſhut in betwixt two ſo great armies, he was driuen to fortifie himſelfe with two wals, the one againſt them of the city, and the other againſt them without. For if thoſe two armies had ioyned together, Cæſar had bene vtterly vndone. And therefore, this ſiege of ALEXIA, and the battell he wan before it, did deſeruedly winne him more honour and fame, then any other. For there, in that inſtant and extreme danger, he ſhewed more valiantneſſe and wiſedome, then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wonderfull thing was this? that they of the city neuer heard any thing of them that came to aide them, vntill Cæſar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the ROMAINES themſelues which kept watch vpon the wall that was built againſt the city, knew alſo no more of it, then they, vntill it was done, and that they heard the cryes and lamentations of men and women in ALEXIA, when they perceiued on the other ſide of the city ſuch a number of gliſtering ſhields of gold and ſiluer, ſuch ſtore of bloudy corſlets and armors, ſuch a deale of plate and moueables, and ſuch a number of tents and pauilions after the faſhion of the GAVLES, which the ROMAINES had gotten of their ſpoiles in their campe. Thus ſuddenly was this great army vaniſhed, as a dreame or viſion: where the moſt part of them were ſlaine that day in battell. Furthermore, after that they within the city of ALEXIA had done great hurt to Cæſar, and themſues alſo: in the end, they all yeelded themſelues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king and Captaine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horſe furniſhed with rich capariſon accordingly, and rode round about Cæſar, who ſate in his chaire of eſtate. Then lighting from his horſe, he tooke off his capariſon and furniture, and vnarmed himſelfe, and layd all on the ground, and went and ſate downe at Cæſars feete, and ſayd neuer a word. So Cæſar at length committed him as a priſoner taken in the warres, to leade him afterwards in his triumph at ROME. Now Cæſar had of long time determined to deſtroy Pompey, and Pompey him alſo. For Craſſus being killed amongſt the PARTHIANS, who onely did ſee, that one of them two muſt needs fall: nothing kept Cæſar from being the greateſt perſon, but becauſe he deſtroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pompey to withſtand that it ſhould not come to paſſe, but becauſe he did not firſt ouercome Cæſar, whom only he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before ſet light by him, thinking it an eaſie matter for him to put him downe when he would, ſith he had brought him to that greatneſſe he was come vnto. But Cæſar contrarily, hauing had that drift in his head from the beginning, like a wreſtler that ſtudieth for trickes to ouerthrow his aduerſary: he went farre from ROME, to exerciſe himſelfe in the warres of GAVLE, where he did traine his army

army, and presently by his valiant deeds did increase his fame and honour. By these meanes became Cæsar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprise in execution, but some occasions of colour, which Pompey partly gaue him, and partly also the time deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill gouernement at that time of the commonwealth at ROME. For they that made sute for honour and offices, bought the voyces of the people with ready money, which they gaue out openly to vsury, without shame or feare. Thereupon, the common people that had sold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hired them: not with their voyces, but with their bowes, slings, and swords. So that the assembly seldome time brake vp, but that the pulpit for orations was defiled and sprinckled with the bloud of them that were slaine in the market place, the city remaining all that time without gouernmēt of Magistrate, like a ship left without a Pilote. Insomuch, as men of deepe iudgement and discretion seeing such fury and madnesse of the people, thought themselues happy if the commonwealth were no worse troubled, then with the absolute state of a Monarchy and soueraigne Lord to gouerne them. Furthermore, there were many that were not affraid to speake it openly, that there was no other helpe to remedy the troubles of the commonwealth, but by the authority of one man onely, that should commaund them all: and that this medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the gentlest Phisition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vsed many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, and yet cunningly vnder hand did lay all the irons in the fire he could, to bring it to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the marke he shot at, and fearing least in the end the people should be compelled to make him Dictator: he perswaded the Senate rather to make him sole Consul, that contenting himselfe with that more iust and law full gouernment, he should not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counsell, did not onely make him Consull, but further did proroge his gouernment of the prouinces he had. For he had two prouinces, all SPAINE, and AFRICKE, the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: and further, he receiued yearly of the cōmon treasure to pay his souldiers a thousand talents. Hereupon Cæsar took occasion also to send his men to make sute in his name for the Consulship, and also to haue the gouernement of his prouinces proroged. Pompey at the first held his peace. But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwise hated Cæsar) withstood them, and to shame and dishonor him, had much needlesse speech in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke away the freedome frō the Colonies which Cæsar had lately brought vnto the city of NOVVMCOMVM in GAVLE towards ITALY, where Cæsar not long before had lodged them. And moreouer, when Marcellus was Consull, he made one of the Senators in that city to be whipped with rods, who came to ROME about those matters: and sayd, he gaue him those markes, that he should know he was no ROMAINE citizen, and bad him go his way, and tell Cæsar of it. After Marcellus Consulship, Cæsar setting open his cofers of the treasure he had gotten among the GAVLES, did franckly giue it out amongst the Magistrates at ROME, without restraint or spare. First, he set Curio the Tribune cleare out of debt: and gaue also vnto Paule the Consull a thousand fiue hundred talents, with which mony he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paules Basilicke, in the place of Fulvius Basilike. Then Pompey being afraid of this practise, began openly to procure, both by himselfe and his friends, that they should send Cæsar a successor: and moreouer, he sent vnto Cæsar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conquest of GAVLE. Cæsar sent him them againe, and gaue euery priuate souldier, two hundred and fifty siluer drachmas. Now, they that brought these two legions backe from Cæsar, gaue out ill and seditious words against him among the people, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was maruellously desired and wished for in Cæsars campe: and though in ROME, for the malice and secret spite which the gouernours there did beare him, he could hardly obtaine that he desired: yet in GAVLE he might assure himselfe, that all the army was at his commaundement. They added further also, that if the souldiers there did once returne ouer the mountaines againe into ITALIE, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cæsar, because he wearied them with too much labour and continuall fight: and withall, for that they suspected he aspired to be king. These words breeding security in Pompey, and a vaine conceipt of himselfe, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparation for warre, as though he had no occasion to be afraid: but only studied to thwart Cæsar in speech, & to crosse the sutes he made. Howbeit Cæsar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Cæsars Captaines which was sent to ROME to prosecute his sute, being at the Senate doore, and hearing that they denied to proroge Cæsars time of gouernement which he sued for: clapping his hand vpon his sword, see said, Sith you will not grant it him, this shall giue it him. Notwithstanding, the requests that Cæsar propounded, caried great semblance of reason with them. For he sayd, that he was contented to lay downe armes, so that Pompey did the like: and that both of them as priuate persons should come and make sute of their citizens to obtaine honourable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, and graunting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him in going about to make himselfe a tyrant, and in the meane time to graunt the other meanes to be a tyrant. Curio making these offers and perswasions openly before the people, in the name of Cæsar, he was heard with great reioycing and clapping of hands, and there were some that cast flowers and nosegayes vpon him when he went his way, as they commonly vse to do vnto any man, when he hath obtained victory, and won any games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a letter sent from Cæsar, & made it openly to be read in despite of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Cæsar did not dismisse his army by a certaine day appointed him, the ROMAINS should proclaime him an enemy vnto ROME. Then the Consuls openly asked in the presence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismisse his army: but few agreed to that demand. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cæsar should dismisse his army: thereto they all in maner answered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested againe that both of them should lay downe armes: then they were all indifferently of his mind. Notwithstanding, because Scipio did insolently behaue himselfe, and Marcellus also, who cried that they must vse force of armes, and not mens opinions against a theefe: the Senate rose straight vpon it without further determination, & men changed apparell through the city because of this dissention, as they vse to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cæsar, which seemed much more reasonable: in the which he requested that they would graunt him GAVLE, that lieth betweene the mountaines of the Alpes & ITALY, and ILLYRIA, with two legions onely, and then that he would request nothing else, vntill he made sute for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from the gouernment of CILICIA, trauelled to reconcile them together, and pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him he would yeeld to any thing he would haue him, so he did let him alone with his army. So Cicero perswaded Cæsars friends to be contented, to take those two prouinces, and fiue thousand men only, that they might be friends and at peace together. Pompey very willingly yeelded vnto it, and graunted them. But Lentulus the Consull would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they themselues gaue Cæsar a happy occasion and colour, as could be, stirring vp his soldiers the more against them, when he shewed them these two notable men & Tribunes of the people that were driuen to flie, disguised like slaues, in a carriers cart. For, they were driuē for feare to steale out of ROME, disguised in that maner. Now at that time, Cæsar had not in all about him, aboue fiue thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen: for the rest of his army, he left on the other side of the mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So, considering that for the execution of his enterprise, he should not need so many men of warre at the first, but rather suddenly stealing vpon them, to make them afraid with his valiantnesse, taking benefit of the oportunity of time, because he should more easily make his enemies afraid of him, comming so suddenly when they looked not for him, then he should otherwise distresse them, assailing them with his whole army, in giuing them leisure to prouide further for him: he commaunded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other armour then their swords, to take the city of ARIMINVM (a great city of GAVLE, being the first citie men come to, when they come out of GAVLE) with as litle bloudshed and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that force and army he had with him, vnto Hortensius one of his friends: he remained a whole day together, openly in the sight of euery man, to see the sword players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his body a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongst them, and made merry with them a while, whom he had bidden to supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he rose from the table, and prayed his company to be merry, and no man to stirre, for he would straight come to them againe: howbeit he had secretly before commaunded a few of his trustiest friends to follow him, not altogether, but some one way, and some another way. He himselfe in the meane time tooke a coach he had hired, and made made as though he would haue gone some other way at the first, but sodainly he turned backe againe towards the city of Ariminvm. When he was come vnto the litle riuer of Rubicon, which deuideth Gavle on this side the Alpes from Italie, he stayed vpon a sodaine. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his conscience, to think what an enterprise he tooke in hand: and his thoughts also fell out more doubtfull, when he entred into consideration of the desperatnesse of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with himselfe, and spake neuer a word, wauing sometime one way, sometime another way, and oftentimes changed his determination, contrarie to himself. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Asinius Pollio, telling them what mischiefes the beginning of this passage ouer that riuer would breed in the world, and how much their posteritie and them that liued after them, would speake of it in time to come. But at length, casting from him with a noble courage, all those perillous thoughts to come, and speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt dangerous and desperate enterprises: A man can be but once vndone, come on: he passed ouer the riuer, and when he was come ouer, he ran with his coach and neuer stayed, so that before day light he was within the city of Ariminvm, and tooke it. It is said, that the night before he passed ouer this riuer, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The city of Ariminvm being taken, & the rumor therof dispersed through al Italy, euen as if it had bene open war both by sea and land, & as if all the lawes of Rome, together with the extreame bounds and confines of the same had bene broken vp: a man would haue said, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities themselues leauing their habitations, fled from one place to another through all Italie. And Rome it selfe also was immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parts like droues of cattell, that there was neither officer nor Magistrate that could any more commaund them by authoritie, neither by any perswasion of reason bridle such a confused and disorderly multitude: so that Rome had in maner destroyed it selfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were daungerous stirres and tumults euery where: because they that were glad of this trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and down the citie, when they met with others in diuers places, that seemed either to be afraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise is it impossible in so great a citie) they flatly fell out with them, and boldly threatned them with that that was to come. Pompey himselfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill words some gaue him on the one side, and some on the other. For some of them reproued him, and said that he had done wisely, and had paid for his folly, because he had made Cæsar so great and strong against him and the commonwealth. And other againe did blame him, because he had refused the honest offers and reasonable conditions of peace, which Cæsar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Consull to abuse him too much. On the other side, Phaonius spake vnto him, and bad him stampe on the ground with his foote: For Pompey being one day in a brauerie in the Senate, said openly: Let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he listed, with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all Italie with souldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that time had a greater number of souldiers then Cæsar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him so many lyes, and put so many examples of feare before him, as if Cæsar had bene already at their heeles, and had won all: so that in the end he yeelded vnto them, & gaue place to their fury & madnesse, determining (seeing all things in such tumult and garboile) that there was no way but to forsake the city, and therupon cõmanded the Senate to follow him, & not a man to tary there, vnlesse he loued tyranny, more then his own liberty & the cõmonwealth. Thus the Consuls thẽselues, before they had done their cõmon sacrifices accustomed at their going out of the city, fled euery man of them. So did likewise the most part of the Senators, taking their owne things in hast, such as came first to hand, as if by stealth they had taken them from another. And there were some of thẽ also that alwaies loued Cæsar, whose wits were then so troubled & besides themselues, with the feare they had conceiued: that they also fled, and followed the streame of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessity. But aboue all things, it was a lamentable sight to see the citie it selfe, that in this feare & trouble was left at all aduenture, as a ship tossed in storme of sea, forsaken of her Pylots, and despairing of her safetie. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to be their natural countrey, and reckened Rome no better then Cæsars campe. At that time also Labienus, who was one of Cæsars greatest friends, and had bene alwaies vsed as his Lieutenant in the wars of Gavle, and had valiantly fought in his cause: he likewise forsooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cæsar sent his mony and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the city of Corfinivm, the which Domitius kept with thirty cohorts or ensignes. When Domitius saw he was besieged, he straight thought himselfe but vndone, and dispairing of his successe, he bad a Phisitian, a slaue of his giue him poison. The Phisitian gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue dyed. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them report what clemencie and wonderfull curtesie Cæsar vsed vnto them he tooke: repented him then that he had drunke this drinke, and began to lament and bewaile his desperate resolution taken to dy. The Phisitian did comfort him againe, and told him, that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him sleepe, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went straight and yeelded himselfe vnto Cæsar: who gaue him his life, but he notwithstanding stale away immediatly, and fled vnto Pompey. When these newes were brought to Rome, they did maruellously reioyce and comfort them that still remained there: and moreouer there were of them that had forsaken Rome, which returned thither againe. In the meane time Cæsar did put all Domitius men in pay, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leauied men for Pompey. Now Cæsar hauing assembled a great and dreadfull power together, went straight where he thought to find Pompey himselfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of Brvndvsivm, from whence he had sent the two Consuls before with that army he had, vnto Dyrrachivm: and he himselfe also went thither afterwards, when he vnderstood that Cæsar was come, as you shall heare more amply hereafter in his life. Cæsar lacked no goodwill to follow him, but wanting ships to take the seas, he returned forthwith to Rome: so that in lesse then threescore daies, he was Lord of all Italie, without any bloudshed. Who when he was come to Rome, and found it much quieter then he looked for, and many Senators there also, he curteously intreated them, and prayed them to send vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters betweene them, vpon reasonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, either because they feared Pompey, for that they had forsaken him, or else for that they thought Cæsar meant not as he spake, but that they were words of course to colour his purpose withall. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common treasure out of the temple of Saturne, but told him that it was against the law: Tush, said he, time of war and law are two things. If this that I do, quoth he, do offend thee, then get thee hence for this time: for warre cannot abide this francke and bold speech. But when wars are done, and that we are all quiet againe, then thou shalt speake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I do tell thee this of fauour, impairing so much my right, for thou art mine, both thou, and all them that haue risen against me, and whom I haue in my hands. When he had spoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple doore where the treasure lay: and finding no keyes there, he caused Smithes to be sent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereupon began againe to withstand him, and certaine men that stood by praised him in his doing: but Cæsar at length speaking bigly to him, threatned him he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, Yong man, quoth he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tell it thee, then to do it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he got him away roundly: and euer after that, Cæsar had all at his commaundement for the warres. From thence he went into Spaine, to make warre with Petreius and Varro, Pompeys Lieutenants: first to get their armies and Prouinces into his hands which they gouerned, that afterwards he might follow Pompey the better, leauing neuer an enemie behind him. In this iourney he was oftentimes himselfe in daunger, through the ambushes that were laid for him in diuers straunge sorts and places, and likely also to haue lost all his army for lacke of victuals. All this notwithstanding, he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in: vntill he had gotten their campe and armies into his hands, albeit that the Lieutenants themselues fled vnto Pompey. When Cæsar returned againe to Rome, Piso his father in law gaue him counsell to send Ambassadours vnto Pompey, to treate for peace. But Isauricus, to flatter Cæsar, was against it. Cæsar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honour, whose fathers before had bene slaine in Syllaes time: and did somewhat cut off the vsuries that did oppresse them, & besides, did make some such other ordinances as those, but very few. For he was Dictator but eleuen daies onely, and

and then did yeeld it vp of himselfe, and made himselfe Consull, with Seruilius Isauricus, and after that determined to follow the wars. All the rest of his army he left comming on the way, behind him, and went himselfe before with sixe hundred horse, and fiue legions onely of footmen, in the winter quarter, about the moneth of Ianuarie, which after the ATHENIANS, is called Posideon. Then hauing past ouer the sea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of ORICVM and APOLLONIA. Then he sent his ships backe againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM, to transport the rest of his souldiers that could not come with that speed he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whose strength of body, and lustie youth was decayed) being wearied with so many sundry battels as they had fought with their enemies: complained of Cæsar in this sort. To what end and purpose doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vsing vs like slaues and drudges? It is not our armour, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, shall we neuer be without our harnesse on our backes, and our shields on our armes? should not Cæsar thinke, at the least when he seeth our bloud and wounds, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the miserie and paines that other men do feele? And now euen in the dead of winter, he putteth vs vnto the mercy of the sea and tempest, yea which the gods themselues cannot withstand: as if he fled before his enemies, and pursued them not. Thus spending time with this talke, the souldiers still marching on, by small iourneys came at length vnto the city of BRVNDVSIVM. But when they were come, and found that Cæsar had already passed ouer the sea, then they straight chaunged their complaints and minds. For they blamed themselues, and tooke on also with their captaines, because they had not made them make more hast in marching: and sitting vpon the rocks and cliffes of the sea, they looked ouer the maine sea, towards the realme of EPIRVS, to see if they could discerne the ships returning backe, to transport them ouer. Cæsar in the meane time being in the city of APOLLONIA, hauing but a small army to fight with Pompey, it grieued him for that the rest of his army was so long a coming, not knowing what way to take. In the end he followed a dangerous determination, to imbarke vnknowne in a litle pinnase of 12, oares only, to passe ouer the sea againe vnto BRVNDVSIVM: the which he could not do without great danger, considering that all that sea was full of Pompeys ships and armies. So he tooke ship in the night apparelled like a slaue, and went a boord vpon this litle pinnase, and said neuer a word, as if he had bene some poore man of meane condition. The pinnase lay in the mouth of the riuer of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme and quiet, by reason of a litle wind that came from the shore, which euery morning draue back the waues far into the maine sea. But that night, (by ill fortune) there came a great wind from the sea that ouercame the land wind, insomuch as the force & strength of the riuer fighting against the violence of the rage and waues of the sea, the encounter was maruellous daungerous, the water of the riuer being driuen backe, & rebounding vpward, with great noise & danger in turning of the water. Thereupon the Master of the pinnase seeing he could not possibly get out of the mouth of this riuer, bad the Mariners to cast about againe, & to returne against the streame. Cæsar hearing that, straight discouered himselfe vnto the Maister of the pinnase, who at the first was amazed when he saw him: but Cæsar thē taking him by the hand said vnto him, good fellow, be of good cheare, & forwards hardily, feare not, for thou hast Cæsar & his fortune with thee. Thē the Mariners forgetting the danger of the storm they were in, laid on load with oares, & laboured for life what they could against the wind, to get out of the mouth of this riuer. But at length, perceiuing they laboured in vaine, and that the pinnase tooke in abundance of water, and was ready to sinke: Cæsar then to his great griefe was driuen to returne backe againe: who when he was returned vnto his campe, his souldiers came in great companies vnto him, and were very sorie, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his person in daunger, to go fetch thē that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius arriued, and brought with him the rest of his army from BRVNDVSIVM. Then Cæsar finding himselfe strong enough, went and offered Pompey battell, who was passingly well lodged, for victualling of his campe both by sea and land. Cæsar on the other side, who had no great plenty of victuals at the first, was in a very hard case: insomuch as his men gathered roots, and mingled them with milke, and eate them. Furthermore, they did make bread of it also, and sometime when they skirmished with the enemies, and came alongst by them that watched and warded, they cast of their bread into their trenches, & said: that as long as the earth brought foorth such fruits, they would neuer leaue besieging of Pompey. But Pompey straighdy cōmanded them, that they should neither cary those words nor bread into their campe, fearing lest his mens hearts would faile them, and that they would be affraid, when they should thinke of their enemies hardnes, with whom they had to fight, sith they were weary with no paines, no more then brute beasts. Cæsars men did daily skirmish hard to the trenches of Pompeys campe, in the which Cæsar had euer the better, saue uing once onely, at what time his men fled with such feare, that all his campe that day was in great hazard to haue bene cast away. For Pompey came on with his battell vpon them, and they were not able to abide it, but were fought with, and driuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with dead bodies, which were slaine within the very gate and bulwarks of their camp, they were so valiantly pursued. Cæsar stood before them that fled, to make them to turne head againe: but he could not preuaile. For when he would haue taken the ensignes to haue stayed them, the ensigne-bearers threw them downe on the ground: so that the enemies tooke two and thirty of them, and Cæsars selfe also escaped hardly with life. For striking a great bigge souldier that fled by him, commanding him to stay, and turne his face to his enemy: the souldier being affraid, lift vp his sword to strike at Cæsar. But one of Cæsars Pages preuenting him, gaue him such a blow with his sword, that he strake off his shoulder. Cæsar that day was brought vnto so great extremitie, that (if Pompey had not either for feare, or spitefull fortune, left off to follow his victorie, and retired into his campe, being contented to haue driuen his enemies into their campe) returning to his campe with his friends, he said vnto them: the victorie this day had bene our enemies, if they had had a Captaine, that could haue told how to haue ouercome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bed, and that night troubled him more then any night that euer he had. For still his mind ran with great sorrow of the fowle fault he had committed in leading of his armie, of selfe-will to remaine there so long by the sea side, his enemies being the stronger by sea, considering that he had before him a goodly country, rich and plentifull of all things, and goodly cities of MACEDON and THESSALY, and had not the wit to bring the warre from thence, but to lose his time in a place, where he was rather besieged of his enemies for lacke of victuals, then that he did besiege them by force of armes. Thus, fretting and chafing to see himselfe so straighted with victuals, and to thinke of his ill lucke, he raised his campe, intending to go set vpon Scipio, making account, that either he should draw Pompey to battell against his will, when he had not the sea at his backe to furnish him with plenty of victuals: or else that he should easily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnlesse he were aided. This remoue of Cæsars campe, did much encourage Pompeys army and his Captaines, who would needes in any case haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey himselfe, he would in no respect hazard battell, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding himselfe so well prouided of all things necessarie to tary time, he thought it better to draw this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to consume this litle strength that remained in Cæsars army: of the which, the best men were maruellous well trained and good souldiers, and for valiantnesse, at one daies battell, were incomparable. But on the other side againe, to remoue here and there so oft, and to fortifie their campe where they came, and to besiege any wal, or to keepe watch all night in their armour: the most part of them could not do it, by reason of their age, being then vnable to away with that paines, so that the weakenesse of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their hearts. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent disease among them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate. Yet was not this the worst: for besides, he had no store of money, neither could tell how to come by victuals: so that it seemed in all likelihood, that in very short time he would come to nothing. For these respects, Pompey would in no case fight, and yet had he but Cato only of his mind in that, who stucke in it the rather, because he would auoid shedding of his countriemens bloud. For when Cato had viewed the dead bodies slaine in the campe of his enemies, at the last skirmish that was betweene them, the which were no lesse then a thousand persons: he couered his face and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, because he so long refrained from battell: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and kings of kings, saying, that he delayed this war in this sort, because he would not leaue his authoritie to command them all, and that he was glad alwaies to see many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honour him, and wait vpon him. And Faonius also, a hare braind fellow, frantickly counterfeiting the round and plaine speech of Cato, made as though he was maruellous angrie, and said: Is it not great pity, that we shall not eate this yere of TVSCVLVM figs, & all for Pompeys ambitious ambitious mind to raigne alone? and Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAINE, (where becauſe he had but ill ſucceſſe, he was accuſed of treaſon, that for money he had ſold his army vnto Cæſar:) he went buſily asking, why they fought not with that Merchant, vnto whom they ſaid he had ſold the prouince of SPAINE? So that Pompey with theſe kind of ſpeeches, againſt his will, was driuen to follow Cæſar to fight with him. Then was Cæſar at the firſt, maruellouſly perplexed and troubled by the way: becauſe he found none that would giue him any victuals, being deſpiſed of euery man, for the late loſſe and ouerthrow he had receiued. But after that he had taken the city of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not only meet with plenty of victuals to releeue his army with: but he ſtrangely alſo did rid them of their diſeaſe. For the ſouldiers meeting with plenty of wine, drinking hard, and making merry: draue away the infection of the peſtilence. For they diſpoſed themſelues vnto dancing, masking & playing the BACCHERIANS by the way: inſomuch that drinking drunke they ouercame their diſeaſe, and made their bodies new againe. When they both came into the country of PHARSALIA, & both camps lay before each other: Pompey returned againe to his former determination, and the rather, becauſe he had ill ſignes and tokens of misfortune in his ſleepe. For he thought in his ſleepe that when he entred into the Theater, all the ROMAINES receiued him with great clapping of hands. Wherupon, they that were about him grew to ſuch boldneſſe and ſecuritie, aſſuring themſelues of victorie: that Domitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a brauerie contended betweene themſelues, for the chiefe Biſhopricke which Cæſar had. Furthermore, there were diuerſe that ſent vnto ROME to hire the neareſt houſes vnto the market place, as being the fitteſt places for Prætors, and Conſuls: making their account alreadie, that thoſe offices could not ſcape them, incontinently after the warres. But beſides thoſe, the young Gentlemen, and ROMAINE knights were maruellous deſirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with gliſtering gilt armors, their horſes fat and very finely kept, and themſelues goodly young men, to the number of ſeuen thouſand, where the Gentlemen of Cæſars ſide, were but one thouſand onely. The number of his footemen alſo were much after the ſame reckening. For he had fiue and fortie thouſand againſt two and twentie thouſand. Wherefore Cæſar called his ſouldiers together, and told them how Cornificius was at hand, who brought two whole legions, and that he had fifteene enſignes led by Calenus, the which he made to ſtay about MEGARA and ATHENS. Then he asked thē if they would tarie for that aide or not, or whether they would rather thēſelues alone venture battell. The ſouldiers cryed out to him, & prayed him not to defer battell, but rather to deuiſe ſome fetch to make the enemy fight aſſoone as he could. Thē as he ſacrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his army: the firſt beaſt was no ſooner ſacrificed, but his ſoothſayer aſſured him that he ſhould fight within three daies. Cæſar asked him againe, if he ſaw in the ſacrifices, any lucky ſigne, or token of good lucke. The ſoothſayer anſwered: For that, thou ſhalt anſwer thy ſelfe, better thē I can do: for the gods do promiſe vs a maruellous great change, & alteratiō of things that are now vnto another cleane contrary. For if thou beeſt well now, doſt thou think to haue worſe fortune hereafter? and if thou be ill, aſſure thy ſelfe thou ſhalt haue better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to viſit the watch, men ſaw a great firebrand in the element, all of a light fire, that came ouer Cæſars campe, and fell downe in Pompeys. In the morning alſo when they relieued the watch, they heard a falſe allarme in the enemies campe, without any apparant cauſe: which they cōmonly cal, a ſodaine feare, that makes men beſides themſelues. This notwithſtanding, Cæſar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to haue raiſed his campe from thence, and to haue gone towards the city of SCOTVSA: and his tents in his campe were alreadie ouerthrowne when his ſcoutes came in with great ſpeede, to bring him newes that his enemies were preparing themſelues to fight. Then he was very glad, and after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he ſet his men in battell ray, and deuided them into three ſquadrons, giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Caluinus, and the left wing vnto Antonius, and placed himſelfe in the right wing, chuſing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But ſeeing that againſt that, his enemies had ſet all their horſemen: he was halfe affraid when he ſaw the great number of them, and ſo braue beſides. Wherefore he cloſely made ſixe enſignes to come from the rereward of his battell, whom he had laid as an ambuſh behind his right wing, hauing firſt appointed his ſoldiers what they ſhould do, when the horſmen of the enemies came to giue them charge. On the other ſide, Pompey placed himſelfe in the right wing of his battell, gaue the left wing vnto Domitius, & the middle battell vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMANES knights (as we haue told you before) were placed in the left wing, of purpose to enuiron Cæsars right wing behind, and to giue their hotest charge there, where the generall of their enemies was: making their account, that there was no squadron of footmen how thicke soeuer they were, that could receiue the charge of so great a troupe of horsemen, and that at the first onset, they should ouerthrow them all, and march vpon their bellies. When the trumpets on either side did sound the alarme to the battell, Pompey commaunded his footmen that they should stand still without stirring, to receiue the charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherfore Cæsar afterwards said, that Pompey had committed a fowle fault, not to consider that the charge which is giuen rnnning with fury, besides that it giueth the more strength also vnto their blowes, doth set mens hearts also on fire: for the common hurling of all the souldiers that runne together, is vnto them as a boxe on the eare that sets men on fire. Then Cæsar making his battell march forward to giue the onset, saw one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skilfull in warre, in whome he had also great confidence) speaking to his souldiers that he had vnder his charge, encouraging them to fight like men that day. So he called him aloude by his name, and said vnto him: Well, Caius Crassinius, what hope shall we haue to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Crassinius casting vp his hand, answered him aloud: This day, ô Cæsar, we shall haue a noble victorie, and I promise thee ere night thou shalt praise me aliue or dead. When he had told him so, he was himselfe the formost man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, being about sixe score men, and making a lane through the foremost rankes, with great slaughter he entred farre into the battell of his enemies: vntill that valiantly fighting in this sort, he was thrust in at length in the mouth with a sword, that the point of it came out againe at his necke. Now the footmen of both battels being come to the sword, the horsemen of the left wing of Pompey, did march as fiercely also, spreading out their troupes, to compasse in the right wing of Cæsars battell. But before they began to giue charge, the sixe ensignes of footmen which Cæsar had laid in ambush behind him, they beganne to run full vpon them, not throwing away their darts farre off as they were wont to do, neither striking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to seeke to hit them full in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cæsar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty yong gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were vsed to see themselues hurt, and the which, being in the prime of their youth and beautie, would be affraid of those hurts, aswell for the feare of the present daunger to be slaine, as also for that their faces should not for euer be deformed. As indeed it came to passe, for they could neuer abide that they should come so neare their faces, with the points of their dartes, but hung downe their heads for feare to be hit with them in their eyes, and turned their backes, couering their face, because they should not be hurt. Then, breaking of themselues, they began at length cowardly to flie, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompeys armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to set vpon the squadron of the footmen behind, and slue them. Then Pompey seeing his horsemen from the other wing of his battell, so scattered and dispersed, flying away: forgat that he was any more Pompey the Great, which he had bene before, but rather was like a man whose wits the gods had taken from him, being affraid and amazed with the slaughter sent from aboue, and so retired into his tent speaking neuer a word, and sate there to see the end of this battell. Vntill at the length all his armie being ouerthrowne and put to flight, the enemies came, and got vp vpon the rampers and defence of his campe, and fought hand to hand with them that stoode to defend the same. Then as a man come to himselfe againe, he spake but this onely word: What, euen into our campe? So in hast, casting off his coate armour and apparell of a Generall, he shifted him, and put on such, as became his miserable fortune, and so stale out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrow, and how he had put himselfe into the hands of the ÆGYPTIANS, by whom he was miserably slaine: we haue set it forth at large in his life. Then Cæsar entring into Pompeys campe, and seeing the bodies layed on the ground that were slaine, and others also that were a killing, said, fetching a great sigh: It was their owne doing, and against my will. For Caius Cæsar, after he had wonne so many famous conquests, and ouercome so many great battels, had bene vtterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his armie. Asinius Pollio writeth, that he spake these words then in Latin, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and saith furthermore, that the most part of them which were put to the sword in the campe, were slaues and bondmen, and that there were not slaine in all at this battell, aboue sixe thousand thousand souldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, Cæsar did put many of them amongst his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, among whom Brutus was one, that afterwards slue Cæsar himselfe: and it is reported, that Cæsar was very sorie for him, when he could not immediatly be found after the battel, and that he reioyced againe when he knew he was aliue, and that he came to yeeld himselfe vnto him. Cæsar had many signes and tokens of victorie before this battell: but the notablest of all other that happened to him, was in the citie of TRALIES. For in the temple of victorie, within the same citie, there was an image of Cæsar, and the earth all about it very hard of it selfe, and was paued besides with hard stone: and yet some say that there sprang vp a palme hard by the base of the same image. In the citie of PADVA, Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothsayer, (a countriman and friend of Titus Liuius the Historiographer) was by chance at that time set to behold the flying of birds. He (as Liuie reporteth) knew the very time when the battell began, and told them that were present, euen now they giue the onset on both sides, and both armies do meete at this instant. Then sitting downe againe to consider of the birds, after he had bethought him of the signes: he sodainly rose vp on his feete, and cried out as a man possessed with some spirit, O Cæsar, the victorie is thine. Euery man wondring to see him, he took the crown he had on his head, and made an oath that he would neuer put in on againe, til the euent of his prediction had proued his art true. Liuie testifieth, that it came so to passe. Cæsar afterwards giuing freedome vnto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victorie which he wan in their countrey, he followed after Pompey. When he came into ASIA, he gaue freedome also vnto the GVIDIANS for Theopompus sake, who had gathered the fables together. He did release ASIA also, the third part of the tribute which the inhabitants paid vnto the ROMAINES. Then he came into ALEXANDRIA after Pompey was slaine: and detested Theodotus that presented him Pompeys head, and turned his head aside because he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his seale, and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he courteously vsed all Pompeys friends and familiars, who wandring vp and downe the countrey, were taken of the king of ÆGYPT, and wan them all to be at his commandement. Continuing these curtesies, he wrote vnto his friends at ROME, that the greatest pleasure he took of his victorie, was, that he daily saued the liues of some of his countrimen that bare armes against him. And for the warre he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not haue done it, but that he willingly did it for the loue of Cleopatra: wherein he wan litle honor, and besides did put his person in great danger. Others do lay the fault vpon the king of ÆGYPTS ministers, but specially on Pothinus the Eunuch, who bearing the greatest sway of all the kings seruants, after he had caused Pompey to be slaine, and driue Cleopatra from the court, secretly laid wait all the waies he could, how he might likewise kil Cæsar. Wherfore Cæsar hearing an inckling of it, began thenceforth to spend al the night long in feasting and banqueting, that his person might be in the better safetie. But besides all this, Pothinus the Eunuch spake many things openly not to be borne, onely to shame Cæsar, and to stirre vp the people to enuie him. For he made his souldiers haue the worst and oldest wheate that could be gotten: then if they did complaine of it, he told them they must be contented, seeing they eate at another mans cost. And he would serue them also at the table in treene and earthen dishes, saying, that Cæsar had away all their gold and siluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then raigned) did ow vnto him: which was, a thousand seuen hundred and fiftie Miriades, whereof Cæsar had before forgiuen seuen hundred and fiftie thousand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a million to pay his souldiers withal. Thereto Pothinus answered him, that at that time he should do better to follow his other causes of greater importance, and afterwards that he should at more leysure recouer his debt with the kings good will and fauour. Cæsar replied vnto him, and said, that he would not ask counsell of the ÆGYPTIANS for his affaires, but would be paid: and thereupon secretly sent for Cleopatra, which was in the country to come vnto him. She onely taking Apollodorus SICILIAN of all her friends, tooke a litle bote, and went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foot of the castle. Then hauing no other meane to come into the court without being knowne, she laid her self downe vpon a mattres or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tied & bound vp together like a bundle with a great leather thong, and so took her vp on his back, and brought her thus hampered in this fardle vnto Cæsar in at the castle gate. This was the first occasion (as it is reported) that made Cæsar to loue her: but afterwards, when he saw her sweete conuersation and pleasant entertainement, he fel then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her againe vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two ioyntly should raigne together. Vpon this new reconciliation,

a great feaſt being prepared, a ſlaue of Cæſars that was his barber, the fearfulleſt wretch that liued, ſtill buſily prying and liſtening abroad in euery corner, being miſtruſtfull by nature: found that Pothinus and Achillas did lie in wait to kill his maſter Cæſar. This being proued vnto Cæſar, he did ſet ſuch ſure watch about the hall, where the feaſt was made, that in fine, he ſlue the Eunuch Pothinus himſelfe. Achillas on the other ſide, ſaued himſelfe and fled vnto the kings camp, where he raiſed a maruellous dangerous and difficult war for Cæſar: becauſe he hauing then but a few men about him as he had, he was to fight againſt a great and ſtrong citie. The firſt danger he fell into, was for lacke of water he had: for that his enemies had ſtopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water vnto the caſtle. The ſecond danger he had, was, that ſeeing his enemies came to take his ſhips from him, he was driuē to repulſe that danger with fire, the which burnt the arſenall where the ſhips lay, and that notable librarie of Alexandria withall. The third danger was in the battell by ſea, that was fought by the tower of Phar: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by ſea, he leapt frō the peere into a boate. Then the Ægyptians made towards him with their oares on euery ſide: but he leaping into the ſea, with great hazard ſaued himſelfe by ſwimming. It is ſaid, that then holding diuers bookes in his hand, he did neuer let them go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head aboue water, and ſwam with the other hand, notwithſtanding that they ſhot maruellouſly at him, and was driuen ſometime to duck into the water: howbeit the bote was drowned preſently. In fine, the king comming to his men that made war with Cæſar, he went againſt him, and gaue him battell, and wan it with great ſlaughter, and effuſion of bloud. But for the King, no man could euer tell what became of him after. Thereupon Cæſar made Cleopatra his ſiſter, Queene of Ægypt, who being great with child by him, was ſhortly brought to bed of a ſon, whom the Alexandrians named Cæſarion. From thence he went into Syria, and ſo going into Asia, there it was told him that Domitius was ouerthrowne in battell, by Pharnaces the ſonne of king Mithridates, and was fled out of the Realme of Pont with a few men with him: and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victorie, was not contented with the winning of Bithynia and Cappadocia, but further would needes attempt to win Armenia the leſſe, procuring all thoſe Kings, Princes, and Gouernors of the prouinces thereabouts to rebell againſt the Romaines. Thereupon Cæſar went thither ſtraight with three legions, and fought a great battell with king Pharnaces by the citie of Zela, where he ſlue his armie, and draue him out of all the Realme of Pont. And becauſe he would aduertiſe one of his friends of the ſodainneſſe of this victorie, he onely wrote three words vnto Anitius at Rome: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I ſaw, I ouercame. Theſe three words ending all with like ſound, and letter in the Latin, haue a certaine ſhort grace, more pleaſant to the eare, then can be well expreſſed in any other tongue. After this, he returned againe into Italy, and came to Rome, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the ſecond time, which office before was neuer graunted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then was he choſen Conſull for the yeare following. Afterwards he was very ill ſpoken of, for that his ſouldiers in a mutinie hauing ſlaine two Prætors, Coſconius & Galba, he gaue them no other puniſhment for it, but in ſtead of calling them ſouldiers, he named them citizens, and gaue vnto euery one of them a thouſand Drachmaes a man, and great poſſeſſions in Italy. He was much miſliked alſo for the deſperate parts and madneſſe of Dolabella, for the couetouſneſſe of Anitius, for the drunkenneſſe of Antonius and Cornificius, which made Pompeys houſe be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not big inough for him, wherwith the Romaines were maruellouſly offended. Cæſar knew all this well inough, and would haue bene contented to haue redreſſed them: but to bring his matters to paſſe he pretended, he was driuen to ſerue his turne by ſuch inſtruments. After the battell of Pharſalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into Africke, king Iuba ioyned with them, and leauied a great puiſſant armie. Wherefore Cæſar determined to make war with them, and in the middeſt of winter, he tooke his iorney into Sicile. There, becauſe he would take all hope from his captaines and ſouldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very ſands by the ſea ſide, & with the next gale of wind that came, he took the ſea with 3. thouſand footmen, and a few horſemen. Then hauing put them a land, vnwares to thē, he hoiſed ſaile againe, to go fetch the reſt of his army, being afraid leaſt they ſhould meet with ſome daunger in paſſing ouer, and meeting them mid way, he brought them all into his camp. Where, when it was told him that his enemies truſted in an ancient Oracle, which ſaid, that it was predeſtined vnto the family of the Scipioes to be conquerours in Africke: either of purpoſe to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwiſe in good earneſt to take the benefite of this name (giuen

(giuen by the Oracle) vnto himselfe, in all the skirmishes and battels fought, he gaue the charge of his armie, vnto a man of meane qualitie and account, called Scipio Salutius, who came of the race of Scipio AFRICAN, and made him alwaies Generall when he fought. For he was eftsoones compelled to wearie and harrie his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had corne inough, nor his beasts forrage, but the souldiers were driuen to take sea weeds, called Alga: and (washing away the brackishnes thereof with fresh water, putting to it a litle herbe called dogs tooth) to cast it so to their horse to eate. For the NVMIDIANS (which are light horsemen, and very readie of seruice) being a great number together, would be on a sodaine in euery place, & spread all the fields ouer thereabout, so that no man durst peepe out of the camp to go for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were staying to behold an AFRICAN doing notable things in dauncing and playing with the flute: they being set downe quietly to take their pleasure of the view thereof, hauing in the meane time giuen their slaues their horses to hold, the enemies stealing sodainly vpon them, compassed them in round about, & slue a number of them in the field, and chasing the other also that fled, followed them pel mel into their camp. Furthermore, had not Cæsar himselfe in person, and Asinius Pollio with him, gone out of the campe to the rescue, and staid them that fled: the war that day had bin ended. There was also another skirmish where his enemies had the vpper hand, in the which it is reported, that Cæsar taking the ensigne bearer by the coller that caried the Eagle in his hand, staid him by force, and turning his face, told him: see, there be thy enemies. These aduantages did lift vp Scipioes heart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battell: and leauing Afranius on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hand, both their campes lying neare to other, he did fortifie himself by the citie of THAPSACVS, aboue the lake, to be a safe refuge for them all in this battel. But whilst he was busie intrenching of himself, Cæsar hauing maruellous speedily passed through a great countrey full of wood, by bypaths which men would neuer haue mistrusted: he stale vpon some behind, and sodainly assailed the other before, so that he ouerthrew them all, and made them flie. Then following this first good hap he had, he went forthwith to set vpon the camp of Afranius, the which he took at the first onset, and the camp of the NVMIDIANS also, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke 3. campes, and slue fiftie thousand of his enemies, and lost but fiftie of his souldiers. In this sort is set down the effect of this battell by some writers. Yet others do write also, that Cæsar selfe was not there in person at the execution of this battel. For as he did set his men in battel ray, the falling sickenesse took him, whereunto he was giuen, and therefore feeling it comming, before he was ouercome withall, he was caried into a castle not far from thence, where the battell was fought, and there tooke his rest till the extremitie of his disease had left him. Now for the Prætor and Consuls that scaped from this battel, many of them being taken prisoners, did kill themselues, and others also Cæsar did put to death: but he being specially desirous of all men els to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with al possible speed vnto the citie of VTICA, wherof Cato was Gouernor, by meanes whereof he was not at the battell. Notwithstanding being certified by the way that Cato had slaine himself with his own hands, he then made open shew that he was very sory for it, but why or wherefore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cæsar said at that present time: O Cato, I enuy thy death, because thou didst enuie my glorie to saue thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that he wrote afterwards against Cato being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitifull heart towards him. For how could he haue pardoned him, if liuing he had had him in his hands, that being dead did speake so vehemently against him? Notwithstanding, men suppose he would haue pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the clemencie he shewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and diuers others that had borne armes against him. Some report, that he wrote that booke, not so much for any priuate malice he had to his death, as for ciuill ambition, vpon this occasion. Cicero had written a booke in praise of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This book in likelihood was very well liked of, by reason of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent subiect thereof. Cæsar therewith was maruellously offended, thinking that to praise him, of whose death he was author, was euen as much as to accuse himself: and therefore he wrote a letter against him, and heaped vp a number of accusations against Cato, and intituled the booke Anticaton. Both these bookes haue fauorers vnto this day, some defending the one for the loue they bare to Cæsar, & others allowing the other for Catoes sake. Cæsar being now returned out of AFRIKE, first of al made an oratiō to the people, wherin he greatly praised & cōmended this his last victorie, declaring vnto them, that he had conquered so many countries vnto the Empire of ROME, that he could furnish the common-wealth yearely with two hundred thousand bushels of wheate, and twenty hundred thousand pound weight of oile. Then he made three triumphs, the one for Ægypt, the other for the kingdom of Pont, and the third for Afrike: not because he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whose son being likewise called Iuba, being then a yong boy, was led captiue in the shew of this triumph. But this his imprisonment fell out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous Nvmidian, by the study he fel vnto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckned one of the wisest historiographers of the Grecians. After these three triumphs ended, he very liberally rewarded his souldiers: and to currie fauour with the people, he made great feasts and common sports. For he feasted all the Romaines at one time, at two and twenty thousand tables, and gaue them the pleasure to see diuers sword-players to fight at the sharpe, and battels also by sea, for the remembrance of his daughter Iulia, which was dead long before. Then after all these sports, he made the people (as the maner was) to be mustered: & where there were at the last musters before, three hundred and twentie thousand citizens, at this muster onely there were but a hundred and fiftie thousand. Such miserie and destruction had this ciuil war brought vnto the common wealth of Rome, and had consumed such a number of Romaines, not speaking at all of the mischiefes and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of Italy, and to the other prouinces pertaining to Rome. After all these things were ended, he was chosen Consull the fourth time, and went into Spaine to make warre with the sonnes of Pompey: who were yet but very yong, but had notwithstanding raised a maruellous great army together, and shewed to haue had manhood and courage worthy to commaund such an armie, insomuch as they put Cæsar himself in great danger of his life. The greatest battell that was fought betweene them in all this war, was by the citie of Mvnda. For then Cæsar seeing his men sorely distressed, and hauing their hands full of their enemies, he ranne into the prease among his men that fought, and cried out vnto them: what, are ye not ashamed to be beaten and taken prisoners, yeelding your selues with your own hands to these yong boyes? And so, with all the force he could make, hauing with much ado put his enemies to flight, he slue aboue thirtie thousand of them in the field, and lost of his owne men a thousand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent, and told his friends, that he had often before fought for victorie, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safetie of his owne life. He wan this battell on the very feast day of the Bacchanalians, in the which men say, that Pompey the great went out of Rome, about foure yeares before, to begin this ciuill war. For his sonnes, the yonger scaped from the battell; but within few dayes after, Diddius brought the head of the elder. This was the last warre that Cæsar made. But the triumph he made into Rome for the same, did as much offend the Romaines, and more, then any thing that euer he had done before: because he had not ouercome Captaines that were strangers, nor barbarous Kings, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man in Rome, whom fortune had ouerthrowne. And because he had plucked vp his race by the rootes, men did not thinke it meete for him to triumph so for the calamities of his countrey, reioycing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alleage in his defence, vnto the gods and men, that he was compelled to do that he did. And the rather they thought it not meet, because he had neuer before sent letters nor messengers vnto the commō-wealth at Rome, for any victorie that he had euer won in all the ciuill warres; but did alwayes for shame refuse the glorie of it. This notwithstanding, the Romaines inclining to Cæsars prosperitie, and taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for thē to take breath a litle, after so many troubles and miseries as they had abidden in these ciuil warres: they chose him perpetuall Dictator. This was a plaine tyrannie: for to this absolute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraid to be deposed: Cicero propounded before the Senate, that they should giue him such honors as were meet for a man: howbeit others afterwards added too, honors beyond all reason. For, men striuing who should most honour him, they made him hatefull and troublesome to themselues that most fauoured him, by reason of the vnmeasurable greatnesse and honours which they gaue him. Thereupon it is reported, that euen they that most hated him, were no lesse fauorers and furtherers of his honors, then they that most flattered him: because they might haue greater occasions to rise, and that it might appeare they had iust cause and colour to attempt that they did against him. And now for himselfe, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did so honorably behaue himselfe, that there was no fault to be found in him: and therefore me thinkes amongst other honours they gaue him, he rightly deserued this, that they should build him a temple of clemencie, to thanke him for his courtesie he had vsed vnto them in his

his victorie. For he pardoned many of them that had borne armes against him, and furthermore, did preferre some of them to honor and office in the common-wealth: as amongst others, Cassius and Brutus, both the which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwne down, he caused them to be set vp againe: whereupon Cicero said then, that Cæsar setting vp Pompeys images againe, he made his owne to stand the surer. And when some of his friends did counsell him to haue a guard for the safetie of his person, and some also did offer themselues to serue him: he would neuer consent to it, but said, it was better to die once, then alwayes to be affraid of death. But to win himself the loue and good will of the people, as the honorablest guard and best safetie he could haue: he made common feasts again, and generall distributions of corne. Furthermore, to gratifie the souldiers also, he replenished many cities againe with inhabitants, which before had bene destroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaire vnto: of the which the noblest & chiefest cities were these two, CARTHAGE and CORINTH, and it chanced also, that like as aforetime they had bene both taken and destroyed together; euen so were they both set a foote againe, and replenished with people, at one selfe time. And as for great personages, he wan them also, promising some of them, to make them Prætors and Consuls in time to come, and vnto others, honors and preferments, but to all men generally good hope, seeking all the waies he could to make euery man contented with his raigne. Insomuch as one of the Consuls called Maximus, chancing to die a day before his Consulship ended, he declared Caninius Rebilius Consul only for the day that remained. So, diuers going to his house (as the maner was) to salute him, and to congratulate with him of his calling and preferment, being newly chosen officer: Cicero pleasantly said, Come, let vs make haste, and be gone thither before his Consulship come out. Furthermore, Cæsar being borne to attempt all great enterprises, and hauing an ambitious desire besides to couet great honors: the prosperous good successe he had of his former conquests, bred no desire in him quietly to enioy the fruites of his labors, but rather gaue him the hope of things to come, still kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterprises, and desire of new glorie, as if that which he had present were stale and nothing worth. This humour of his was no other but an emulation with himselfe as with another man, and a certaine contention to ouercome the things he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, and made preparation also, to make warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had ouercome them, to passe through HYRCANIA (compassing in the sea Caspium, and mount Caucasus) into the Realme of PONTVS, and so to inuade SCYTHIA: and ouerrunning all the countries, and people adioyning vnto high GERMANIE, and GERMANIE it selfe, at length to returne by GAVLE into ITALY, and so to enlarge the ROMAINE Empire round, that it might be euery way compassed in with the great sea Oceanum. But whilest he was preparing for this voyage, he attempted to cut the barre of the straight of PELOPONNESVS, in the market place where the citie of CORINTH standeth. Then he was minded to bring the riuers of Aniens and Tiber, straight from ROME, vnto the citie of CIRCEES, with a deepe channell and high banks cast vp on either side, and so to fall into the sea at TERRACINA, for the better safetie and commoditie of the merchants that came to ROME to traffick there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and seaw all the water of the marishes betwixt the cities of NOMENTVM and SETIVM, to make it firme land, for the benefite of many thousands of people: and on the sea coast next vnto ROME, to cast great high bankes, and to clense all the hauen about OSTIA, of rockes and stones hidden vnder the water, and to take away all other impediments that made the harborough dangerous for ships, and to make new hauens and arsenals meete to harbour such ships, as did continually trafficke thither. All these things were purposed to be done, but tooke no effect. But the ordinance of the Kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMAINES vsing then the auncient computation of the yeare, had not onely such incertaintie and alteration of the moneth and times, that the sacrifices and yearely feasts came by litle and litle to seasons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the reuolution of the Sunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMAINES themselues, onely the priests vnderstood it. And therefore when they listed, they sodainly (no man being able to controle them) did thrust in a moneth aboue their ordinarie number, which they called in old time, *Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first that deuised this way, to put a moneth betweene: but it was a weake remedie, and did litle helpe the correction of the errours that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cæſar committing this matter vnto the Philoſophers, and beſt expert Mathematicians at that time, did ſet forth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMAINES do vſe vntill this preſent day, and do nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithſtanding that enuied his greatneſſe, did not ſticke to find fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one ſaid, to morrow the ſtarre Lyra will riſe: Yea, ſaid he, at the commandement of Cæſar, as if men were compelled ſo to ſay and think, by Cæſars edict. But the chiefeſt cauſe that made him mortally hated, was the couetous deſire he had to be called King: which firſt gaue the people iuſt cauſe, and next his ſecret enemies, honeſt colour to beare him ill will. This notwithſtanding, they that procured him this honour and dignitie, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybiline prophecies, how the ROMAINES might ouercome the PARTHIANS, if they made warre with them, and were led by a king, but otherwiſe that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were ſo bold beſides, that Cæſar returning to ROME from the city of ALBA, when they came to ſalute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, and Cæſar alſo angrie, he ſaid he was not called king, but Cæſar. Then euery man keeping ſilence, he went his way heauy and ſorowfull. When they had decreed diuers honours for him in the Senate, the Conſuls and Prætors accompanied with the whole aſſembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was ſet by the pulpit for orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his abſence. But he ſitting ſtil in his maieſtie, diſdaining to riſe vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene priuate men, anſwered them: that his honors had more neede to be cut off then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people alſo, to ſee that he ſhould ſo lightly eſteeme of the Magiſtrates of the common wealth: inſomuch as euery man that might lawfully go his way, departed thence very ſorowfully. Thereupon alſo Cæſar riſing, departed home to his houſe, and tearing open his dublet coller, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his friends, that his throte was readie to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Notwithſtanding, it is reported, that afterwards to excuſe this folly, he imputed it to his diſeaſe, ſaying, that their wits are not perfit which haue this diſeaſe of the falling euill, when ſtanding on their feet they ſpeake to the common people, but are ſoone troubled with a trembling of their bodie, and a ſodaine dimneſſe and giddineſſe. But that was not true: for he would haue riſen vp to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his friends (or rather a flatterer) would not let him, ſaying: what, do you not remember that you are Cæſar, and will you not let them reuerence you, and do their duties? Beſides theſe occaſions and offences, there folowed alſo his ſhame and reproch, abuſing the Tribunes of the people in this ſort. At that time, the feaſt Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in old time, men ſay was the feaſt of ſhepheards or heard-men, and is much like vnto the feaſt of the LYCÆIANS in ARCADIA. But howſoeuer it is, that day there are diuers noble mens ſons, yong men, (and ſome of them Magiſtrates themſelues that gouerne then) which run naked through the citie, ſtriking in ſport them they meete in their way, with leather thongs, haire and all on, to make them giue place. And many noble women and gentlewomen alſo, go of purpoſe to ſtand in their way, and do put forth their hands to be ſtriken, as ſcholers hold them out to their ſchoolemaiſter, to be ſtriken with the ferula: perſwading themſelues that being with child, they ſhall haue good deliuerie; and alſo being barren, that it will make them to conceiue with child. Cæſar ſate to behold that ſport vpon the pulpit for orations, in a chaire of gold, apparelled in triumphant maner. Antonius who was Conſull at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy courſe. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at libertie, and he came to Cæſar, and preſented him a Diadeame wreathed about with laurell. Whereupon there roſe a certaine crie of reoycing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpoſe. But when Cæſar refuſed the Diadeame, then all the people together made an outcrie of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him againe, there was a ſecond ſhout of ioy, but yet of a few. But when Cæſar refuſed it againe the ſecond time, then all the whole people ſhouted. Cæſar hauing made this proofe, found that the people did not like of it, and thereupon roſe out of his chaire, and commanded the crowne to be caried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were ſet vp images of Cæſar in the citie, with Diademes vpon their heads, like kings. Thoſe, the two Tribunes, Flauius and Marullus, went and pulled downe: and furthermore, meeting with them that firſt ſaluted Cæſar as King, they committed them to priſon. The people followed them reioycing at it, and called them Brutes, becauſe of Brutus, who had in old old time driuen the kings out of ROME, and that brought the kingdome of one perſon, vnto the gouernement of the Senate and people. Cæſar was ſo offended withall, that he depriued Marullus and Flauius of their Tribuneſhips, and accuſing them, he ſpake alſo againſt the people, and called them Bruti, and Cumani, to wit, beaſts, and fooles. Hereupon the people went ſtraight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the firſt Brutus, and by his mother, of the houſe of the Seruilians, a noble houſe as any was in ROME, and was alſo nephew and ſonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithſtanding, the great honors and fauour Cæſar ſhewed vnto him, kept him backe that of himſelfe alone, he did not conſpire nor conſent to depoſe him of his kingdome. For Cæſar did not only ſaue his life, after the battell of PHARSALIA when Pompey fled, and did at his requeſt alſo ſaue many moe of his friends beſides: but furthermore, he put a maruellous confidence in him. For he had alreadie preferred him to the Prætorſhip for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Conſull the fourth yeare after that, hauing through Cæſars friendſhip obtained it before Caſſius, who likewiſe made ſute for the ſame: and Cæſar alſo, as it is reported, ſaid in this contention, Indeed Caſſius hath alleaged beſt reaſon, but yet ſhall he not be choſen before Brutus. Some one day accuſing Brutus while he practiſed this conſpiracie, Cæſar would not heare of it, but clapping his hand on his bodie, told them, Brutus wil looke for this skin: meaning therby, that Brutus for his vertue, deſerued to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions ſake, he would not ſhew him ſelfe vnthankfull or diſhonorable. Now they that deſired change, and wiſhed Brutus onely their Prince and Gouernour aboue all other: they durſt not come to him themſelues to tell him what they would haue him to do, but in the night did caſt ſundrie papers into the Prætors ſeate where he gaue audience, and the moſt of them to this effect: Thou ſleepeſt Brutus, and art not Brutus indeed. Caſſius finding Brutus ambition ſtirred vp the more by theſe ſeditious bils, did pricke him forward, and egge him on the more, for a priuate quarell he had conceiued againſt Cæſar: the circumſtance whereof, we haue ſet downe more at large in Brutus life. Cæſar alſo had Caſſius in great ielouſie, and ſuſpected him much: wherupon he ſaid on a time to his friends, what will Caſſius do, think ye? I like not his pale looks. Another time when Cæſars friends complained vnto him of Antonius and Dolabella, that they pretended ſome miſchiefe towards him: he anſwered them againe, as for thoſe fat men and ſmooth combed heads, quoth he, I neuer reckon of them: but theſe pale viſaged and carion leane people, I feare them moſt, meaning Brutus and Caſſius. Certainly, deſtinie may eaſier be foreſeene, then auoided: conſidering the ſtrange and wonderfull ſignes that were ſaid to be ſeene before Cæſars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and ſpirits running vp and downe in the night, & alſo the ſolitarie birds to be ſeene at noone daies ſitting in the great market place: are not all theſe ſignes perhaps worth the noting, in ſuch a wonderfull chance as happened? But Strabo the Philoſopher writeth, that diuers men were ſeene going vp and down in fire: and furthermore, that there was a ſlaue of the ſouldiers, that did caſt a maruellous burning flame out of his hand, inſomuch as they that ſaw it, thought he had bene burnt; but when the fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Cæſar ſelf alſo doing ſacrifice vnto the gods, found that one of the beaſts which was ſacrificed had no heart: and that was a ſtrange thing in nature, how a beaſt could liue without a heart. Furthermore, there was a certaine Soothſayer that had giuen Cæſar warning long time afore, to take heed of the day of the Ides of March, (which is the fifteenth of the moneth) for on that day he ſhould be in great danger. That day being come, Cæſar going vnto the Senate houſe, and ſpeaking merily vnto the ſoothſayer, told him, the Ides of March be come: So they be, ſoftly anſwered the Soothſayer, but yet are they not paſt. And the very day before, Cæſar ſupping with Marcus Lepidus, ſealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the boord: ſo talk falling out amongſt them, reaſoning what death was beſt: he preuenting their opinions, cried out aloud, death vnlooked for. Then going to bed the ſame night as his manner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windows and doores of his chamber flying open, the noiſe awoke him, and made him afraid when he ſaw ſuch light: but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being faſt aſleepe, weepe and ſigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable ſpeeches: for ſhe dreamed that Cæſar was ſlaine, and that ſhe had him in her armes. Others alſo do denie that ſhe had any ſuch dreame, as amongſt other, Titus Liuius writeth, that it was in this ſort: The Senate hauing ſet vpon the top of Cæſars houſe for an ornament, and ſetting forth of the ſame, a certaine pinnacle: Calpurnia dreamed that ſhe ſaw it broken downe, and that ſhe thought ſhe lamented and wept for it. Inſomuch that Cæſar riſing in the morning, ſhe prayed him if it were poſſible, not to go out of the doores that day, but to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate, vntill another day.

Predictions & foreſhewes of Cæſars death.

Cæſars day of his death prognoſticated by a Soothſayer.

The dreame of Calpurnia, Cæſars wife.

And if that he made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he would ſearch further of the Sooth-ſayers by their ſacrifices, to know what ſhould happen him that day. Thereby it ſeemed that Cæſar likewiſe did feare and ſuſpect ſomewhat, becauſe his wife Calpurnia vntill that time, was neuer giuen to any feare or ſuperſtition: and that then he ſaw her ſo troubled in mind with this dreame ſhe had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothſayers hauing ſacrificed many beaſts one after another, told him that none did like them: then he determined to ſend Antonius to adiorne the ſeſſion of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decius Brutus, ſurnamed Albinus, in whom Cæſar put ſuch confidence, that in his laſt will and teſtament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conſpiracie with Caſsius and Brutus: he fearing that if Cæſar did adiorne the ſeſſion that day, the conſpiracie would be betrayed, laughed at the Soothſayers, and reproued Cæſar, ſaying: that he gaue the Senate occaſion to miſlike with him, and that they might thinke he mocked them, conſidering that by his commandement they were aſſembled, and that they were ready willingly to grant him all things, and to proclaime him king of all the prouinces of the Empire of Rome out of Italy, and that he ſhould weare his Diadem in all other places both by ſea & land. And furthermore, that if any man ſhould tell them from him, they ſhould depart for that preſent time, and returne again when Calpurnia ſhould haue better dreames: what would his enemies and ill willers ſay, and how could they like of his friends words? And who could perſwade them otherwiſe, but that they would thinke his dominion a ſlauerie vnto them, and tyrannicall in himſelf? And yet if it be ſo, ſaid he, that you vtterly miſlike of this day, it is better that you go your ſelfe in perſon, and ſaluting the Senate, to diſmiſſe them till another time. Therewithall he tooke Cæſar by the hand, and brought him out of his houſe. Cæſar was not gone far from his houſe, but a bondman, a ſtranger, did what he could to ſpeak with him: and when he ſaw he was put back by the great preaſe and multitude of people that followed him, he went ſtraight into his houſe, and put himſelfe into Calpurniaes hands to be kept, till Cæſar came backe againe, telling her that he had greater matters to impart vnto him. And one Artemidorus alſo borne in the Ile of Gnidos, a Doctor of Rhetoricke in the Greeke tongue, who by meanes of his profeſſion was very familiar with certaine of Brutus confederates, and therefore knew the moſt part of all their practiſes againſt Cæſar: came and brought him a litle bill written with his owne hand, of all that he meant to tell him. He marking how Cæſar receiued all the ſupplications that were offered him, and that he gaue the ſtraight to his men that were about him, preſſed nearer to him, and ſaid: Cæſar, reade this memoriall to your ſelfe, and that quickly, for they be matters of great waight, and touch you nearely. Cæſar tooke it of him, but could neuer reade it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did ſalute him: but holding it ſtill in his hand, keeping it to himſelfe, went on withall into the Senate houſe. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was ſome man elſe that gaue him that memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to giue it Cæſar, but he was alwayes repulſed by the people. For theſe things they may ſeeme to come by chance: but the place where the murther was prepared, & where the Senate were aſſembled, and where alſo there ſtood vp an image of Pompey dedicated by himſelfe amongſt other ornaments which he gaue vnto the Theater: all theſe were manifeſt proofes that it was the ordinance of ſome god, that made this treaſon to be executed, ſpecially in that very place. It is alſo reported, that Caſsius (though otherwiſe he did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entred into the action of their traiterous enterpriſe, he did ſoftly call vpon it, to aide him: but the inſtant danger of the preſent time, taking away his former reaſon, did ſodainly put him into a furious paſſion, and made him like a man halfe beſides himſelfe. Now Antonius, that was a faithfull friend to Cæſar, and a valiant man beſides of his hands, him Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate houſe, hauing begunne a long tale of ſet purpoſe. So Cæſar comming into the houſe, all the Senate ſtood vp on their feete to do him honour. Then part of Brutus companie and confederates ſtood round about Cæſars chaire, and part of them alſo came towards him, as though they made ſute with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from baniſhment: and thus proſecuting ſtill their ſute, they followed Cæſar, till he was ſet in his chaire. Who, denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after another, becauſe the more they were denied, the more they preſſed vpon him, and were the earneſter with him: Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his hands, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the ſigne giuen the confederates to ſet vpon him. Then Caſca behind him ſtrake him in the necke with his ſword, howbeit the wound was not great nor mortall, becauſe becauſe it ſeemed, the feare of ſuch a diueliſh attempt did amaze him, and take his ſtrength from him, that he killed him not at the firſt blow. But Cæſar turning ſtraight vnto him, caught hold of his ſword, and held it hard, and they both cried out: Cæſar in latin, O vile traitor Caſca, what doeſt thou? And Caſca in Greek to his brother, Brother, help me. At the beginning of this ſtir, they that were preſent, not knowing of the conſpiracie, were ſo amazed with the horrible ſight they ſaw, they had no power to flie, neither to help him, nor ſo much as once to make an outcrie. They on the other ſide that had conſpired his death, cõpaſſed him in on euery ſide with their ſwords drawn in their hands, that Cæſar turned him no where, but he was ſtriken at by ſome, and ſtill had naked ſwords in his face, and was hacked & mangled among them, as a wild beaſt taken of hunters. For it was agreed among them that euery man ſhould giue him a wound, becauſe al their parts ſhould be in this murther: and then Brutus himſelf gaue him one wound about his priuities. Men report alſo, that Cæſar did ſtil defend himſelf againſt the reſt, running euery way with his body: but whẽ he ſaw Brutus with his ſword drawne in his hand, then he pulled his gowne ouer his head, and made no more reſiſtance, and was driuen either caſually or purpoſedly, by the counſel of the conſpirators, againſt the baſe whereupon Pompeys image ſtood, which ran all of a goare bloud till he was ſlaine. Thus it ſeemed, that the image tooke iuſt reuenge of Pompeys enemie, being throwne down on the ground at his feet, & yeelding vp his ghoſt there, for the number of wounds he had vpon him. For it is reported, that he had three and twentie wounds vpon his bodie: and diuers of the conſpirators did hurt themſelues, ſtriking one bodie with ſo many blowes. When Cæſar was ſlaine, the Senate (though Brutus ſtood in the middeſt amongſt them, as though he would haue ſaid ſomething touching this fact) preſently ranne out of the houſe, and flying, filled all the citie with maruellous feare and tumult. Inſomuch as ſome did ſhut too their doores, others forſooke their ſhops and ware-houſes, and others ranne to the place to ſee what the matter was: and others alſo that had ſeene it, ran home to their houſes againe. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cæſars chiefeſt friends, ſecretly conueying themſelues away, fled into other mens houſes, and forſooke their owne. Brutus and his confederates on the other ſide, being yet hot with this murther they had committed, hauing their ſwords drawne in their hands, came all in a troupe together out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made countenance to flie, but otherwiſe, boldly holding vp their heads like men of courage, and called to the people to defend their libertie, and ſtaid to ſpeake with euery great perſonage whom they met in their way. Of them, ſome folowed this troupe, and went amongſt them, as if they had bene of the conſpiracie, and falſly chalenged part of the honor with them: amongſt them was Caius Octauius, and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death, for their vaine couetouſnes of honor, by Antonius, and Octauius Cæſar the yonger: and yet had no part of that honor for the which they were both put to death, neither did any man beleeue that they were any of the confederates or of counſel with them. For they that did put them to death, took reuenge rather of the wil they had to offend, then of any fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutus & his confederats came into the market place to ſpeake vnto the people, who gaue thẽ ſuch audience, that it ſeemed they neither greatly reproued, nor allowed the fact: for by their great ſilence they ſhewed, that they were ſory for Cæſars death, and alſo that they did reuerence Brutus. Now the Senate granted generall pardon for all that was paſt, and to pacifie euery man, ordained beſides, that Cæſars funerals ſhould be honored as a god, & eſtabliſhed all things that he had done: and gaue certaine prouinces alſo, and conuenient honors vnto Brutus & his confederates, wherby euery man thought all things were brought to good peace and quietnes again. But when they had opened Cæſars teſtament, & found a liberall legacie of mony bequeathed vnto euery citizen of Rome, & that they ſaw his body (which was brought into the market place) al bemangled with gaſhes of ſwords: thẽ there was no order to keep the multitude & common people quiet, but they plucked vp formes, tables, and ſtooles, and laid them all about the body, and ſetting them afire, burnt the corſe. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the fire-brands, and went vnto their houſes that had ſlaine Cæſar, to ſet them afire. Other alſo ran vp and down the citie to ſee if they could meet with any of them, to cut them in peeces: howbeit they could meet with neuer a man of them, becauſe they had locked thẽſelues vp ſafely in their houſes. There was one of Cæſars friends called Cinna, that had a maruellous ſtrange & terrible dreame the night before. He dreamed that Cæſar bad him to ſupper, and that he refuſed and would not go: then that Cæſar took him by the hand, & led him againſt his wil. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cæſars body in the market place,

Caſca, the firſt that ſtrake at Cæſar.

Cæſar ſlaine, and had 23. wounds vpon him.

notwithstanding that he feared his dreame, and had an ague on him besides: he went into the market place to honour his funerals. When he came thither, one of the meane sort asked him what his name was? He was straight called by his name. The first man told it to another, and that other vnto another, so that it ranne straight through them all, that he was one of them that murthered Cæsar: (for indeed one of the traitors to Cæsar, was also called Cinna as himselfe) wherefore taking him for Cinna the murtherer, they fell vpon him with such furie, that they presently dispatched him in the market place. This stirre and furie made Brutus and Cassius more affraid, then of all that was past, and therefore within few daies after, they departed out of Rome: and touching their doings afterwards, and what calamitie they suffered till their deaths, we haue written it at large in the life of Brutus. Cæsar died at sixe and fiftie yeares of age, and Pompey also liued not passing foure yeares more then he. So he reaped no other fruite of all his raigne and dominion, which he had so vehemently desired all his life, and pursued with such extreame danger: but a vaine name onely, and a superficiall glorie, that procured him the enuy and hatred of his countrey. But his great prosperitie and good fortune that fauoured him all his life time, did continue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, pursuing the murtherers both by sea and land, till they had not left a man more to be executed, of all them that were actors or counsellers in the conspiracie of his death. Furthermore, of all the chances that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Cassius aboue all other, is most to be wondred at: for he being ouercome in battell at the iorney of Philippes, slue himselfe with the same sword, with the which he strake Cæsar. Againe of signes in the element, the great comet which seuen nights together was seene very bright after Cæsars death, the eighth night after was neuer seene more. Also the brightnesse of the Sunne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and shined not out, whereby it gaue but small heate: therefore the ayre being very cloudie and darke, by the weakenesse of the heate that could not come forth, did cause the earth to bring forth but raw and vnripe fruite, which rotted before it could ripe. But aboue all, the ghost that appeared vnto Brutus shewed plainely, that the gods were offended with the murther of Cæsar. The vision was thus: Brutus being readie to passe ouer his armie from the citie of Arydos, to the other coast lying directly against it, slept euery night (as his maner was) in his tent, and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires: (for by report he was as carefull a Captaine, and liued with as litle sleepe, as euer man did) he thought he heard a noise at his tent doore, and looking towards the light of the lamp that waxed very dim, he saw a horrible vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatnesse, and dreadfull looke, which at the first made him maruellously afraid. But when he saw that it did him no hurt, but stood by his bed side, & said nothing; at length he asked him what he was. The image answered him: I am thy ill Angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the citie of Philippes. Then Brutus replied againe, and said: Well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirit presently vanished from him. After that time, Brutus being in battell neare vnto the citie of Philippes, against Antonius and Octauius Cæsar, at the first battell he wanne the victorie, and ouerthrowing all them that withstood him, he draue them into yong Cæsars campe, which he tooke. The second battell being at hand, this spirit appeared againe vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereupon Brutus knowing that he should die, did put himselfe to all hazard in battell, but yet fighting could not be slaine. So seeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowne, he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre off, and there setting his swords point to his breast, fell vpon it, and slue himselfe: but yet, as it is reported, with the helpe of his friend that dispatched him.

THE COMPARISON OF
Alexander the great with Iulius Cæsar.

ENTRING into consideration of Alexander and Cæsar, it is an easie matter to speake, and much easier to proue, that they are two of the braueſt Chiefetaines of warre, that are to be noted in hiſtories: that their vertues out of warre are excellent, and haue great reſemblance together: that both of them were nobly borne, learned, eloquent, liberall, moderate, very louing to their friends and ſeruants, and wonderful much made of, and obeyed of Captaines and ſouldiers of their armies, and mercifull euen to their enemies: that euen from their youth they made good proofe of the future greatneſſe of their courages: that their exploites are altogether admirable: that they be two miracles for militarie diſcipline, whether a man doth looke into the ſhortneſſe of the time of their warres, and the countries which they haue paſſed through, as it were with the turning of a hand: or that they behold the enemies they haue ouercome, the townes and prouinces they haue conquered; their wiſedome, valour, and happineſſe, hauing neuer receiued repulſe, but alwayes carying victorie in their hands, and making valour their aduantage with an aſſured good direction. Both of them were in maruellous danger of their perſons; the one, in the citie of the MALLIANS; the other in SPAINE, againſt the ſonne of Pompeius. Both of them were by Soothſayers expreſly told of their death, whom they loued and reſpected. Both of them in the meane ſpace (as it were blindfold) did throw themſelues into danger, from the which men would haue withdrawne them. But he that will meerely conſider the life of either of them, ſhall find himſelfe in a field, whereof the eye cannot ſee the end, nor the diuerſe wayes obiect vnto it: but remaineth dazled, not knowing whither to point it, he ſeeth ſo many things at once before him. If he come to preferre the life of one before the other, he entreth into an Ocean of diſcourſe, and cannot tell which of the two he ſhould chuſe, nor to what port to go to diſcharge himſelfe of this man here, before the other there; yet to encourage ſome bodie to ſaile in this ſea, let vs row by the ſhore: and (to ſpeake plainely without figure) let vs ſee wherein the one doth paſſe the other, to leaue the Reader his free iudgement of that we will ſay. At this preſent I will in few words ſhew what may be obſerued moſt memorable, in the adoleſcencie of the one and of the other, of their exploits of warre, of their vices and vertues, of their death, and what followed after. I pleade firſt for Alexander, not mentioning his race, his beautie, nor the ſweetneſſe of his bodie, which they ſpeake of ſo much; all that being nothing worth in reſpect of vertue: his continencie vnto women, and for that he did moderately vſe the exerciſes of his bodie, doth ſo much the more condemne Cæſars exceſſe and frailtie of his youth, doing and ſuffering filthie things, not to be ripped vp any further. The ambition of Alexander came of a noble mind, as witneſſeth that he ſpake of the running at the games Olympicall, his diſcourſe with the Ambaſſadors of PERSIA, and the complaint he made to his companions, that his father would leaue him nothing to conquer. Whereas Cæſar after he had remained ſometime in NICOMEDIA and in GREECE, he caſt himſelfe into the armes of the common people at Rome, being bountifull, and making orations to gaine their hearts, ſuing for pettie offices finely to attaine to the greater. To conclude, taking a quite contrarie courſe vnto Alexander, who traced the great royall broade way to vertue, to become one day the honour of the world: ſo had he to his ſchoolemaiſter the learnedeſt man of all men, and ſhewed himſelfe indeed a moſt worthy diſciple of Ariſtotle. But Cæſar pricked forward by his naturall wit, and tyrannicall manners of his time, was poſſeſſed (in an vnluckie hower for him and his countrey) with the intollerable vice of ſelfe-will and ambition, which was cauſe of his death. The loue that Alexander bare from his infancie, vnto learning and learned men, makes him farre excell other Princes. The honour that he did vnto Homer the Poet, returned againe to himſelfe: how praiſe-worthy are his curteſies and liberalitie vnto Diogenes, Xenocrates, and others? To the contrarie, Cæſar neuer ſeemed to care for any man, but for himſelfe; or if he haue regarded ſome, or giuen gold and ſiluer by handfuls; it was but to gaine men, and by degrees to ſerue his turne, to raiſe him to that greatneſſe he aymed at, rather then for any other conſideration. Now as may be ſaid of the one and the other, he was,

In counſell wiſe: and valorous in fight.

And to ſpeake truly, it is their true and right title of honour, and the aduantage they haue of all thoſe that haue gone before them: let vs ſee if we can a litle in particular qualifie Alexander.

A ſturdie warrier, neuer fearing harmes,
And dreadfull to his enemies in armes:

As ſaith Æſchilus: for what was all his warre in Asia after the death of Philippus, but tempeſts, extreame heates, wonderfull deepe riuers, maruellous high mountaines, monſtrous beaſts for greatneſſe to behold, wild ſauage faſhions of life, change and alteration of Gouernors vpon euerie occaſion, yea treaſons and rebellions of ſome? At the beginning of his voyage, Greece did yet lay their heads together, for remembrance of the warres that Philippus made vpon them: the townes gathered together: Macedonia inclined to ſome change and alteration: diuers people farre and neare lay in waite to ſee what their neighbours would do: the gold and ſiluer of Persia flowing in the Orators purſes, and Gouernors of the people in euery towne did raiſe vp Peloponneſe: Philippus treaſure and coffers were emptie, and the debts were great. In deſpite of all theſe troubles, and in the middeſt of his pouertie, a yong man, but newly come to mans eſtate, durſt in his mind thinke of the conqueſt of Asia, yea of the Empire of the whole world, with thirtie thouſand footemen, and fiue thouſand horſe, or (as ſome other thinke) with fiue and fortie thouſand footmen, and fiue thouſand and fiue hundreth horſe, hauing to entertaine this warre in readie money, but two and fortie thouſand crownes, or (as Duris writeth) prouiſion of victuals and money but for thirtie dayes: howbeit he was furniſhed with magnanimitie, with temperance, with wiſedome, and valour; being more holpen in this marſhall enterpriſe, with that he had learned of his tutor Ariſtotle, then with that which his father Philippus had left him: he was armed with a iuſt quarrell againſt the Persians, ſworne enemies vnto Greece, vnto whom they had done infinite wrongs and iniuries: his magnanimitie and valiantneſſe appeared in all his fights, were it in a pitched field, or in aſſaults, and taking in of townes; neuer ſparing his perſon, hauing bene grieuouſly wounded in ſundrie fights: what valour ſhewed he in the citie of the Mallians, he himſelfe alone againſt ſo many barbarous people? With what conſtancie did he encourage his ſurgeons to plucke out a dart that ſtucke faſt in his breaſt? Let no man, ſaith he, be ſo faint-hearted nor cowardly; no, not if my life were in queſtion, I could not thinke that a man would beleeue I feared death, if he had any feeling or feare in my behalfe. Now for a man in twelue yeares ſpace and leſſe, to haue done theſe things, and to haue trauelled a conquerour the moſt part of the world, is a commendation paſſing mens vnderſtanding. Cæſar on the contrarie part, hauing made his preparations long before, happily found Craſſus to pay his debts he ought, to the end to corrupt the citie of Rome: and afterwards, hauing practiſed a dangerous league with Pompeius, he taketh armes and entreth into France, where his ſubtilties did him as good ſeruice as his armes: in the meane ſpace, he had his meanes, through whoſe aide, in the end he ouerthrew the whole ſtate of the common-wealth of Rome. Now Alexander is not ſo admirable, for that by his proweſſe he ouercame his enemies, as he was by his wonderfull wiſe and vertuous behauiour in the middeſt of his armes, where indeede he ſhewed himſelfe a perfect Philoſopher: whereof it is good to alleage ſome examples, that ſhall bring vs to the goodly diſcourſe of the vertues of this Prince, ſurpaſſing Cæſar in that reſpect.

Therefore

Therefore we may ſee his proweſſe accompanied with great iuſtice, a ſweet temperance, an excellent bountie, a goodly order and exquiſite wiſedome: directing all things by good diſcretion and ripe iudgement. In all his doings you ſhall hardly diſcerne, that is a deed of valour, that of humanitie, that of patience: but all his exploits ſeeme to be mingled and compounded of all the vertues together. Yet it is true, that alwaies in euery action, there is a vertue eminent aboue the others: but that pointeth them all to one end. In Alexanders actions they ſee, that his valiantnes is gentle, and his gentlenes valiant: his liberalitie, husbandrie, his choler ſoone downe, his loues temperate, his paſtimes not idle, and his trauels gracious. What is he that hath mingled feaſting with wars, and militarie expeditions with ſports? Who hath intermingled in the middeſt of his beſieging of townes: and in the midſt of skirmiſhes and fights, ſports, banquets, and wedding ſongs? Who was euer more enemy to thoſe that did wrong, nor more gracious to the afflicted? Who was euer more cruell to thoſe that fought, or more iuſt vnto ſuppliants? Let vs bring forth Porus wittie ſayings, who being brought priſoner before Alexander, and by him asked how he would be vſed: he anſwered: Like a king. So Alexander following on ſtill, asked him if he would ſay any thing more: No, ſaid he, for all is contained in that word onely. And ſo may they in all Alexanders deedes, to his friends and enemies, at the beginning and end of his life adde too this verſe:

Like a wiſe man.

How liued he? Like a wiſe man. How caried he himſelfe in all his exploits of warre? Like a wiſe man. How hath he conuerſed amongſt men openly and priuately? Like a wiſe man. He hath ſome faults in his behauiour, and we will not forget to ſpeake of them. But as all rules haue their exceptions, and yet therefore not to be taken away: and a pimple or wart ſhall not ſtaine the perfections of the face otherwiſe very faire. So Alexanders follies and imperfections cannot take away this honour from him, which wiſe men giue him. If we would here helpe our ſelues with examples, we ſhould write that which Plutarch hath ſo learnedly and briefly gathered out of ſo many good authors, who tooke pleaſure to do that in the life of Alexander, which they iudge Xenophon did in Cyrus: to wit, to ſet before all men the pattern of a prince complete in all vertues. And whereas Cæſar diſtained his life with a continuall violent deſire to ſubdue his countrie, committing a greater fault in his laſt warres, and towards the end of his life, then if he had lien with his owne mother: as alſo this damnable illuſion did torment him the night before he entred into Italie, to violate the liberty of Rome. Alexander was not pricked forward but by vertue it ſelf, to begin a iuſt warre worthy of a great king, not of purpoſe to ſet his feet vpon the throats of the Greekes, but to bring all the world to a peaceable and happy gouernment. His wars made the Greekes ſhed no teares. Cæſar filled all his country with fire and teares. Alexander keeping his ſouldiers vnder obedience, ſuffering none of them that followed him to commit any diſorders, he brought the barbarous people through the helpe of his friends to be ciuill. Cæſar vndid ſome of his friends, others forſooke him, he filled Rome with the inſolencie of his ſouldiers, and ſowed there the graines of infinite confuſions that came out of his bloud. But what hath bene the continencie of Alexander, to whom all things ſucceeded as he wiſhed? He would not ſee the Ladies that were priſoners, and through his temperance was aſmuch conquerour of their beauties, (notwithſtanding, he was in the flower of his age, and of a luſty complexion) as of the proweſſe of men by his valiantneſſe: yea he made leſſe account of thoſe women they ſhewed him, then of thoſe that he neuer ſaw. And where he was gracious to all ſorts of people, he ſhewed himſelfe as vntoward to them that were faire. How did he threaten Philoxenus, that would haue bought him two boyes of a Merchant of Tarentvm? And if he did loue Roxane and Statira, it was becauſe he would lawfully marie them, and for the good of his affaires: and not as Cæſar, that forgat himſelfe too much in thoſe matters. But furthermore, what praiſe deſerueth Alexander, that will not ſteale a victorie? O how noble is his courage, that would not accept Darius offers: but would needes haue Greece commaund Asia, as it was requiſite! What diligence vſed he in following of his enemie? and otherwiſe what compaſſion tooke he of the vnworthy death of him? how did he puniſh Beſſus? All his former behauiour ſheweth that he had a good and a true kingly mind in him: that he loued not traitors, nor treaſon, and would not ouercome but with honour. Cæſar indeed did purſue Pompeius, but he did not puniſh the murderers, till that he had diſcouered they conſpired againſt him. Now to make an end of that we haue to ſay for Alexander: we may gather out of the diſcourſe of his life, that the diuine prouidence made a preſent vnto this prince of the vertues moſt apparant in all the other noble GREEKES and ROMAINES: who beſides his pietie, iuſtice, & equitie, in his aduerſity he ſtrengthened himſelfe with hope: in proſperitie, enuironed with flatterers, he was not drunke with his greatnes, he did acknowledge he was mortall, and humbled himſelfe many waies: he is wonderfull patient, beareth the hard words of his familiars: he neither taketh pen nor ſword in hand to be reuenged of thoſe that offended him, thinking it a worthy thing in a king to ſuffer himſelfe to be blamed, and to heare ill to do good: ſhewing a hartie affection and great honour to his friends, euen for their ſakes to forbeare his owne neceſſarie cõmodities, to write vnto them familiarly, & to haue a ſpeciall care of their perſons, and of their affaires. He prouided his ſeruants pay of creditors ſixe millions of gold due for his ſouldiers. He ſent out of ASIA into GRECE the like ſum to build vp temples againe to to their gods, in place of thoſe which the PERSIANS had ouerthrowne. To conclude, in the middeſt of his affaires he ſhewed an aſpiring and inuincible valor: not being faint harted for any danger whatſoeuer. It is true that Cæſar in this caſe had many things cõmon with him, as we will tell you hereafter. This notwithſtanding Alexander alwaies kept himſelfe conſtant, and after ſuch a manner, that he followed not vice, nor did not ſeeme ſo much to blemiſh his goodly vertues as the other. Among other vices, they blame Alexander for drunkenneſſe and choler. I will neither excuſe the one nor the other in him: but as for this laſt, as there was neuer prince that would ſooner confeſſe his faults after he had done them, through this vehemencie of his, whereunto he was ſomwhat giuen by nature: it may be ſaid alſo that Clitus, Caliſthenes, and ſome others that felt the force of his anger, were the chiefe cauſe & motiue of it, and had brought the miſchiefe vpon thẽſelues. And to ſpeake the troth, there is no reaſon that a ſeruant much made of by his maſter, ſhold ſtand ſo highly vpon himſelfe, that he will beare nothing, but wilfully run his head againſt a ſtone which he might eaſily haue auoided, if he could but haue kept his toung, & giuen place to his fury that could preſently vndo him. Euery man wil condemne Alexander for his ill vſage of the INDIAN ſouldiers, comming out of a towne vpon his word giuen them. And as for the Philoſophers, it is a thing done wherof ſomwhat may be ſaid, wherein they ſhould haue bene more ſpare in their practiſes to haue done longer ſeruice to their country, and not to haue prouoked ſomuch a puiſſant and victorious enemy. And as for the nation of the COSSEIANS, that he did vtterly deſtroy thẽ for ſacrifice of the funerals of Hephæſtion: it is a great & vnexcuſable fault, what excuſe ſoeuer may be made for it. But the gracious entertainments he gaue Taxiles, & Porus, to ſo many nations ſubdued, to ſo many townes taken: the diuers & great honors he gaue vnto the captaines of his army, & the ordinarie courſe of his life wonderfull merciful, do ſomwhat ſalue the wounds of his choler not premeditated, & of his exceeding griefe & ſorow for his fauorites and familiars. The which we muſt diſtinguiſh frõ the ſtrange hatred that Cæſar hid in his heart, againſt all thoſe that hindred his doings, without regard of any man. And where he pardoned ſome before & after victory, it was but for his aduancement, not for any goodwill he bare thẽ: for in AFRICKE he put a great nũber of thẽ to death whom he ſuſpected, nay he ſpared not Cato himſelf after his death. As for the teares he ſhed taking Pompeius ſeale, refuſing to ſee the head of him, nor Theodotus that brought it him: & contrariwiſe, fauouring the ſeruants & friends of the dead, & writing goodly letters to ROME, which they call: Kiſsing of his dead enemy: his acts that went before, and followed after, may plainely ſhew, that all that was but a tragicomedy ceremoniouſly ended, although otherwiſe they had had ſo many matters to deale in together: that it was not poſſible but that ſome remainder of the ancient knowledge meeting then in the hart, ſhould ſtir vp ſome inward contrariety within: as alſo it hapneth to men of great courage, that contrarie paſſions do meete together, & do ſhew more without, then remaineth within. The wicked Theodotus deſerued no leſſe then Beſſus: but Cæſar was not Alexander, neither went he into ÆGYPT but for the aduancement of his affairs, which could not well be compaſſed but by the deſtruction of Pompeius: the which when he had obtained, made him forget his dutie openly. For Alexanders drunkenneſſe, ſome deſirous to excuſe it, alleage that he dranke not much, but was long at the table, and ſpent the time talking with his friends. As they tell of Cato VTICAN, that he ſate at the table with his friends al night long vntil the morning: wherof ſome ſaid that his buſines in the commonwealth was cauſe, which he followed al the day. This hindering him that he had no leiſure to go to his booke when night came, he took great delight to confer with learned men at his table. If Alexander after he had trauelled about ſo many affaires of the cõmonwealth, the which he wold neuer leaue vndone to follow his owne pleaſures, dranke ſomwhat liberally among his captaines, yea ſuppoſe that he exceeded meaſure more then once: yet will I not conclude that he made vſe

Alexanders vices, namely, choler and drunkenneſſe.

of it, and that he deſerued the name of a drunkard. I will not excuſe the fault he committed at the inſtance of Lais the curtiſan, nor the promiſe that he made of a priſe of ſixe hundred crowns to his Captaines, vnto him that could drinke moſt: for it is not in glaſſes and gobbets that men ſhould ſhew their ſtrength. But there died at this quaffing and carrouſing, one and forty of his Captaines. And as for himſelfe, truly he was too lightly led by Medius, to go drinke with him all night, and the next morning: whereupon he fell ſicke, and would not forbeare to drinke wine for all that, which caſt him into a feuer that left him not. For where they ſay he was poiſoned, it hath no likelihood of reaſon in it. Be it that this Prince did exceed in drinking, yet that notwithſtanding, wine muſt not drown nor bury ſo many excellent vertues that do ſhine in him in time of peace and warre. Cæſars intemperancie in his pleaſures, and his vnſatiable ambition, is an extremity without all compariſon more vehement and daungerous, then Alexanders choler or cuppe. And as for his death, as the countinuance and greatnes of his glory was pure and vnſpotted, free from enuie, during the ſtrength of his age whileſt he liued in this world: ſo after his death this glorie held out ſtill in the wonted manner, he being lamented of all his army, of all Greece and Europe. Many royall branches hauing ſprong from his ſouldiers, leauing the world in diuiſion to foure ſimple Captaines, whoſe iſſue after them haue continued many yeares in poſſeſſion of their parts. Whereas Cæſar to the contrarie, hauing with ſo great labour and trauell by many obſcure and oblique waies, attained to the height of a ſhamefull glorie, and which wan him the hatred of the chiefeſt members of the commonwealth: was immediatly caſt downe, litle lamented of thoſe that loued good lawes and the good of the eſtate, the which he left turmoiled with ciuill warres, and which began to make ſome ſhew againe vnder his nephew, whome the diuine prouidence (hauing regard to things much more excellent then either heauen or earth) had in his counſell determined to make him Monarch of the world. As to the contrarie, Alexander was happily ſtayed in Babylon, where he was told by the diuines, the wicked ſpirite hauing (according to the knowledge it pleaſed the iuſt iudge to giue him) coniectured and foretold ſomething of that, which God had long time before reuealed vnto his by his faithfull Prophet. But yet after Auguſtus, the Empire of Rome fell againe into new misfortunes, and was neuer but vnconſtant from that time forward, till in the end it ſunke vnder her owne waight. The like chaunced to Alexanders ſucceſſors, but not thorow his fault: and that makes the memorie of him more famous. Thus haue you all I can ſay for him. Let vs ſpeake ſomething of Iulius Cæſar alſo, not that I pretend to attaine to that which may be ſaid of him: for it would require a more ſufficient man then my ſelfe to performe that. But to make ſome compariſon with Alexander, whoſe deedes he chaunced one day to reade of in a booke, he fell a weeping, enuying the braue exploits of the other. Let vs therefore conſider if he haue done things that came neare, or did excell the other. Firſt of all, vnto all the noble acts that may be written of Alexander in his youth, I do obiect the worthy act of Cæſar againſt the pirats, which were more his priſoners then he theirs: vnto whom he paid raunſome in ſuch ſort, that he made them repent their folly that they euer medled with him. So that vpon land they found he was very round with them, as alſo their Iudge at ſea, though he were but a young man in their hands. That is but an example of the reſt of his life, who could abide no companion, and much leſſe a maiſter, as being borne to all great things, and delighting in nothing, but to be excellent in all the rareſt and higheſt things of the world: as his deedes did witneſſe, after he came to beare office in the commonwealth, euen to the end of his daies. Now albeit, his eloquence is no ſmall thing to be ſpoken of, which did him notable ſeruice in many troubleſome encounters: though it is a wonder to ſee the excellencie of his ſtyle, and grace, liuely to expreſſe all things in ſo fine and goodly tearmes, that the ſmootheſt Muſes neither would, nor could ſpeake more ſweetly then he: yet ſince we had rather ſtand vpon good deedes then faire words: let vs paſſe ouer this matter ſo much to ſupport Alexander: and let vs ſee whether it may be receiued for truth of all men of vnderſtanding: that Cæſar is the moſt excellent Captaine that euer was in the world. Albeit that Alexander had but ſmall means, yet he was Lord of a great kingdom: he had men and credit. But Cæſar without patrimonie of much worth, without money, and with few men, performed the greateſt things that may be thought of. Alexander had to do with women and children, if one compare the people he fought with, with thoſe whom Cæſar ouerthrew: not in fiue or ſixe battels, but in more then fiftie, very well ordered, where he was euer the weaker in number of men, but the greater in valour: neuer vanquiſhed, but euer victor: and was neuer hurt that I can tell of, though he would venture euen to his laſt, and let his fleſh go as freely as the meaneſt ſouldier of his legions. And yet in the meane time they ſhall find he was better ſtayed in his enterpriſes then Alexander, that like a ſwift running ſtreame, would run into any danger, which indifferently ioyneth with all that commeth againſt it. So he was in the heat of his age, and Cæſar entred into doings being a man of ripe iudgement, and well onwards in yeares. To ſay it is a great commendation for a generall in the field, headlong to put himſelfe into all dangers, making no difference betwixt himſelfe and a common ſouldier, that is ſomewhat too forward: and therefore therein I find Cæſar to be preferred before Alexander, onely for that he was not ſo forward without great neceſſity. So that his happineſſe defended him in all parts, as alſo for that Alexander ſeemed to haue ſought to be beaten. Shall I tell you that Cæſar killed a million of enemies, hath triumphed for a million of others, and hath made an innumerable number to flie? That in leſſe then ten yeares that the warre in Gavle endured, he wan eight hundred towns, and ſubdued three hundred nations? If I ſhould mention the warres he made in 15. yeares ſpace, it would aske a whole booke to ſpeake only but of the praiſes he deſerued. The Svvizzers, Germanes, Gavles, Romaines, Ægyptians, Africans, the Asians, and his fiue triumphs of ſo many enemies, ſo mightie, and in ſhew ſo inuincible, do approue his valor and ſufficiencie in all the parts requiſit in a chieftaine of war. His vertues and happineſſe being his tutors, he got about him a world of goodwils of certaine valiant Captaines and ſouldiers together, whom he ordered ſo well, that he made them ready to performe what he commaunded, and hauing ſuch an vnmatchable cariage towards them, he made them inuincible with him: and in the middeſt of his continuall troubles, he did reade, meditate, ſpake, wrote, and left behind him the goodlieſt booke that a martiall man, and one that entertaineth the Muſes, can deuiſe to take in his hands. His orations were a long time held in great reputation among the Romaines. And for his reſpect vnto men learned, valiant, and vertuous: Cæſar had renounced himſelfe, if he had ſhut his gate againſt ſuch men. The daungers Alexander paſſed thorow were great, but what were they in reſpect of Cæſars daungers, enuironed with ſo braue enemies, and in ſo great a number, as were the Gavles, and Pompeys followers? What foule parts haue bene played him by ſome of his owne people, and yet he weighed them not? But to the contrarie, he ſuffered ſome of them to runne what courſe they liked beſt: he ſent the cariage and goods to others: he alwaies reſpected and honoured his enemies, when they made no head againſt him. And by his friends he ſent reaſonable conditions vnto Pompey, before he would fight with him. Furthermore, when he entred into wars, being greatly in debt, and raiſed vp with hope hauing the chiefeſt in Rome his aduerſaries: he took vpon him to fight with all the enemies abroad, and to make his way in deſpite of the world to the ſoueraignty of Rome, the which he ſaw had need of a good maiſter, not of ſo many pettie Lords. His wonderfull foreſight ſerued him altogether in all occurrences, being neuer preuented in any thing he went about, but alwaies obtained more then he deſired. His magnanimitie weighed more, then any other vertue they could note in him: which is as much as if one would ſay, that Cæſar outweighed all the other Captaines of the Greekes and Romaines: he was almoſt at all the battels in the wars where he commaunded, he was neuer beaten but in his Lieutenants. For the skirmiſh in the which Pompey on a time had the better, it is not worth the ſpeaking of it: becauſe he could not tell how to follow his victorie. And it is a ſingular direction, fauoured with a moſt rare happineſſe: that amongſt ſo many blowes giuen, Cæſar neuer had one giuen him. If he found fauour of Craſſus before he went to the warres, that cannot be imputed any blame to him: ſince he alwaies payed his friends well, and brought his enemies to reaſon, though they ſet againſt him.

The vertues and perfections of Cæſar both in war and peace.

If iuſtice accompanieth the proweſſe of Alexander, if he haue vſed moderation, gentleneſſe, and humilitie in his victories, if he ſhew himſelfe wiſe and circumſpect in his purpoſes: what ſhall be ſaid of Cæſar then? whoſe gentleneſſe is ſo much ſpoken of, that men iudge that that was one of the occaſions of his death. His paſtimes were very ſerious: and after he beganne to deale in affaires, he neuer played but in good earneſt, and yet would he neuer looſe his times of recreation, and his pleaſant talke and communication with his friends and familiars. But in the middeſt of his victories, how did he vſe his enemies, and thoſe that ſet themſelues againſt him? He was a lightening of warre, that ouerthrew all that durſt withſtand him: and he neuer medled with any that yeelded without reſiſtance. He is faithfull, wiſe, valiant, and couragious, and did not allow all kind of meanes to obtaine victorie: although more then once he might haue ſewed (as they ſay) the caſe of the Foxe, with the skinne of the Lyon.

But

But yet he followed in good time his predeceſſors, although he did finely aſſault the moſt part of his enemies, and deſtroyed the one by the other. Cæſars ambition was very extreame, but he couered it in another maner of ſort then Alexander did: who paſſing ouer a riuer let fall certaine wordes, plaine enough, that he ſought the praiſe of the ATHENIANS. And the falſe inuentions to make the glorie of his name to continue for euer amongſt the INDIANS, do not they diſcouer a moſt groſſe vanitie, which did but labour after that which it could not attaine? But Cæſar deſired earneſtly, and touched the end of his intentions. His proweſſe is wonderfull gracious, and his gentleneſſe graue and valiant: his liberalitie ſo great, that to thinke what he ſhould giue was more, then the gift it ſelfe how great ſoeuer. Alſo he gathered no riches together in the warres, to liue afterwards in deliciouſneſſe at his pleaſure: it was a reward of vertue that he locked vp, to recompence men of valure, and to leaue good ſouldiers a meane to liue by honeſtly at home, when age and their wounds did conſtraine them to leaue warres. He was neuer wearie of any trauell more then Alexander: and gaue not himſelfe to ſo much eaſe, though he was elder, ſlenderer, and thinner of bodie, and ſubiect to the falling ſickneſſe: but he hardened himſelfe againſt it by continuall exerciſe of his bodie and mind, accompanied with an incredible quickneſſe and diligence. He hauing left FRAVNCE, and running after Pompeius to BRVNDVSIVM: he ſubdued all ITALIE in leſſe then three weekes, returned againe from BRVNDVSIVM to ROME, from whence he went to the heart of SPAINE, where he ouercame extreame hardneſſe in war the againſt Afranius and Petreius, and at the long ſiege of MARSEILLES. Frō thence he returned into MACEDONIA, wan the battel of PHARSALIA, and followed Pompeius into ÆGYPT, which he ſubdued alſo. After that he came into SYRIA, and into the kingdome of PONT, where he fought with Pharnaces: from thence into AFRICKE, where he ouercame Scipio and Iuba. Afterwards he returned againe through ITALIE and SPAINE, and there ouercame the ſonne of Pompeius. Now weigh therewithall the trauels, fights, conqueſts and expeditions of Alexander: then ſay plainely, what you thinke of it: Cæſar caried it by much. The only wars of the GAVLES haue bene more ſharpe and dangerous, then all the conqueſts of ASIA and the INDIANS. For it is not in paſſing ouer mountaines and riuers ill guarded, that ſhewes the deedes of men: it is to ouercome a ſubtill and puiſſant enemie. But I pray you, theſe words of Cæſar to the Maiſter of the Brigantine (who vnleſſe they had known him, would haue paſſed him from APOLLONIA to BRVNDVSIVM) were they not more ſwelling then the ſea it ſelf? Courage my friend, ſaid he, ſaile hardily: for thou carieſt Cæſar & his fortune. And that which he ſaid paſſing ouer the riuer of Rubicon, to enter into ITALIE: A man can be but once vndone: what a courage did he ſhew in that? Truly a mind, that from thence did behold death, and cared for no more, but for the execution of his counſels. If a man obſerue the directions of Alexander in his exploits: what is that in reſpect of the wiſedome of Cæſar? being wont to ſay, he loued victorie gotten by counſell more then by force. I know that Alexander was adorned with moſt excellent vertues, and hurt with very few knowne vices. For therein it ſeemeth he hath lattiſed vp Cæſar, and many others of the chiefeſt in the GREEKE and ROMAINE hiſtorie: although I cannot diſſemble alſo, that he was led by flatterers and women too: witneſſe that which he did at the inſtigation of Lais and of his minions. Alſo that his deedes were but wind: dangerous vices in all men, but eſpecially in princes: from which Cæſar kept himſelfe with better vnderſtanding. But if we bring in ſhew the good vnderſtanding, the ſpirit, the iudgement, the conduct, the profound knowledge, the eloquence, the hardineſſe, the greatneſſe of courage, the more then humane boldneſſe in the middeſt of the greateſt dangers: the trauels, the paines, the bountie, the gentleneſſe, the curteſie, the liberality, and the good fortune of Cæſar: we ſhall haue enough to ſpeake of. They obiect this againſt him: that among the Senators and others which tooke Pompeius part, he ſpared them that could not much hurt him: and others whom he thought he could not gaine, he ouercame thē in AFRICKE. But Brutus, Caſſius, and his adherents ſhew, that Cæſar ſought nothing elſe but to carie himſelfe graciouſly, if his ill-willers would haue let him alone. And ſure it is very likely, that if they had borne with him but a while longer, matters had not gone on with ſuch a violent courſe as they did after his death: but the eſtate of ROME had bene gouerned with better pollicie, and the ambition of this great perſon hauing attained his deſire, had bene ſatisfied, and would haue fallen of himſelfe. For whereas he did leane to the flatteries of Balbus and Antonius, to diſdaine the Senat, and to couet the markes and ſignes of royall dignitie: theſe were but the blaſts of this wicked wind, which ſuch dangerous bellowes entertained and kept in his hart. Now in this he cannot be Cæſars vices.

excuſed. On the contrary ſide, they cannot too much condemne this paſſion of his, which ſufficiently appeared in the firſt voyage he made into SPAINE: when paſſing by a pelting village, he preferred the firſt place in that to the ſecond in ROME. This paſſion increaſed in him euer after, ſo mightily ouerruling all the reſt, & ſo abſolutely poſſeſſing his mind, that it caried him whither it would, and made him that without reſpect of his country or of himſelfe he neuer left running, vntill that this fierce horſe caſt him on the ground and brake his necke. Yea ſo many victories and triumphs drew him not for all that to ſeeke reſt: but (as Alexander ſailed vp & downe the Ocean, during his laſt ſickneſſe, and ſome hours before his death) he embraced greater wars & conqueſts then before. For that he did in reforming the Kalender, and the enterpriſe of ſo many buildings and works for the commonwealth, ſheweth that that mind was a bow euer bent. For his voluptuouſnes, peraduenture it will not become vs to ſpeake of them, & we were better with ſilence and ſhame lament mans imperfection, then in deſcrying of noble perſons, content thoſe that are neuer merrie, but when one feedeth their malice. The ambition wherewith he was infinitly wounded, comming to fight with this wickedneſſe after women, made him quickly leaue the haunt vtterly to ſubdue it afterwards: to the end that his pleaſures ſhould neuer make him ſteale a minute of an hower, nor to remoue one foot from the occaſions offered him to raiſe him to greatneſſe. As for his death, it was violent indeed, but practiſed by the moſt part of them to whom he had giuen life, and who continued not long after him. It is true, his high cariage of himſelfe was cauſe of his death: for nothing wanted to his happineſſe, but to loue his city, and to continue to be more carefull then he was to pleaſe the Senate and people, as he had begun after his fiue triumphes, pardoning all, raiſing one and other to offices in the commonwealth, and ſetting vp againe the ſtatues of Pompey. Now being fallen againe into this deſperate deſire to be yet greater, he made ſo many offended with him, that diuers put that in execution, which one man alone could not eaſily haue brought to paſſe. But yet he hath that more then Alexander, that his death was reuenged. To the contrarie, Alexanders mother, wiues, and children made a poore end; his armie remained as a bodie without a head, and he had a good grace that compared it to Cyclope Polypheme, when Vlyſſes had put out his eye. His Captaines and ſucceſſors deuoured one another by long warres. As for Cæſar, he liued ſtill in the perſon of his ſucceſſor Auguſtus, who hauing ouercome a world of hard aduentures, eſtabliſhed a Monarchie: the which in deſpite of a million of tempeſts, hath continued many hundreds of years. And ſpecially the name of Cæſar, by excellent priuiledge hath remained vnto thoſe that after him raigned in the Empire of ROME: and his valiantneſſe was, and yet is to this day deſired of all men, that by valorous exploits ſeeke to winto their name immortal praiſe and glorie. You looke here, Reader, to ſee to which of the two I ſhold giue the precedencie: but ſince the world hath bene too litle for the one and the other, I ſhould go too farre if I plainely ſpake what I thought. Now that I haue ſpoken for the other, I ceaſe, and leaue you to your iudgement.

Cæſars death, and of the ſtate of Rome vnder Auguſtus and afterwards.

Phocion.

THE Orator Demades on a time flouriſhed in ATHENS, becauſe in all his doings and ſayings in the adminiſtration and gouernement of the common wealth, he alwayes fauored the MACEDONIANS and Antipater: in reſpect whereof he was eftſoones compelled, both in his counſell and lawes, to preferre many things to the diſhonour of his city, ſaying, that they muſt pardon him, becauſe he gouerned the ſhipwracks of his country. This was an arrogant ſpeech: but yet referring it to the gouernment of Phocion he ſayd truly. For indeed Demades ſelfe was the ſhipwracke of the commonweale, becauſe he liued ſo inſolently, and gouerned ſo lewdly. Inſomuch as Antipater ſayd of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beaſt ſacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion, which had to fight againſt the cruell and bitter enemy of the time, were ſo obſcured by the calamities of GREECE, that his fame was nothing ſo great as he deſerued. For we muſt not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it ſelfe but weake, in theſe verſes:

Demades arrogant ſaying.

When ſtormes of ſore aduerſities (ô king) do men aſſaile,
It daunts their courage, cuts their combes, and makes their harts to quaile.

But we muſt onely giue place to fortune, who when ſhe frowneth vpon any good and vertuous man, her force is ſo great, that where they deſerue honour and fauour, ſhe violently heapeth falſe and malicious accuſations againſt them, which maketh their vertue lame, and not of that credite which indeed it deſerueth. And yet it ſeemeth to many, that free cities are moſt cruell vnto their good citizens in time of proſperity: becauſe they flow in wealth and liue at eaſe, which maketh them of haughty minds. But it is cleane contrary. For aduerſity commonly maketh mens maners ſower, cholericke, and very haſty: beſides, ſlow to heare, churliſh, and offended with euery litle ſharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, ſeemeth to caſt their aduerſity in their teeth: and he that telleth them plainly of their faults, ſeemeth alſo to deſpiſe them. For like as hony ſweete by nature, applied vnto wounds, doth bring both ſmart and paine: euen ſo, ſharpe words, though profitable, do bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with diſcretion and courteſie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth ſweete and pleaſant things μειλιχια, as yeelding, and not ſtriuing with contrariety, againſt that part of the mind, whereby we be angry

The power of vertue and fortune.

Aduerſity maketh men haſty.

and froward. For euen as ſore eyes do like to looke on blacke and darke colours, and cannot abide the bright and glaring: ſo in a city, where for want of foreſight and gouernment, things go not well, men be ſo diuerſe and vnwilling to heare of their owne fault and eſtate, that they had rather continue in their folly and danger, then by ſharpneſſe of words to be rebuked & reſtored. So that it being impoſſible to amend one fault with a greater, that comonwealth muſt be in great danger, that when it hath moſt need of helpe, is lotheſt to receiue any: and he alſo hazardeth himſelfe, that plainly telleth them their faults. Like as therefore the Mathematician ſaith, that the Sun doth not altogether folow the motion of the higheſt heauen, nor yet is moued directly contrary, but fetching a cõpaſſe a litle ouerthwart, maketh and oblique circle, and by variety of approching and departing preſerueth all things, and keepeth the world in good temperature. Euen ſo, too ſeuere gouernment, contrarying the peoples minds in all things, is not good: as alſo it is maruellous dangerous, not to correct offenders when they offend, for feare of the peoples diſpleaſure. But the meane, ſometime to yeeld vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to graunt them things of pleaſure, to demand of them againe things profitable: that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentle meanes they are brought to do many profitable things, when they ſeeke it not of them, by rigor and authority. Indeed this meane is very hard to be obſerued, becauſe authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meete together, there is no harmony more muſical, nor concordance more perfect then that: & therfore it is ſaid, that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary, then a forced obedience in men. But this fault of ſeuereneſſe was in Cato the yonger, for he could not faſhion himſelfe to the peoples maners, neither did they like his: neither did he win his eſtimatiõ in the comonwealth by flattering of them. And therfore Cicero ſayd, that he was put by the Conſulſhip, for that he behaued himſelfe as though he liued in the comonwealth deuiſed by Plato, & not amongſt the diſordered and corrupt poſterity of Romulus. Me thinketh I can liken him properly vnto vntimely fruit: the which though men do take pleaſure to ſee and wonder at, yet they eate them not. Euen ſo, the ancient ſimplicity of Catoes maner (hauing ſo long time bene out of vſe, & comming then to ſhew it ſelfe in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was indeed much praiſe worthy: but yet not the conuenienteſt, nor the fitteſt for him, becauſe it aunſwered nor reſpected not the vſe and maners of his time. For he found not his countrey (as Phocion did vtterly deſtroyed, but toſſed in a dangerous tempeſt: & being not of authority like the pilot to take the ſterne in hand, and gouerne the ſhip: he tooke himſelfe to tricking the ſailes, & preparing the tackle, ſo to aſſiſt men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he ſo thwarted fortune (which ſeemed to haue ſworne the ouerthrow of the ſtate of ROME) that with much ado, with great difficulty, & a long time after, ſhe executed her malice. And yet the common wealth had almoſt gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato and his vertue: with whom I do compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion were not in all things alike, neither in their honeſty, nor pollicy of gouernment. For there is difference betwixt manhood and manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades, and that of Epaminondas: betwixt wiſdome and wiſedome, as betwixt that of Ariſtides, & that of Themiſtocles: and betwixt iuſtice and iuſtice, as betwixt that of Numa and that of Ageſilaus. But the vertues of theſe men (to him that ſhall ſuperficially regard, and lightly conſider them) ſeeme all one in quality, in maner, and vſe, both alike in temperance of curteſie with ſeuerity, and manhood with wiſdome: a valiant care for others, with preſence of courage & ſecurity of mind for themſelues, abhorring all filthineſſe & corruption, and imbracing conſtancy and loue of iuſtice: that for any man to diſcerne the difference betweene them, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgement. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble houſe, as we will ſhew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I geſſe he came of no baſe parentage. For if he had bene the ſon of a ſpoonmaker, as Idomeneus teſtifieth, Glaucippus the ſon of Hyperides, hauing in an inuectiue he wrote againſt him, rehearſed all the miſchiefes he could of him, he would not haue forgotten to haue vpbraided him with his baſe parentage, neither he himſelfe alſo (if that had bin true) had bene ſo well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a young man, he was Platoes ſcholer, and afterwards Xenocrates ſcholer, in the ſchoole of Academia: and ſo, euen from his firſt beginning, he gaue himſelfe to follow them that were learned. For as Duris writeth, neuer ATHENIAN ſaw him weepe nor laugh, nor waſh himſelfe in any common bath, nor his hands out of his ſleeues when he wore a long gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alwayes go on foote, and neuer wore gowne, vnleſſe it were extreme cold: and then the ſouldiers

to mocke him withall, would say it was a signe of a sharpe winter, when they saw Phocion in his gowne. Now, though indeed he was very courteous and gentle of nature, yet he had such a grimme looke withall, that no man had any desire to talke with him, but such as were of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator one day mocking him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My maisters, quoth Phocion, the bending of my browes hath done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of these flatterers, haue made ye oftentimes to weepe. Furthermore, his manner of speech was very profitable, for the good sentences and counsels he vttered: but it was mixed with an imperious, austere, and bitter shortnesse. For as Zeno the Philosopher saith, that the wise man should temper his words with wit and reason, before he vtter them: euen so was Phocions speech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it seemeth that Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN sayd, that Demosthenes was an excellent Orator, but in speech Phocion was very witty. For like as coines of gold or siluer, the lighter they weigh, the finer they be of goodnesse: euen so the excellency of speech consisteth in signifying much by few words. And touching this matter, it is reported that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked all alone vpon the scaffold where the players played, and was in a great muse with himselfe: whereupon, one of his friends seeing him so in his muses, sayd vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy mind is occupied about somewhat. Indeed it is so sayd he: for I am thinking with my selfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I haue to say to the people. For Demosthenes selfe litle esteeming all other Orators, when Phocion rose vp to speake, he would round his friends in the eares, and told them: See, the cutter of my words riseth. Peraduenture he meant it by his maners also: For when a good man speaketh, not a word onely, but a winke of an eye, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall words and speeches of Rhetoricians. Furthermore, when he was a yong man, he went to the warres vnder Captaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfect souldier, and in recompence thereof, he reformed many of his Captaines imperfections, & made him wiser then he was. For Chabrias otherwise being very dull and slothfull of himselfe, when he campe to fight, he was so hot and couragious, that he would thrust himselfe into danger, with the desperatest persons: and therefore for his rashnesse, it afterwards cost him his life, in the city of CHIO, where lanching out with his galley before the rest, he pressed to land in despite of his enemies. But Phocion being wise to looke to himselfe, and very quicke to execute: on the one side quickned Chabrias slowenesse, and on the other side also, by wisdome cooled his heat and fury. Chabrias therfore, being a good man and courteous, loued Phocion very well, and did preferre him in matters of seruice, making him famous amongst the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardest enterprises. For by his meanes he atchieued great fame and honor in a battell by sea, which he wanne by the Ile of NAXOS, giuing him the left wing of his army, on which side the fight was sharpest of all the battell, and there he soonest put the enemies to flight. This battell being the first which the city of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken: gaue the people cause to loue Chabrias, and made them also make account of Phocion, as of a noble souldier, and worthy to haue charge. This victory was gotten on the feast day of the great mysteries, in memory whereof Chabrias did yearely on the sixteenth day of the moneth Boedromion (now called August) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time Chabrias sending Phocion to receiue the tribute of the Ilanders their confederates, and the ships which they should send him: he gaue him twenty galleys to bring him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) sayd vnto him: If he sent him to fight with his enemies, he had need to haue more ships: but if he sent him as an Ambassador vnto his friends, then that one ship would serue his turne. So he went with one galley onely: and after he had spoken with the cities, and courteously dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furnished of their confederates, with a great fleete of ships and money, to cary vnto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely reuerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death also he tooke great care of his friends and kinsmen, and sought to make his sonne Ctesippus an honest man: whom though he saw very wild and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is sayd also, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine friuolous questions, seruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counsell, to reproue him, and to teach him the duty of a Captaine: he could not but say, O Chabrias, Chabrias: now do I pay for the loue thou diddest beare me when thou wert aliue, in bearing with the folly of thy ſonne. But when he ſaw that the heads of the city of ATHENS had as it were by lot deuided among themſelues the offices of warre and peace, and that ſome of them, as Eubulus, Ariſtophon, Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, and Hyperides were common ſpeakers and preferrers of matters in councels and Senate: and that others, as Diopithes, Meneſtheus, Leoſthenes, and Chares, became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of gouernment of Pericles, Ariſtides, and Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them ſeemed (as the Poet Archilochus ſayth:)

To be both champions ſtout, of Marſes warlike band,
And of the Muſes eke, the arts to vnderſtand.

He knew alſo, that Pallas the goddeſſe and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica: to wit, skilfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, hauing thus diſpoſed of himſelfe in gouernment, he alwayes perſwaded peace and quietneſſe, and yet was often choſen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time, did neuer ſue for charge, neither yet refuſed it at any time, when he was called to ſerue the commonwealth. It is certaine that he was choſen fiue and forty times Prætor, and was alwayes abſent at the elections, but yet ſent for. Whereupon all the wiſe men wondred to ſee the manner of the people towards him, conſidering that Phocion had neuer done nor ſayd any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had bene againſt their deſires: and how they vſed other gouernours notwithſtanding, that were more pleaſant and delightfull in their orations, like men to ſport at, as it is ſayd of kings, who after they haue waſhed their hands to go to their meate, do vſe to haue leſters and flatterers to make them merry: but on the other ſide when they had occaſion of wars indeed, how then like wiſe men they would bethinke themſelues, and choſe the wiſeſt and ſtouteſt man of the city, and that moſt would withſtand their minds and deſires. For on a time an Oracle of Apollo Delphias, being openly read before them, which ſayd, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one among them that was contrary to all the reſt of the city: Phocion ſtepping foorth before them all, bad them neuer ſeeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of all their doings. Another time he chanced to ſay his opinion before all the people, the which they all praiſed and approued: but when he ſaw they were ſo ſuddenly become of his mind, he turned backe to his friends, and asked them: Alas, hath not ſome euill thing ſlipped my mouth vnwares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towards the ſolemnizing of a ſacrifice: other men of his ſtate hauing payed their part, he was often alſo called vpon to pay his. But he anſwered them againe, aske them that be rich, for it were a ſhame for me to giue you any thing, being yet in this mans debt, pointing to Callicles the vſurer, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to cry out vpon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: That on a time there was a coward preparing to go to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill ſigne, he put off his harneſſe, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harneſſe againe, and went on his way towards the campe: the rauens began againe to make a goodlier cry behind him. But thereupon he ſtayed ſtraight, and at length ſayd: Ye ſhall crooke as loud as ye liſt, before ye feed on my carkaſſe. Another time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his charge, would needs haue him to leade them to giue charge vpon their enemies, but he would not: thereupon they called him coward, and ſayd he durſt not. Well ſayd he againe, It is not you can make me valiant, no more then my ſelfe can make you cowards: and yet one of vs know another. Another time in a maruellous dangerous time, the people handled him very churliſhly, and would needs haue him preſently deliuer account of his charge: but he anſwered them, O my friends, firſt ſaue your ſelues. Furthermore, the people being very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres: and preſently in peace againe waxing braue in words againſt Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victory out of their hands: he onely ſayd this to them, You are happy that haue a Captaine that knowes you, elſe you would ſing a new ſong. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOEOTIANS and them, about their bounds and fronters: the which they would not try by law, but by battell. But Phocion told them, they did they wiſt not what, and counſelled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the ſtronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they ſo much miſliked his opinion in the aſſembly, that they would not abide to heare him, nor ſuffer him to ſpeake. Well, my Maiſters, quoth he then, you may make me do that which is not to be done: but you ſhall neuer compell me againſt my mind, to ſay that which is not to be ſpoken. He would as gallantly alſo gird the Orators his aduerſaries, when they were buſie with him. As on a time he anſwered Demoſthenes, that ſayd vnto him: The people, Phocion will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heads. Yea thee, quoth he, if they be wiſe. Againe, when Polyeuctus SPHETTIAN, in a hot day perſwaded the people of ATHENS to make warre with king Philip, ſweating, and with much ado fetching his breath, being a fat man, that he was driuen oftentimes to drinke water, to end his oration: Surely ſayd Phocion, ye ſhall do maruellous wiſely, to make warre at ſuch a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he do, when he hath his curates and his target vpon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that now in making an oration onely before you, which he hath ſtudied long before, is almoſt ſtifled? Another time alſo when Lycargus in his oration had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the reſt, for that Alexander demanding ten citizens of ATHENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counſelled them to deliuer them: Phocion anſwered him, I haue oftentimes counſelled them for the beſt, but they would neuer follow my counſell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeited the LACEDÆMONIAN, with a maruellous long beard, a beggerly cloake, and a ſower looke. Phocion being checkt one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a witneſſe, to confirme that he ſpake. But he riſing vp, counſelled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall. Phocion perceiuing it, tooke him by the beard, and ſayd vnto him: Alas Archibiades, why diddeſt thou not then clip thy beard, ſeeing thou wouldeſt needs flatter? There was another great pleader, one Ariſtogiton that in all the aſſemblies of the city, did nothing but buzze warres continually in their eares. Afterwards when men were to be leauied and muſtered, and their names entred that ſhould go to the warres, Ariſtogiton came halting into the market place with a ſtaffe in his hand, and both his legges bound vp, to make the people beleeue that he was ſicke and diſeaſed. Phocion ſpying Ariſtogiton farre off, cried out to the clearke that wrote the bils: Put in Ariſtogiton, lame, and impudent. So that oftentimes it makes me muſe, how, or wherefore ſo ſharpe and ſeuere a man (as by theſe examples it appeareth he was) could come to the ſurname of good. Notwithſtanding, in the end I find it a hard thing, but not impoſſible, that a man ſhould be like wine, both ſweete and ſharpe together: as there are others to the contrary, that at the firſt ſight, ſeeme very courteous and gentle of conuerſation, and vpon better acquaintance, proue churliſh and dogged. It is reported alſo, that Hyperides the Orator one day ſhould ſay to the ATHENIANS: I pray you (my Lords) note me not for my ſharpneſſe, but conſider if my ſharpneſſe be without profit. As who ſhould ſay, men are not troubleſome, but for couetouſneſſe onely, and as if the people did not rather feare and hate them, that of inſolency and malice, did abuſe and contemne their authority. Phocion on the other ſide, neuer did citizen hurt, for any priuate malice he bare him: but was euer ſharpe and cruell to them, which were againſt any matter he preferred, for the benefit of the commonwealth. For in all other things, he ſhewed himſelfe maruellous lowly and courteous to euery body, and would be familiar with his aduerſaries, and helpe them if they wanted, or were otherwiſe in danger of diſpleaſure with the ſtate. Inſomuch as his friends therefore reproued him on a time, when he ſpake in the behalfe of a naughty man, an offender: O ſayd he, honeſt men need no helpe. Another time, Ariſtogiton the Sycophant, being clapped vp in priſon, ſent vnto Phocion to pray him to come and ſpeake with him, after he was condemned. Phocion went into the priſon to him, and when his friends perſwaded him to the contrary, he anſwered them: O let me alone, ſayd he, for where could I ſee Ariſtogiton more gladly then in priſon? Furthermore, when there went any army to ſea out of ATHENS, if there were any other choſen Generall but Phocion, the townes and Ilands all alongſt the ſea coaſt (which were friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS) fortified their wals, filled vp their hauens, and brought their wiues, ſlaues, and cattell, and all their goods into their townes and cities, as if they had bene enemies, and open war proclaimed. Contrarily alſo, if Phocion had bin Captaine and Generall, they would ſend out their ſhips to the ſea to meete him a farre off, crowned with garlands in token of common ioy, and ſo would bring him to their cities. King Philip ſecretly ſeeking to win the Ile of EVBOEA, ſent an army thither out of MACEDON, and intiſed the townes by tyrants to rebell: whereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN prayed aide of the ATHENIANS, to take this Iland from the MACEDONIANS, which they daily wanne more and more, if they came not preſently to aide them. So Phocion was ſent Generall thither, but with a few men onely, becauſe they made

account the men of that countrey would ſtraight ioyne with him, for the good will they bare him. But when he came thither, he found them all traytors, and rebels, and bribed with king Philips money, which he lauiſhed out amongſt them: ſo that he was brought into great daunger. Thereupon he retired to a litle hill that is ſeuered from the fields of Tamines, with a great large valley, and there fortified himſelfe with that litle army he had. Then he perſwaded his Captaines not to care for all thoſe rebels, pratlers, and cowards which fled out of their tents, and forſooke their enſignes and Captaines, but that they ſhould let them go out of the campe where they would. For ſayd he, ſuch diſobedient ſouldiers here will do vs no ſeruice, and moreouer will hinder them that haue good will to ſerue well: and at home alſo, knowing themſelues in fault, for that they forſooke the campe without licence, they dare not complaine vpon vs. Afterwards when the enemies came to ſet vpon him, he commaunded his men to arme, and put themſelues in readineſſe, and not to ſtirre, vntill he had done ſacrifice: but he ſtayed long before he came, either becauſe he could haue no lucky ſignes of the ſacrifices, or elſe for that he would draw his enemies nearer. Thereupon Plutarke ERETRIAN ſuppoſing he deferred to march for feare, went himſelfe firſt into the field, with certaine light horſemen he had in pay. Then the men of armes ſeeing them giue charge, could hold no longer, but followed him alſo, ſtragling out of the campe one after another diſorderly, and ſo did ſet vpon their enemies. The firſt being ouerthrowne, all the other diſperſed themſelues, and Plutarke himſelfe fled. Then certaine bands of the enemies thinking all had bene theirs, followed them euen into their campe, and came to throw downe their rampiers. In the meane time, Phocion hauing ended his ſacrifice, the ATHENIANS came out of their campe, and ſet vpon them, and made part of them flie immediatly, and part of them alſo they ſlue hard by the trenches of their campe. Then Phocion commaunded that the battell ſhould ſtand ſtill, to receiue their men that were ſcattered vp & downe the fields: in the meane ſpace, he himſelfe, with the choiſeſt men of his army gaue charge vpon the enemies. The fight was cruell betweene them. For the ATHENIANS fought very valiantly, venturing their perſons: but of them all, two young men fighting by their Generall (Glaucus the ſonne of Polymedes, and Thallus, the ſonne of Cineas) caried the praiſe away. And ſo did Cleophanes that day alſo ſhew himſelfe very valiant. For he crying out ſtill vpon the horſemen that fled, and perſwading them to come and helpe their Generall that was in daunger: brought them backe againe, and thereby got the footmen the victorie. After this battell, he draue Plutarke out of ERETRIA, and tooke the caſtell of ZARETRA, ſtanding in a very commodious place for this warre, where the Ile draweth to a ſtraightneſſe, enuironed on either ſide with the ſea: and would not ſuffer his men to take any GRECIANS priſoners, fearing leaſt the Orators at ATHENS might moue the people ſuddenly in a rage, to put them to death. After all theſe things were done, Phocion returned backe to ATHENS. But then did the confederates of the ATHENIANS ſtraight wiſh for his iuſtice and courteſie: and the ATHENIANS themſelues alſo knew his skilfulneſſe and manhood. For his ſucceſſor Moloſſus, that was Generall for the reſt of the warre, dealt ſo vndiſcreetly: that he himſelfe was taken priſoner there. Then king Philip being put in maruellous great hope, went with all his army into HELLESPONT, perſwading himſelfe, that he ſhould ſtraight take all CHERRONESVS, the cities of PERINTHE and BIZANTIVM. The ATHENIANS thereupon determining to ſend aide, to preuent king Philips comming: the Orators made great ſute, that Chares might be choſen Captaine: but he being ſent thither with a good number of ſhips, did no ſeruice worthie commendation, neither would the cities receiue his nauy into their hauens: but being ſuſpected of euery man, and deſpiſed of his enemies, he was driuen to ſaile vp and downe, and to get money of the allies. The people being incenſed by the Orators, were maruellouſly offended, and repented themſelues that they had ſent aide vnto the BIZANTINES. Then Phocion riſing vp, ſpake vnto the people, and told them, that it was no reaſon that miſtruſting their confederates they ſhould be offended with them: but to be angry with their Captaines that deſerued to be miſtruſted. For they, ſayd he, do make your confederates affraid of you, who without you notwithſtanding cannot ſaue themſelues. The people changing their minds by his oration, made Phocion againe their Captaine, and ſent him with an army into HELLESPONT to helpe their confederates there, which was of great importance to ſaue the city of BIZANTIVM. Furthermore, Phocions fame was ſo great, that Cleon, the greateſt man of vertue and authority in BIZANTIVM, and had before bene Phocions companion and familiar in the Academy: he made ſute for him vnto the city. Then the BIZANTINES would not ſuffer him him (though he desired it) to campe without the wals of their city, but opening their gates, receiued him in, and mingled the ATHENIANS amongst them. Who, perceiuing how much the citizens trusted them, did so honestly behaue themselues in their conuersation amongst them, that they gaue them no manner of cause to complaine of them: and shewed themselues so valiant besides in all battels and conflicts, that Philip (which before was thought dreadfull and inuincible, euery man being afraid to fight any battell with him) returned out of HELLESPONT without any thing done, and to his great discredite: where Phocion wanne some of his ships, and recouered againe the strong holds, in the which he had placed his garrisons. Furthermore, making diuerse inuasions into his countries, he destroyed his borders: till that at length he was sore hurt there, and so driuen to returne home againe, by meanes of a great army that came against him to defend the countrey. Shortly after, the MEGARIANS secretly sent vnto him, to deliuer their city into his hands. Phocion fearing if the BOEOTIANS vnderstood it, that they would preuent him, he called a common assembly early in the morning, and told the people what message the MEGARIANS had sent vnto him. The people vpon this motion being determined to aide them: Phocion straight sounding the trumpet at the breaking vp of the assembly, gaue them no further leisure, but to take their weapons, and so led them incontinently to MEGARA. The MEGARIANS receiuing him, Phocion shut vp the hauen of NISÆA, and brought two long wals from the city vnto it, and so ioyned it vnto the sea: whereby he stood not greatly in feare of his enemies by land, and for the sea, the ATHENIANS were Lords of it. Now when the ATHENIANS had proclaimed open warre against king Philip, and had chosen other Captaines in his absence, and that he was returned from the Iles: aboue all things, he perswaded the people (king Philip requiring peace, and greatly fearing the daunger) to accept the conditions of peace. Then one of these busie Orators that was still accusing one or other, sayd vnto him: Why Phocion, how darest thou attempt to turne the ATHENIANS from warre, hauing now their swords in their hands? Yes truly, sayd Phocion: though in warre I know I shall commaund thee, and in peace thou wilt commaund me. But when the people would not harken to him, and that Demosthenes caried them away with his perswasions, who counselled them to fight with king Philip, as farre from ATTICA as they could: I pray thee friend quoth Phocion vnto him, let vs not dispute where we shall fight, but consider how we shall ouercome, the which if we can so bring to passe, be sure we shall put the warre farre inough from vs: for men that are ouercome, be euer in feare and danger, whersoeuer they be. When the ATHENIANS had lost a battell against Philip, the seditious Orators, that hunted after innouation, preferred Charidemus to be chosen Generall of the ATHENIANS: whereupon the Magistrates and Senators being afraid, and taking with them all the Court and Senate of the AREOPAGITS, they made such earnest sute to the people, with the teares in their eyes, that at last (but with much ado) they obtained, that the affaires of the city might be put into Phocions hands and gouernemen. He thought good to accept the articles and gentle conditions of peace which Philip offered them. But after that the Orator Demades moued that the citie of ATHENS would enter into the common treatie of peace, and common assembly of the states of GREECE, procured at king Philips request: Phocion would not agree to it, vntill they might vnderstand what demaunds Philip would make at the assembly of the GRECIANS. When his opinion through the peruersnesse of time could not be liked of them, and that he saw the ATHENIANS soone after repented them that they did not follow his counsell, when they heard they should furnish king Philip with ships and horsemen: then he told them, the feare whereof ye now complaine, made me to withstand that, which now ye haue consented vnto. But sithence it is so that you haue now past your consents, you must be contented, and not be discouraged at it: remembring that your ancestors in times past haue sometime commaunded, and otherwhile obeyed others, and yet haue so wisely and discreetly gouerned themselues in both fortunes, that they haue not oney saued their city, but all GREECE besides. When newes came of king Philips death, the people for ioy would straight haue made bonfires and sacrifices to the gods for the good newes: but Phocion would not suffer them, and sayd, that it was a token of a base mind, to reioyce at any mans death, and besides that, the army which ouerthrew you at CHÆRONEA, hath not yet lost but one man. And when Demosthenes also would commonly speake ill of Alexander, and specially when he was so neare THEBES with his army, Phocion rehearsed vnto him these verses of Homer:

Phocion driue Philip out of Hellespont.

Phocion ioyned Megara vnto Athens.

To reioyce at any mans hurt sheweth a base mind, and vile nature.

How great a folly is it for to ſtand
Againſt a cruell king,
Which being arm'd, and hauing ſword in hand,
Seekes fame of euery thing?

What, when there is ſuch a great fire kindled, wilt thou caſt the city into it? for my part therefore, though they were willing, yet will I not ſuffer them to caſt themſelues away: for to that end haue I taken vpon me this charge and gouernement. And afterwards alſo, when Alexander had razed the city of THEBES, and had required the ATHENIANS to deliuer him Demoſthenes, Lycurgus, Hyperides, and Charidemus, and that the whole aſſembly and councell not knowing what aunſwer to make, did all caſt their eyes vpon Phocion, and cried vnto him to ſay his opinion: he then roſe vp, and taking one of his friends vnto him called Nicocles, whom he loued and truſted aboue all men elſe, he ſayd thus openly vnto them: Theſe men whom Alexander requireth, haue brought this city to this extremity, that if he required Nicocles here, I would giue my conſent to deliuer him: for I would thinke my ſelfe happy to looſe my life, for all your ſafety. Furthermore, though I am right heartily ſory (ſayd he) for the poore afflicted THEBANS, that are come into the city for ſuccour: yet I aſſure yee, it is better one city mourne, then two. And therefore I thinke it is beſt to intreate the conquerour for both, rather then to our certaine deſtruction to fight with him that is the ſtronger. It is ſayd alſo that Alexander refuſed the firſt decree which the people offered him vpon Phocions requeſt, and ſent away the Ambaſſadours, and would not ſpeake with them. But the ſecond, which Phocion himſelfe brought, he tooke, being told by his fathers old ſeruants, that king Philip made great accompt of him: whereupon Alexander, did not onely giue him audience, and graunt his requeſt, but further followed his counſell. For Phocion perſwaded him, if he loued quietneſſe, to leaue warre: if he deſired fame, then that he ſhould make warre with the barbarous people, but not with the GRECIANS. So Phocion feeding Alexanders humour with ſuch talke and diſcourſe as he thought would like him beſt: he ſo altered and ſoftned Alexanders diſpoſition, that when he went from him, he willed him that the ATHENIANS ſhould looke to their affaires, for if he ſhould dye, he knew no people fitter to commaund then they. Furthermore, becauſe he would be better acquainted with Phocion, and make him his friend, he made ſo much of him, that he more honoured him, then all the reſt of his friends. To this effect, Duris the hiſtoriographer writeth, that when Alexander was growne very great, and had ouercome king Darius: he left out of his letters this word Chærin (to wit, ioy, and health) which he vſed commonly in all the letters he wrote, & would no more honor any other with that maner of ſalutation, but Phocion and Antipater. Chares alſo writeth the ſame. And they all do confeſſe, that Alexander ſent Phocion a great gift out of ASIA, of a hundred ſiluer talents. This money being brought to ATHENS, Phocion asked them that brought it, why Alexander gaue him ſuch a great reward, aboue all the other citizens of ATHENS. Becauſe ſayd they, he onely eſteemeth thee to be a good and honeſt man. Phocion replied againe, then let him giue me leaue to be that I ſeeme, and am whileſt I liue. The meſſengers would not ſo leaue him, but folowed him home to his houſe, where they ſaw his great husbandry and thriftineſſe. For they found his wife her ſelfe baking, and he himſelfe drew water before them, out of the well to waſh his feete. But then they were more earneſtly in hand with him than before, and prayed him to take the kings preſent, and were offended with him, ſaying it was a ſhame for Alexanders friend to liue ſo miſerably and beggarly as he did. Then Phocion ſeeing a poore old man go by, in a thread-bare gowne, asked them whether they thought him worſe then he? No, God forbid, anſwered they againe. Then replied he againe, he liues with leſſe then I do, and yet is contented, and hath inough. To be ſhort, ſayd he, if I ſhould take this ſumme of money and occupy it not, it is as much as I had it not: on the other ſide, if I occupy it, I ſhall make all the city ſpeake ill of the king and me both. So this great preſent was ſent backe from ATHENS, whereby he ſhewed the GRECIANS, that he was richer that needed not ſuch gold and ſiluer, then he that gaue it him. But when Alexander wrote againe to Phocion, that he did not reckon them for his friends, that would take nothing of him: Phocion notwithſtanding would not take the money, but only requeſted him for his ſake, that he would ſet theſe men at liberty, which were kept priſoners in the city of SARDIS, for certaine accuſations layed againſt them: Echecratides the Rhetoritian, Athenodorus borne in the citie of IMBROS, and two CORINTHIANS, Demaratus and Spartus. Alexander preſently ſet them at liberty, and ſent Craterus into MACEDON, commanding

commaunding him to giue Phocion the choise of one of these foure cities of Asia which he liked best: Cios, Gergitha, Mylassis, Elea: sending him word, that he would be much more angrier with him now, if he did refuse his offer, than he was at the first. But Phocion would neuer accept any one of them: and Alexander shortly after died. Phocions house is seene yet at this day in the village of Melita, set foorth with plates of copper, but otherwise very meane, and without curiosity. For the wiues he maried, there is no mention made of the first, saiuing that Cephisodotus the image grauer was her brother. But for his second wife she was no lesse famous at Athens, for her honesty and good housewifery, then Phocion for his iustice and equity. And for proofe thereof, it is reported that the Athenians being one day assembled in the Theater, to see new tragedies played, one of the players when he should haue come vpon the scaffold to haue played his part, asked the setter forth of the playes the apparell of a Queene, and certaine Ladies to waite vpon her, because he was to play the part of the Queene. The setter foorth of the playes denying him, the player went away in a rage, and left the people staring one at another, and would not come out vpon the stage. But Melanthius the setter foorth of the playes, compelling him, brought him by force on the stage, and cried out vnto him: doest not thou see Phocions wife that goeth vp and downe the city with one mayde onely waiting vpon her? and wilt thou play the foole, and marre the modestie of the women of Athens? the people hearing his words, filled all the Theater with ioy and clapping of hands. The same Lady, when a certaine Gentlewoman of Ionia came to Athens to see her, and shewed her all her rich iewels and precious stones she had: she aunswered her againe, All my riches and iewels, is my husband Phocion, who these twenty yeares together hath continually bene chosen Generall for the Athenians. Phocions sonne telling his father on a time, that he was desirous to contend with other yong men for the victory, who should cunninglieſt leape out, and get vp againe into the charets or coaches, running full course at the feasts Panathenæa at Athens: his father was contented he should, not that he was desirous his sonne should haue the honour of the victory, but because by this honest exercise he should grow to better maner, for that he was a dissolute yong man, and much giuen to wine. Yet he wan the victory at that time, and there were diuerse of his fathers friends, that prayed him to do them that honour, that they might keepe the feast of this victory in their houses. Phocion denied them all but one man, and him he suffered to shew his good will vnto his house, and went thither himselfe to supper to him. Where amongst many fine and superfluous things prepared, he found passing bathes of wine and sweet smelling spices to wash the feete of the bidden guests as they came to the feast. Whereupon he called his sonne to him, and asked him, how canst thou abide Phocus, that our friend should thus disgrace thy victory with excesse? But because he would withdraw his sonne from that licentious life, he brought him to Sparta, and placed him there among yong boyes brought vp after the Laconian discipline. The Athenians were much offended at it, to see that Phocion did so much despise his owne countrey manner and fashions. Also when Demades the Orator one day sayd vnto Phocion: Why do we not perswade the Athenians to liue after the Laconian maner? As for me, sayd he, if thou wilt make one to set it forward, I am ready to be the first man to moue the matter. Indeed quoth Phocion, thou art a meete man to perswade the Athenians to liue Laconian like, in common together at their meales, and to praise Lycurgus straight law: that art thy selfe commonly so perfumed, and fine in thy apparell. Another time when Alexander wrote letters vnto Athens to send him some ships, and that the Orators perswaded them not to graunt him, the people called vpon Phocion chiefly to say his opinion: then Phocion told them plainly, me thinkes ye must either make your selues the strongest in wars, or being the weaker, procure to be friends vnto the stronger. Pythias a new come Orator, being full of toung, and impudent, would still make one to speake in euery matter: wherefore Phocion sayd to him, Good gods, will this nouice neuer leaue babling? And when Harpalus king Alexanders Lieutenant of the prouince of Babylon, fled out of Asia, and came to Attica with a great summe of gold and siluer: straight these men that sold their tongues to the people for mony, flocked about him like a sight of swallowes. And he stucke not to giue euery one of them a peece of money to bast them with: for it was a trifle to him, considering the great summes of money he brought. But to Phocion himselfe, he sent vnto him seuen hundred talents, and offered himselfe and all that he had into his hands of trust. But Phocion gaue him a sharpe aunswer, and told him, that he would make him repent it, if he corrupted the city of Athens in that manner. So Harpalus being amazed therewith, left him at that time, and went vntò them that had taken money of him. But ſhortly after, when the ATHENIANS ſate in councell about him, he perceiued that thoſe which had taken his mony were ſhrunke from him, and that they did accuſe him, where they ſhould haue excuſed him, to bleere the world, that men ſhould not ſuſpect them they had bene corrupted: and that Phocion on the other ſide which had refuſed his money, hauing reſpect to the cõmonwealth, had alſo ſome regard to ſaue his life: he once more attempted all the wayes he could to win him. Howbeit he found him ſo conſtant, that no money could cary the man. Then Harpalus falling in friendſhip with Chariles (Phocions ſonne in law) he made him to be ill ſpoken of, and greatly ſuſpected, becauſe men ſaw that he truſted him in all things, and imployed him in all his affaires. As in committing to his truſt the making of a ſumptuous tombe for Pythonicè, the famous curriſan that was dead, whom he loued, and by whom he had a daughter: the taking vpon him whereof was no leſſe ſhame vnto Chariles, then the finiſhing thereof was diſgrace vnto him. This tombe is ſeene vnto this day in a place called Hermium, in the high way from ATHENS to ELEVSIN: the workmanſhip thereof being nothing like neare the charge of thirty talents, which was reported to be giuen by Harpalus vnto Chariles, for the finiſhing of the ſame. Furthermore after Harpalus death, Chariles and Phocion tooke his daughter, and carefully brought her vp. Afterwards alſo, Chariles being accuſed for the money he had taken of Harpalus, he beſought his father in law Phocion, to helpe to eaſe him in his iudgement. But Phocion flatly denied him, and ſayd: Chariles I tooke thee for my ſonne in law, in all honeſt and iuſt cauſes onely. Furthermore, when Aſclepiades the ſon of Hipparchus, brought the firſt newes of the death of king Alexander, Demades the Orator would not beleeue him: for ſayd he, if it were true, all the earth would ſmell of the ſauor of his corſe. Phocion then perceiuing the people began to be high minded, & ſought innouation: he went about to bridle and pacifie them. But when many of the Orators got vp to the pulpit for orations, and cried out that Aſclepiades newes was true of Alexanders death: well then quoth Phocion, if it be true to day, it ſhall be true alſo to morow, and the next day after. And therefore my maiſters, be not too haſty, but thinke of it at better leiſure, and ſet your affaires at a ſure ſtay. When Leoſthenes alſo by his practiſe had brought the city of ATHENS into the warre called the GREEKES warre, and in ſcorne asked Phocion that was offended at it, what good he had done vnto the comonwealth ſo many yeares together, as he had bene Generall ouer the ATHENIANS: Phocion aunſwered him, No ſmall good ſayd he, for all my countrey men haue bene buried at home in their owne graues. Another time alſo, Leoſthenes ſpeaking proudly and inſolently vnto the people, Phocion one day ſayd vnto him: Young man my friend, thy words are like vnto the Cypreſſe tree, which is high and great, but beareth no fruite. Then Hyperides riſing vp, asked Phocion: When wilt thou then counſell the ATHENIANS to make warre? When I ſhall ſee young men, ſayd he, not to forſake their rankes, rich men liberall, and Orators leaue to rob the common wealth. When the ATHENIANS wondred to ſee ſuch a goodly great army as Leoſthenes had leauied: and that they asked Phocion how he liked it: It is a goodly army, quoth he, for a furlong, but I feare their returne, and the continuance of this warre: for I do not ſee the city able to make any more money, nor more ſhips, neither yet any more ſouldiers than theſe. The which proued true, as it fell out afterwards: for at the firſt, Leoſthenes did many notable exploits. He ouercame the BOEOTIANS in battell, and draue Antipater into the citie of LAMIA: the which did put the ATHENIANS in ſuch a hope and iolity, that they made continuall feaſts and ſacrifices through the citie to thanke the gods for theſe good newes. And there were ſome among them, that to take Phocion in a trippe, asked him if he did not wiſh that he had done all thoſe things? Yes indeed, aunſwered he, I would I had done them, but yet I would not haue giuen the counſell to haue done them. Another time alſo when letters came daily, one after another, bringing good newes, Good gods, ſayd he, when ſhall we leaue off to ouercome? But when Leoſthenes was dead in this voyage, they that feared Phocion ſhould be appointed Captaine in his place, and that he would pacifie the warre: did thruſt in a man of meane hauiour, and vnknowne, that ſayd in full aſſembly of councell, that he was Phocions friend, and ſchoole-fellow, and therefore beſought the people that they would ſpare Phocion, becauſe they had not ſuch another man as he, and that they would make Antiphilus Generall of their armie. The people were well contented withall. But then Phocion ſtood vp, and ſayd, that this man was neuer ſcholer with him, neither did he euer know him before that time: but now ſayd he, from hencefoorth I will take take thee for my friend, for thou haſt giuen the people the beſt counſell for me. The people notwithſtanding determining to make warre with the BOEOTIANS, Phocion ſpake againſt it all he could. Thereupon his friends bidding him beware of ſuch ſpeeches, how he did offend the people, leaſt they killed him: he aunſwered them, they ſhall wrongfully put me to death, quoth he, ſpeaking for the benefit of my countrey, but otherwiſe they ſhall haue reaſon for to do it, if I ſpeake to the contrary. But when he ſaw nothing would pacifie them, and that they went on ſtill with their intent: then he commaunded the Herauld to proclaime by ſound of trumpet, that all citizens from fourteene yeares vnto threeſcore, able to cary weapon, ſhould preſently vpon the breaking vp of the aſſembly, arme themſelues, and follow him with fiue dayes prouiſion for victuals. Then was there great ſtirre amongſt them in the city, and the old men came and complained vnto him, for his ouer ſtraight commandement. He told them againe, I do you no wrong: for I am foure ſcore my ſelfe, and yet will go with you. By this meanes he pacified them at that time, and quenched their fond deſire of warre. But when all the ſea coaſt was full of ſouldiers, both of the MACEDONIANS, and other ſtrangers which were led by Micion their Captaine, that landed in the territory of the village RHAMNVS, and ſpoiled the countrey thereabours: then Phocion led the ATHENIANS thither. But when he was there, diuerſe taking vpon them the office of a Lieutenant, and going about to counſell him, ſome to lodge his campe vpon ſuch a hill, and others to ſend his horſemen to ſuch a place, and others to campe here: O Hercules, quoth he, how many Captaines do I ſee, and how few ſouldiers! Afterwards when he had ſet his footmen in battell ray, there was one among them that left his rancke, and ſtepped out before them all. Thereupon one of his enemies alſo made towards him to fight with him: but the ATHENIANS hart failed him, and he went backe againe to his place. Then ſayd Phocion vnto him: Art thou not aſhamed yong lout to haue forſaken thy rancke twiſe? the one, where thy Captaine had placed thee, and the other in the which thou haddeſt placed thy ſelfe? So Phocion giuing charge vpon the enemies, he ouerthrew them, and ſlue Micion their Captaine, with diuerſe others. Furthermore, the army of the GRECIANS being at that time in THESSALY, wan a battell of Antipater, and Leonatus, that ioyned with him with the MACEDONIANS which he had brought out of ASIA: where Leonatus was ſlaine in the field, Antiphilus being Generall of the footmen, and Menon THESSALIAN Colonell of the horſemen. Shortly after Craterus comming out of ASIA into EVROPE with a great army, they fought a battell by the city of CRANON, where the GRECIANS were ouerthrowne: yet was not the ouerthrow nor ſlaughter great, although it came through the diſobedience of the ſouldiers to their Captaines, which were but yong men and vſed them ouer gently. Moreouer, when Antipater practiſed to make the cities reuolt, they betrayed them, and ſhamefully forſooke to defend their common liberty: whereupon Antipater marched foorthwith with his army, to the city of ATHENS. Demoſthenes and Hyperides vnderſtanding that, forſooke the city. Then Demades, that was in diſgrace and defamed for lacke of payment of ſuch fines as were ſet vpon his head (being ſeuen ſeuerall times cõdemned, becauſe he had ſo many times moued matters contrary to the law) and could not therefore be ſuffered any more to ſpeake in the aſſembly, was then diſpenced withall, and licenſed to ſpeake: wherupon he moued the people to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Antipater, with full commiſſion and authority to treate with him of peace. The people fearing to put to any mans truſt this abſolute authority to treate of peace: they called for Phocion, ſaying that he onely was to be truſted with the Ambaſſade. Then Phocion anſwered thẽ: if you had beleeued my former coũſels I alwaies gaue you, ſuch weighty matters ſhould not now haue troubled you at all. So the decree being confirmed by the people, Phocion was ſent Ambaſſador vnto Antipater, that lay at the caſtell of Cadmea, being ready at that time to inuade the coũtry of ATTICA. Phocion firſt requeſted him, that before he remoued from thence, he would make peace with the ATHENIANS. Craterus preſently anſwered him: Phocion, thy requeſt is vnreaſonable, that lying here we ſhould eate out our friends, and deſtroy their countrey, when we may liue of our enemies, and enrich our ſelues with their ſpoile. But Antipater taking Craterus by the hand, told him: we muſt needs do Phocion this pleaſure. And for the reſt, touching the capitulations of peace, he willed that the ATHENIANS ſhould ſend them a blanke, & refer the conditions of peace to them: like as himſelfe being beſieged in the city LAMIA, had referred all capitulations and articles of peace, vnto the diſcretion of Leoſthenes their Generall. So when Phocion was come backe to ATHENS, the ATHENIANS ſeeing there was no remedy, were compelled to be contented with ſuch offer of peace, as the enemy made them. Then Phocion was ſent backe againe to Phocion Ambaſſador vnto Antipater.

Xenocrates authority.

Antipater at THEBES, with other Ambassadors ioyned in commission with him: amongst whom also was that famous Philosopher Xenocrates. The estimation of his vertue was so great with all men, that it was thought there was no liuing man so proud, cruell, disdainfull, nor hasty of nature, but that the onely looke of Xenocrates would soften and qualifie him, and make him to reuerence him: but yet with Antipater it fell out contrary, by his peruerse nature, which hated all vertue: for he embraced all the rest, and would not once salute Xenocrates. Whereupon, some say, that Xenocrates sayd then, Antipater doth well to be ashamed, to see me a witnesse of the discourtesie and euill he meaneth vnto the ATHENIANS. So when Xenocrates began to speake, Antipater would not abide to heare him, but interrupted him, and checked him, and in the end commaunded him to hold his peace. When Phocion had spoken, Antipater aunswered them, that he would make peace with the ATHENIANS, so they deliuered him Demosthenes and Hyperides: that they should keepe their auncient lawes and gouernement, that they should receiue a garrison into the hauen of Munychia, that they should defray the charges of this warre, and also pay a ransome besides. All the other Ambassadours but Xenocrates, willingly accepted these conditions of peace, as very reasonable and fauourable: but he sayd, that for slaues Antipater did handle them fauourably, but for free men, he dealt too hardly with them. Then Phocion besought him that he would yet release them of their garrison. But Antipater (as it is sayd) answered him: Phocion, we would gladly graunt thee any thing, sauing that which should vndo thee, and vs both. Some other write notwithstanding, that Antipater sayd not so, but asked him, if he would become surety for the ATHENIANS, that they should attempt no alteration, but faithfully keepe the articles and conditions of this peace, if he did release them of this garrison. Phocion then holding his peace, and delaying aunswer, there was one Callimedon surnamed Carabos (a bold man, and hated the liberty of the people) that brake foorth in these words: If Phocion were so fond to giue his word for the ATHENIANS, wouldest thou Antipater beleeue him therefore, and leaue to do that thou hast determined? Thus were the ATHENIANS, driuen to receiue the garrison of the MACEDONIANS, of the which Menillus was Captaine, an honest man, and Phocions friend. This commaundement to receiue the garrison within the hauen of Munychia, was found very stately, and done by Antipater rather of a vaine glory to boast of his power: then for any profit could other come of it. For not long after, on that day when he tooke possession of the castell, he further increased their griefe: because the garrison entred the twentieth day of Bœdromion (to wit, the moneth of August) on the which the feast day of their mysteries was celebrated, at what time they make their procession called Iacchus, from the city of ATHENS, vnto ELEVSIN. Therefore the solemnitie of this holy feast being thus confused, many began to consider, that in old time when their Realme did flourish, there were heard and seene voices and images of the gods on that day, which made the enemies both afraid, and amazed: and now in contrary manner in the very selfe same solemnity of the gods, they saw the greatest calamitie that could haue happened vnto GREECE. And the holiest feast which was kept all the yeare through before, became then to be prophaned with the title of the greatest misfortune and euent, that euer happened vnto the GRECIANS, which was, the losse of their liberty. For, not many yeares before, there was brought an Oracle from DODONE vnto ATHENS: that they should looke well to the rockes of Diana, that straungers should not possesse them. And about that time also the couerings with the which they do adorne the holy beds of the mysteries, being wet with water, became from a purple colour which they had before, to looke yellow and pale, as if it had bene the couering of a dead bodie. Yea, and that which was most to be wondred at of all other, was this: that taking other couerings which were not holy, and putting them in the same water, they did without chaunging keepe their colour they had before. When one of the ministers of the temple also did wash a white pigge in the sea in a cleane place by the wharfe, there suddenly came a great fish that bit at it, and caried the hinder parts of the pigge cleane away with it. Whereby men coniectured that the gods did signifie vnto them, that they should loose the lowest part of their city, neerest vnto the sea, and should keepe the highest parts thereof. This notwithstanding, the garrison did not offend nor trouble the ATHENIANS, because of the honesty of their Captaine Menillus. Now there were aboue twelue thousand citizens, that for their pouerty lost the benefite of their freedome, of the which, part of them remained at ATHENS, vnto whom it seemed that they offered great wrong and iniury: and part of them also went into THRACIA, where Antipater assigned them
